He was a dupe, an ass! The dupe of those bad women, and of his ancient enemy! It was maddening! Yet, how could Sabina be in fault? She had not known Marie till he himself had introduced her, and he could not believe her capable of such baseness. The crime must lie between the sister two. Yet—

However that might be mattered little to him now. He would return, order his carriage once more, and depart, shaking off the dust of his feet against them! 'Pah! There were other women in the world, and women, too, who would not demand of him to become a hero.'

He reached the Kurhaus, and went in, but not into the public room, for fear of meeting people whom he had no heart to face.

He was in the passage, in the act of settling his account with the waiter, when Thurnall came hastily out, and ran against him.

Stangrave stood by the passage lamp, so that he saw Tom's face at once.

Tom drew back, begged a thousand pardons, and saw Stangrave's face in turn.

The two men looked at each other for a few seconds. Stangrave longed to say, 'You intend to shoot me? Then try at once,' but he was ashamed, of course, to make use of words which he had so accidentally overheard.

Tom looked carefully at Stangrave, to divine his temper from his countenance. It was quite angry enough to give Tom excuse for saying to himself—

'The fellow is mad at being caught at last. Very well.'

'I think, sir,' said he, quietly enough, 'that you and I had better walk outside for a few minutes. Allow me to retract the apology I just made, till we have had some very explicit conversation on other matters.'

'Curse his impudence!' thought Stangrave. 'Does he actually mean to bully me into marrying her?' and he replied haughtily enough.

'I am aware of no matters on which I am inclined to be explicit with Mr. Thurnall, or on which Mr. Thurnall has a right to be explicit with me.'

'I am, then,' quoth Tom, his suspicion increasing in turn. 'Do you wish, sir, to have a scene before this waiter and the whole house, or will you be so kind as to walk outside with me?'

'I must decline, sir, not being in the habit of holding intercourse with an actress's bully.'

Tom did not knock him down, but replied smilingly enough.

'I am far too much in earnest in this matter, sir, to be stopped by any coarse expressions. Waiter, you may go. Now will you fight me to-morrow morning, or will you not?'

'I may fight a gentleman, but not you.'

'Well, I shall not call you a coward, because I know that you are none; and I shall not make a row here, for a gentleman's reasons, which you, calling yourself a gentleman, scorn to have forgotten. But this I will do, I will follow you till you do fight me, if I have to throw up my own prospects in life for it. I will proclaim you, wherever we meet, for what you are—a mean and base intriguer, I will insult you in Kirsals, and cane you on public places, I will be Frankenstein's man to you day and night, till I have avenged the wrongs of this poor girl, the dust of whose feet you are not worthy to kiss off.

Stangrave was surprised at his tone. It was certainly not that of a conscious villain, but he only replied unceremoniously—

'And pray what may give Mr Thunall the right to consider himself the destined avenger of this frail beauty's wrongs?'

'I will tell you that after we have fought, and somewhat more. Meanwhile, that expression, "frail beauty," is a fresh offence, for which I should certainly cane you, if she were not in the house.'

'Will,' drawled Stangrave, feigning an ostentatious yawn, 'I believe the wise method of ridding myself of importunity is to grant their requests. Have you pistols? I have none.'

'I have both duellers and revolvers at your service.'

'Ah! I think we'll try the revolvers then,' said Stangrave, savage from despair, and disbeliever in all human goodness. 'After what has passed, five or six shots apiece will be hardly outré.'

'Hardly, I think,' said Tom. 'Will you name your second?'

'I know no one. I have not been here two hours, but I suppose they do not matter much.'

'Humph! It is as well to have witnesses in case of accident. There are a couple of toasting Burschen in the public room, who, I think, would enjoy the office. Both have scars on their faces, so they will be au fait at the thing. Shall I have the honour of sending one of them to you?'

'As you will, sir, my number is 31.' And the two fools turned on their respective heels, and walked off.

At sunrise next morning Tom and his second are standing on the Falkenhöhe, at the edge of the vast circular pit, blasted out by some explosion which has torn the slate into mere dust and shivers, now covered by a thin coat of turf.

'Schöne ansicht!' says the Bursch, waving his hand round, in a tone which is benevolently meant to withdraw Tom's mind from painful considerations.

'Very pretty prospect indeed. You're sure you understand that revolver thoroughly?'

The Bursch mutters to himself something about English monochrome, and assures Thunall that he is competently acquainted with the weapon, and indeed he ought to be, for having never seen one before, he has been talking and thinking of nothing else since they left Bertrich.

And why does not Tom care to look at the prospect? Certainly not because he is afraid. He slept as soundly as ever last night, and knows not what fear means. But somehow, the glorious view reminds him of another glorious view, which he saw last summer walking by Grace Harvey's side from Tolchard's farm. And that subject he will sternly put away. He is not sure but what it might maim even him.

The likeness certainly exists, for the rock, being the same in both places, has taken the same general form, and the wanderer in Rhine-Prussia and Nassau might often fancy himself in Devon or Cornwall. True, here there is no sea and there no Moselkopf raises its huge crater-cone far above the uplands, all golden in the level sun. But that brown Tannus far away, or that brown Hindsrück opposite, with its deep-wooded gorges layered with level gleams of light across black gullies of shade, might well be Duntun, or Chinnarrow moor itself, high over Alverton town, which he will see no more. True, in Cornwall there would be no slag cliffs of the Falkenley beneath his feet, as black and blasted at this day as when you or hard meadow was the mouth of hell, and the south-west wind dashed the great flame against the under-cliff behind, and forged it into walls of time-defying glass. But that might well be Alva stream, that lashed in its green gulf far below, winding along toward the green gulf of the Moselle—he will look at it no more, lest he see Grace herself come to him across the down, to chide him, with sad and horror, for the dark deed which he has come to do.

And yet he does not wish to kill Stangrave. He would like to 'wing him'. He must punish him for his conduct to Mary, punish him for last night's insult. It is a necessity, but a disagreeable one, he would be sorry to go to the war with that man's blood upon his hand. He is sorry that he is out of practice.

'A year ago I could have counted on hitting him where I liked. I trust I shall not blunder against his vitals now. However, if I do, he is himself to blame.'

The thought that Stangrave may kill him never crosses his mind. Of course, out of six shots, fired at all distances from forty paces to fifteen, one may hit him. But as for being killed—

Tom's heart is hardened, melted again and again this summer for a moment, only to freeze again. He all but believes that he bears a charmed life. All the miraculous escapes of his past years, instead of making him believe in a living, guiding, protecting Father, have become to that proud hard heart the excuse for a deliberate, though unconscious, atheism. His fall is surely near.

At last Stangrave and his second appear. Stangrave is haggard, not from fear, but from misery, and rage, and self-condemnation. This is the end of all his fine resolves! Pah! what use in them? What use in being a martyr in this world? All men are liars, and all women too!

Tom and Stangrave stand a little apart from each other, while one of the seconds paced the distance. He steps out away from them, across the crater floor, carrying Tom's revolver in his hand, till he reaches the required point, and turns.

He turns but not to come back. Without a gesture or an exclamation which could explain his proceedings, he faces about once more, and rushes up the slope as hard as legs and wind permitted.

Tom is confounded with astonishment. Either the Bursch is seized with terror at the whole business, or he covets the much-admired revolver, in either case he is making off with it before the owner's eyes.

'Stop! Hillo! Stop this!' He's got my pistol! and away goes Thurnall in chase after the Bursch, who, never looking behind, never sees that he is followed. While Stangrave and the second Bursch look on with wide eyes.

Now the Bursch is a 'gymnast,' and a capital runner, and so is Tom likewise, and brilliant is the race upon the Falkenbohe. But the victory, after a while, becomes altogether a question of wind, for it was all up hill. The crater, being one of 'explosion, and not of elevation,' as the geologists would say, does not slope downward again, save on one side, from its outer lip, and Tom and the Bursch were breasting a fair hill, after they had emerged from the 'kessel' below.

Now the Bursch had had too much Thronerbofberger the night before; and possibly, as Burschen will in their vacations, the night before that also, whereby his diaphragm surrendered at discretion, while his heels were yet unconquered, and he suddenly felt a strong gripe, and a stronger kick, which jelled him over on the turf.

The hapless youth, who fancied himself alone upon the mountain tops, reared more incoherently, and Tom, too angry in haste, and too hurried to punish, tore the revolver out of his grasp, whereon one barrel exploded—

'I have done it now!'

No. The ball had luckily buried itself in the ground.

Tom turned, to rush down hill again, and meet the impatient Stangrave.

Crack—whing—g—g!

'A bullet!'

Yes! And, prodigy on prodigy, up the hill towards him charged, as he would upon a whole army, a Prussian gendarme, with bayonet fixed.

Tom sat down upon the mountain-side, and burst into inextinguishable laughter, while the gendarme came charging up, right toward his very nose.

But up to his nose he charged not, for his wind was short, and the noise of his roaring went before him. Moreover, he knew that Tom had a revolver, and was a 'mad Englishman.'

Now he was not afraid of Tom, or of a whole army, but he was a man of drills and of orders, of rules and of precedents, as a Prussian gendarme ought to be; and for the modes of attacking infantry, cavalry, and artillery, man, woman, and child, thief and poacher, stray pig, or even stray wolf, he had drill and orders sufficient. But for attacking a Colt's revolver, none.

Moreover, for arresting all manner of riotous Burschen, drunken bores, French red republicans, Mazzini-hunted Italian refugees, suspect Polish incendiaries, or other feras nature, he had precedent and regulation. But for arresting a mad Englishman, none. He held fully the opinion of his superiors that there was no saying what an Englishman might not, could not, and would not do. He was a sphinx, a chimera, a humanie broke loose, who took unintelligible delight in getting wet, and dirty, and tired, and starved, and all but killed, and called the same 'taking exercise.'—who would see everything that nobody ever cared to see, and who knew mysteriously everything about everywhere, whose deeds were like his opinions, utterly subversive of all constituted order in heaven and earth, being, probably, the inhabitant of another planet, possibly the man in the moon himself, who had been turned out, having made his native satellite too hot to hold him. All that was to be done with him was to inquire whether his passport was correct, and then (with a due regard to self-preservation) to endure his vagaries in jutting wonder.

So the gendarme paused panting, and not daring to approach, walked slowly and solemnly round Tom, keeping the point of his bayonet carefully towards him, and roaring at intervals—

'You have murdered the young man!'

'But I have not!' said Tom. 'Look and see!'

'But I saw him fall!'

'But he has got up again, and run away!'

'So! Then where is your passport?'

That one other fact, cognizable by the mind of a Prussian gendarme, remained as an anchor for his brains under the new and trying circumstances, and he used it. 'Here!' quoth Tom, pulling it out.

The gendarme stepped cautiously forward.

'Don't be frightened. I'll stick it on your bayonet-point,' and suiting the action to the word, Tom caught the bayonet-point, put the passport on it, and pulled out his cigar-case.

'Mad Englishman!' murmured the gendarme.

'So! The passport is correct. But der Herr must consider himself under arrest. Der Herr will give up his death-instrument.'

'By all means,' says Tom, and gives up the revolver.

The gendarme takes it very cautiously, meditates awhile how to carry it, sticks the point of his bayonet into its muzzle, and lifts it aloft.

'Schon! Das kriegt! Has der Herr any more death-instruments?'

'Dorrens!' says Tom, and begins fumbling in his pockets, from whence he pulls a case of surgical instruments, another of mathematical ones, another of lancets, and a knife with unnumerable blades, saws, and pickers, every one of which he opens carefully, and then spreads the whole fearful array upon the grass before him.

The gendarme scratches his head over those too plain proofs of some tremendous conspiracy.

'So! Mazymust have a dozen hands! He is surely Palmerston himself; or at least Hecker, or Mazzini!' murmurs he as he meditates how to stow them all.

He thinks now that the revolver may be safe elsewhere, and that the knife will do best on the bayonet-point. So he nudges the revolver.

Bang goes barrel number two, and the ball goes into the turf between his feet.

'You will shoot yourself soon at that rate,' says Tom.

'So! Der Herr speaks German like a native,' says the gendarme, growing complimentary in his perplexity. 'Perhaps der Herr would be so good as to carry his death-instruments himself and attend on the Herr Polizeirath, who is waiting to see him.'

'By all means!' And Tom picks up his tackle, while the prudent gendarme reloads, and Tom marches down the hill, the gendarme following, with his bayonet disagreeably near the small of Tom's back.

'Don't stumble! Look out for the stones, or you'll have that skewer through me!'

'So! Der Herr speaks German like a native,' says the gendarme, civilly. 'It is certainly der Palmerston,' thinks he, 'his manners are so polite.'

Once at the crater edge, and able to see into the pit, the mystery is, in part at least, explained for there stand not only Stangrave and Bursch number two, but a second gendarme, two elderly gentlemen, two ladies, and a black boy.

One is Lieutenant D—, by his white mustache. He is lecturing the Bursch, who looks sufficiently foolish. The other is a jolly and awful-looking personage in uniform, evidently the Polizeirath of those parts, armed with the just terrors of the law, but Justice has, if not her eyes bandaged, at least her hands tied, for on his arm hangs Sabina, smiling, chaffing, ontreating. The Polizeirath smiles, bows, ogles, evidently a willing captive. Venus has disarmed Rhadamanthus, as who has Mars so often, and the sword of justice must rust in its scabbard.

Some distance behind them is Stangrave, talking in a low voice, earnestly, passionately — to whom but to Marie?

And lastly, opposite each other, and like two dogs who are uncertain whether to make friends or fight, are a gendarme and Sabina's black boy. The gendarme, with shouldered musket, is trying to look as stiff and cross as possible, being scandalised by his superior officer's defection from the path of duty, and still more by the irreverence of the black boy, who is dancing, grinning, snapping his fingers, in delight at having discovered and prevented the coming tragedy.

Tom descends, bowing courteously, apologises for having been absent when the highly distinguished gentleman arrived, and turning to the Bursch, begs him to transmit to his friend who has run away his apologies for the absurd mistake which had led him to, etc. etc.

The Polizeirath looks at him with much the same blank astonishment as the gendarme had done, and at last ends by lifting up his hands, and hursting into an enormous German laugh, and no one on earth can laugh as a German can, so genially and lovingly, and with such intense self-enjoyment.

'Oh, you English! you English! You are all mad, I think! Nothing can shame you, and nothing can frighten you! Potz! I believe when your Guards at Alma walked into that battery, the other day, every one of them was whistling your Jina Crow, even after he was shot dead!' And the jolly Polizeirath laughed at his own joke, till the mountain rang. 'But you must leave the country, sir, indeed you must. We cannot permit such conduct here—I am very sorry.'

'I entreat you not to apologise, sir. In any case, I was going to Alfay eight o'clock, to meet the steamer for Treves. I am on my way to the war in the East, via Marseilles. If you would, therefore, be so kind as to allow the gendarme to return me that second revolver, which also belongs to me —'

'Give him his pistol!' shouted the magistrate. 'Potz! Let us be rid of him at any cost, and live in peace, like honest Germans. Ah, poor Queen Victoria! What a lot! To have the government of five-and-twenty million such!'

'Not five and twenty millions,' says Sabina. 'That would include the Indies, and we no not mind too, surely, your Excellency?'

The Polizeirath likes to be called your Excellency, of course, or any other mighty title which does or does not belong to him, and that Sabina knows full well.

'Ah, my dear madam, how do I know that? The English ladies do every day here what no other dames would dare or dream—what then must you be at home? Ah! your poor husbands!'

'Mr Thurnall!' calls Marie, from behind. 'Mr Thurnall!'

Tom comes with a quaint, dogged smile on his face.

'You see him, Mr Stangrave! You see the man who risked for me liberty, life—who rescued me from slavery, shame, suicide—who was to me a brother, a father, for years!—without whose disinterested heroism you would never have set eyes on the free which you pretend to love. And you repay him by suspicion—maudit. Apologise to him now! Ask his pardon now, here, utterly, humbly, or never speak to Marie Lavington again!'

Tom looked first at her, and then at Stangrave. Marie was convulsed with excitement, her thin cheeks were crimson, her eyes flashed very flame. Stangrave was pale—calm outwardly, but evidently not within. He was looking on the ground, in thought so intense that he hardly seemed to hear Marie. Poor fellow! he had heard enough in the last ten minutes to boggle his brain.

At last he seemed to have strung himself for an effort, and spoke, without looking up.

'Mr Thurnall!'

'Sir!'

'I have done you a great wrong!'

'We will say no more about it, sir. It was a mistake, and I do not wish to complicate the question. My true ground of quarrel with you is your conduct to Miss Lavington. She seems to have told you her true name, so I shall call her by it.'

'What I have done, I have undone!' said Stangrave, looking up. 'If I have wronged her, I have offered to right her, if I have left her, I have sought her again, and if I left her when I knew nothing, now that I know all, I ask her here, before you, to become my wife!'

Tom looked inquiringly at Marie.

'Yes, I have told him all—all!' and she hid her face in her hands.

'Well,' said Tom, 'Mr Stangrave is a very enviable person, and the match, in a worldly point of view, is a most fortunate one for Miss Lavington, and that stupid moral of a gentleman has broken my resolve.'

'But I have not accepted him,' cried Marie, 'and I will not, unless you give me leave.'

Tom saw Stangrave's brow lower, and per-doubly enough, at this.

'My dear Miss Lavington, as I have never been able to settle my own love affairs satisfactorily to myself, I do not feel at all competent to settle other people's. Good-bye. I shall be late for the steamer.' And, bowing to Stangrave and Marie, he turned to go.

'Sabina! stop him!' cried she, 'he is going, without even a kind word!'

'Sabina,' whispered Tom as he passed her, 'a bad business—selfish coxcomb, when his beauty goes, won't stand her temper and her slightness, but I know you and Claude will take care of the poor thing, if anything happens to me.'

'You're wrong—prejudiced—indeed!'

'Tut, tut, tut! Good-bye, you sweet little sunbeam. Good morning, gentlemen!'

And Tom hurried up the slope and out of sight, while Marie burst into an agony of weeping.

'Gone, without a kind word!'

Stangrave bit his lip, not in anger, but in mainly self-reproach.

'It is my fault, Marie! my fault! He knew me too well of old, and had too much reason to despise me! But he shall have reason no longer. He will come back, and find me worthy of you, and all will be forgotten. Again I say it, I accept your quest, for life and death. So help me God above, as I will not fail or falter, till I have won justice for you and for your race, Marie!'

He conquered how could he but conquer, for he was man and she was woman, and he looked more noble in her eyes, while he was confessing his past weakness, than he had ever done in his proud assertion of strength.

But she spoke no word in answer. She let him take her hand, pass her arm through his, and lead her away, as one who had a right.

They walked down the hill behind the rest of the party, blest, but silent and pensive, he with the weight of the future, she with that of the past.

'It is very wonderful,' she said at last. 'Wonderful . . . that you can care for me.'

Oh, if I had known how noble you were, I should have told you all at once.'

'Perhaps I should have been as ignoble as ever,' said Stangrave, 'if that young English viscount had not put me on my mettle by his own nobleness.'

'No! no! Do not belie yourself. You know what he does not—what I would have died sooner than tell him.'

Stangrave drew the arm closer through his, and clasped the hand. Marie did not withdraw it.

'Wonderful, wonderful love!' she said, quite humbly. Her theatre passionateness had passed—

Now, but pure womanly.'

'That you can love me—me, the slave, me, the scourged, the scarred. Oh, Stangrave! it is not much—not much really, only a little mark or two.'

'I will prize them,' he answered, smiling through tears, 'more than all your loveliness. I will see in them God's commandment to me, written not on tables of stone, but on fair, pure, noble flesh. My Marie! You shall have cause even to rejoice in them!'

'I glory in them now, for, without them, I never should have known all your worth.'

The next day Stangrave, Marie, and Sabina were homing home to England, while Tom Thurnall was homing to Marseilles, to vanish Eastward Ho!

He has escaped once more—but his heart is hardened still. What will his fall be like?

CHAPTER XXVIII

LAST CHRISTMAS EVE

AND now two years and more are past and gone, and all whose lot it was have come Westward. No once more, sadder and wiser men to their lives' end, save one or two, that is, from whom not even Solomon's pestle and mortar discipline would pound out the innate folly.

Frank has come home stouter and browner, as well as heartier and wiser, than he went forth. He is Valentia's husband now, and rector, not curate, of Abernethy town; and Valentia makes him a noble rector's wife.

She, too, has had her sad experiences—of more than absent love, for when the news of Inkerman arrived, she was sitting by Lucia's deathbed, and when the ghastly list came home, and with it the news of Scoutlash 'severely wounded by a musket-ball,' she had just taken her last look of the fair face, and seen in fancy the fair spirit greeting in the eternal world the soul of him whom she loved unto the death. She had hurried out to Scutari, to nurse her brother, had seen there many a night—she best knows what she saw. She sent Scoutlash back to the Crimea, to try his chance once more, and then came home to be a mother to those three orphan children, from whom she vowed never to part. So the children went with Frank and her to Aberlona, and Valentin had learnt half a mother's duties ere she had a baby of her own.

And thus to her, as to all hearts, has the war brought a discipline from heaven.

Frank shrank at first from returning to Aberlona, when Scoutlash offered him the living on old St. Just's death. But Valentin all but commanded him, so he went—and behold, his return was a triumph.

All was understood now, all forgiven, all forgotten, save his conduct in the cholera, by the loving, honest, brave West-country hearts, and when the new married pair were rung into the town, amid cheers and greetings, flags and laurels, the first man to welcome Frank into his rectory was old Tardew.

Not a word of repentance or apology ever passed the old bull-dog's lips. He was an Englishman, and kept his opinions to himself. But he had had his lesson like the rest, two years ago, in his young daughter's death, and Frank had therefore no faster friend than old Tardew.

Frank is still as High Church as ever, and likes all pomp and circumstance of worship. Some few things he has given up, certainly, for fear of giving offence, but he might indulge them once more, if he wished, without a quarrel. For now that the people understand him, he does just what he likes. His congregation is the best in the archdeaconry, one meeting-house is dead, and the other dying. His choir is admirable, for Valentin has had the art of drawing to her all the musical talent of the tuneful West-country folk, and all that he needs, he thinks, to make his parish perfect, is to see Grace Harvey schoolmistress once more.

What can have worked the change? It is difficult to say, unless it be that Frank has found out, from cholera and hospital experiences, that his parishioners are beings of like passions with himself, and found out, too, that his business is to leave the gospel of damnation to those whose hapless lot it is to earn their bread by pandering to popular superstition, and to employ his independent position, as a free rector, in telling his people the gospel of salvation—that they have a Father in heaven.

Fattle Scoutlash comes down often to Aberlona now, and often to his Irish estates. He is going to marry the Manchester lady after all, and to settle down, and try to be a good landlord, and use for the benefit of his tenants the sharp experience of human hearts, human sorrows, and human duty, which he gained in the Crimea two years ago.

And Major Campbell?

Look on Cathcart's Hill. A stone is there, which is the only earthly token of that great experience of all experiences which Campbell gained two years ago.

A little silk bag was found, hung round his neck, and lying next his heart. He seemed to have expected his death, for he had put a label on it—

'To be sent to Viscount Scoutlash for Miss St. Just.'

Scoutlash sent it home to Valentin, who opened it, blind with tears.

It was a note, written seven years before, but not by her, by Lucia ere her marriage. A simple invitation to dinner in Eaton Square, written for Lady Knockdown, but with a postscript from Lucia herself: 'Do come, and I will promise not to tease you as I did last night.'

That was, perhaps, the only kind or familiar word which he had ever had from his idol, and he had treasured it to the last. Women can love, as this book sets forth—but now and then men can love too, if they be men, as Major Campbell was.

And Trebooze of Trebooze?

Even Trebooze got his new lesson two years ago. Terrified into sobriety, he went into the militia, and soon took delight therein. He worked, for the first time in his life, early and late, at a work which was suited for him. He soon learnt not to swear and rage, for his men would not stand it, and not to get drunk, for his messmates would not stand it. He got into better society and better health than he ever had had before. With new self-discipline has come new self-respect, and he tells his wife frankly, that if he keeps straight henceforth, he has to thank for it his six months at Alder shot.

And Mary?

When you meet Mary in heaven, you can ask her there.

But Frank's desire, that Grace should become his schoolmistress once more, is not fulfilled.

How she worked at Scutari and at Balaklava, there is no need to tell. Why mark her out from the rest, when all did more than nobly? 'The lesson which she needed was not that which hospitals could teach, she had learnt that already. It was a deeper and more dreadful lesson still. She had set her heart on finding Tom, on righting him, on righting herself. She had to learn to be content not to find him, not to right him, not to right herself.'

And she learnt it. Fearless, unconquering, she 'trusted in God, and made no haste.' She did her work, and read her Bible, and read too, again and again, at stolen moments of rest, a book which some one lent her, and which was to her as the finding of an unknown sister—

Longfellow's Evangeline. She was Evangeline, seeking as she sought, perhaps to find as she found—'No! merciful God!' Not so! yet better so than not at all. And often and often, when a new freight of agony was landed, she looked round from bed to bed, if his face, too, might be there. And once, at Balaklava, she knew she saw him—but not on a sick-bed.

Standing beneath the window, chatting merrily with a group of officers—It was he! Could she mistake that figure, though the face was turned away?

Her head swam, her pulses beat like church bells, her eyes were ready to burst from their sockets. But—she was assisting at an operation. It was God's will, and she must endure.

When the operation was over, she darted wildly down the stairs without a word. He was gone.

Without a word she came back to her work, and possessed her soul in patience.

Inquiries, indeed, she made, as she had a right to do, but no one knew the name. She questioned, and caused to be questioned, men from Varna, from Sevastopol, from Kertch, from the Circassian coast, English, French, and Sardinian, Pole and Turk. No one had ever heard the name. She even found at last, and questioned, one of the officers who had formed that group beneath the window.

'Oh! that man! He was a Pole, Michałowski, or some such name. At least, so he said, 'till he suspected the man to be really a Russian spy.'

Grace knew that it was Tom, but she went back to her work again, and in due time went home to England.

Home, but not to Aberlona. She presented herself one day at Mark Arnsworth's house in Whitbury, and humbly begged him to obtain her a place as servant to old Dr. Thurnall. What her purpose was therein she did not explain, perhaps she hardly knew herself.

Jane, the old servant who had clung to the doctor through his reverses, was growing old and feeble, and was all the more jealous of an intruder—but Grace disarmed her.

'I do not want to interfere, I will be under your orders. I will be kitchen-maid—maid-of-all-work. I want no wages. I have brought home a little money with me, enough to last me for the little while I shall be here.'

And, by the help of Mark and Mary, she took up her abode in the old man's house, and ere a month was past she was to him as a daughter.

Perhaps she had told him all. At least, there was some deep and pure confidence between them, and yet one which, so perfect was Grace's humility, did not make old Jane jealous. Grace cooked, swept, washed, went to and fro as Jane bade her, submitted to all her grumbings and tossings, and then came at the old man's bidding to read to him every evening, her hand in his, her voice cheerful, her face full of quiet light. But her hair was becoming streaked with gray. Her face, howsoever gentle, was sharpened, as if with continual pain. No wonder, for she had worn that belt next her heart for now two years and more, till it had almost eaten into the heart above which it lay. It gave her perpetual pain, and yet that pain was a perpetual joy—a perpetual remembrance of him, and of that walk with him from Tolehard's fidem.

Mary loved her—taunted to treat her as an equal—to call her sister—but Grace drew back lovingly, but humbly, from all advances, for she had divined Mary's secret with the quick eye of woman, she saw how Mary grew daily paler, thinner, sadder, and knew for whom she mourned. Be it so, Mary had a right to him, and she had none.

And where was Tom Thurnall all the while? No man could tell.

Mark inquired, Lord Munchamptstead inquired, great personages who had need of him at home and abroad inquired, but all in vain.

A few knew, and told Lord Munchamptstead, who told Mark, in confidence, that he had been heard of last in the Circassian mountains, about Christmas 1854, but since then all was blank. He had vanished into the infinite unknown.

Mark swore that he would come home some day, but two full years were past, and Tom came not.

The old man never seemed to regret him, never mentioned his name after a while.

'Mark,' he said once, 'remember David. Why weep for the child? I shall go to him, but he will not come to me.'

None knew, meanwhile, why the old man needed not to talk of Tom to his friends and neighbours, it was because he and Grace never talked of anything else.

So they had lived, and so they had waited, till that week before last Christmas Day, when Mellot and Staungrave made their appearance in Whitbury, and became Mark Arnsworth's guests.

The weeks slipped on. Staungrave hunted on alternate days, and on the others went with Claude, who photographed (when there was sun to do it with) Staungrave End, and Whitford Priory, interiors and exteriors, not forgetting the Staungrave monuments in Whitbury Church, and sat, too, for many a pleasant hour with the good doctor, who took to him at once, as all men did. It seemed to give fresh life to the old man to listen to Tom's dearest friend. To him, as to Grace, he could talk openly about the lost son, and live upon the memory of his prowess and his virtues, and ere the week was out, the doctor, and Grace too, had heard a hundred gallant feats, to tell all which would add another volume to this book.

And Grace stood silently by the old man's chair, and drank all in without a smile, without a sigh, but not without full many a prayer.

It is the blessed Christmas Eve, the light 14 falling fast, when down the High Street comes the mighty Roman-nosed rat-tail which carries Mark's portly bulk, and by him Stangrave, on a right good horse.

They shoo on side by side—not home, but to the doctor's house. For every hunting evening Mark's groom meets him at the doctor's door to lead the horses home, while he, before he will take his bath and dress, brings to his blind friend the gossip of the field, and details to him every joke, fence, find, kill, hap, and mishap of the last six hours.

The old man, meanwhile, is sitting quietly, with Claude by him, talking as Claude can talk. They are not speaking of Tim just now, but the eloquent artist's conversation suits well enough the temper of the good old man, yearning after fresh knowledge, even on the brink of the grave—but too feeble now, in body, and in mind, to do more than listen. Claude is telling him about the late Photographic Exhibition, and the old man listens with a triumphant smile to wonders which he will never behold with mortal eyes. At last

'This is very pleasant to feel surer and surer, day by day, that one is not needed, that science moves forward swift and sure, under a higher guidance than one's own, that the sacred torch-race never can stand still, that He has taken the lamp out of old and failing hands, only to put it into young and brave ones, who will not falter till they reach the goal.'

Then he lies back again, with closed eyes, waiting for more facts from Claude.

'How beautiful!' says Claude. 'I must compliment you, sir—to see the childlike heart thus still beating fresh beneath the honours of the gray head, without envy, without vanity, without ambition, welcoming every new discovery, rejoicing to see the young outstripping them.'

'And what credit, sir, to us? Our knowledge did not belong to us, but to Him who made us, and the universe, and our sons' belonged to Him likewise. If they be wiser than their teachers, it is only because they, like their teachers, have made His testimonies their study. When we rejoice in the progress of science, we rejoice not in ourselves, not in our children, but in God our Instructor.'

And all the while, hidden in the gloom behind, stands Grace, her arms folded over her bosom, watching every movement of the old man, and listening, too, to every word. She can understand but little of it—but she loves to hear it, for it reminds her of Tom Thynall. Above all she loves to hear about the mirrors' case, a mystery inseparable in her thoughts from him who first showed her its wonders.

At last the old man speaks again—

'Ah! How delighted my boy will be when he returns, to find that so much has been done during his absence.'

Claude is silent awhile, startled.

'You are surprised to hear me speak so confidently? Well, I can only speak as I feel. I have had, for some days past, a presentiment—you will think me, doubtless, weak for yielding to it. I am not superstitious.'

'Not so,' said Claude, 'but I cannot deny that such things as presentiments may be possible. However miraculous they may seem, are they so very much more so than the daily fact of memory? I can as little guess why we can remember the past as why we may not, at times, be able to foresee the future.'

'True. You speak, if not like a physician, yet like a metaphysician, so you will not laugh at me, and compel the weak old man and his fancy to take refuge with a girl—who is not weak. Grace, darling, you think still that he is coming?'

She came forward and leaned over him.

'Yes,' she half-whispered. 'He is coming soon to us—or else we are soon going to him. It may mean that, sir. Perhaps it is better that it should.'

'It matters little, child, if he be near, as near he is. I tell you, Mr. Mellot, this conviction has become so intense during the last week, that—that I believe I should not be thrown off my balance if he entered at this moment. I feel him so near me, sir, that—that I could swear, did not I know how the weak brain imitates expected sounds, that I heard his footstep outside now.'

'I heard horse's footsteps,' says Claude. 'Ah, there come Stangrave and our host.'

'I heard them—but I heard my boy's likewise,' said the old man quietly.

The next minute he seemed to have forgotten the fancy, as the two hunters entered, and Mark began open-mouthed as usual—

'Well, Ned! In good company, eh? That's right. Mortal cold I am! We shall have a white Christmas, I expect. Snow's coming.'

'What sport?' asked the doctor blandly.

'Oh! Nothing new. Bothered about Sudric stone till one got away at last with an old fox, and over the downs into the vale. I think Mr. Stangrave liked it.'

'Mr. Stangrave likes the vale better than the vale likes him. I have fallen into two brooks following, Claude, to the delight of all the desperate Englishmen.'

'Oh! You rode straight enough, sir! You must pay for your fun in the vale—but then you have your fun. But there were a good many falls the last ten minutes—ground heavy, and pace awful, old rat-tail had enough to do to hold his own. Saw one fellow ride bang into a pollard-willow, when there was an open gate close to him—cut his cheek open and lay, but some one said it was only Smith of Ewebury, so I rode on.'

'I hope you English showed more pity to your wounded friends in the Crimea,' quoth Stangrave, laughing. 'I wanted to stop and pick him up—but Mr. Arnsworth would not hear of it.'

'Oh, sir, if it had been a stranger like you, half the field would have been round you in a minute—but Smith don't count—he breaks his neck on purpose three days a week. By the bye, doctor, got a good story of him for you. Suspected his keepers last month. Slips out of bed at two in the morning, into his own covers, and blazes away for an hour. Nobody comes. Home to bed, and tries the same thing next night. Not a soul comes near him. Next morning has up keepers, watchers, beaters, the whole posse, and "Now, you rascals! I've been poaching my own covers two nights running, and you've been all drunk in bed. There are your wages to the last penny, and vanish! I'll be my own keeper henceforth, and never let me see your faces again!"

The old doctor laughed cheerily. "Well, but did you kill your tax?"

"All right—but it was a burster—just what I always tell Mr. Stangrave. Afternoon runs are good runs, pretty sure of an empty fox and a good scent after one o'clock."

"Exactly," answered a fresh voice from behind, "and fox-hunting is an epitome of human life. You chop in lose your first two or three—but keep up your pluck, and you'll run into one before sundown, and I seem to have run into a whole cartful!"

All looked round, for all knew that voice.

Yes! There he was, in bodily flesh and blood, thin, mallow, backed to the eyes, dressed in ragged sailor's clothes—but Tom himself.

Grace uttered a long, low, soft, half-laughing cry, full of the delicious agony of sudden relief, a cry as of a mother when her child is born, and then slipped from the room past the unheeding Tom, who had no eyes but for his father. Straight up to the old man he went, took both his hands, and spoke in the old cheerful voice—

"Well, my dear old daddy! So you seem to have expected me, and gathered, I suppose, all my friends to bid me welcome. I'm afraid I have made you very anxious—but it was not my fault, and I knew you would be certain I should come at last, eh?"

"My son! my son! Let me feel whether thou be my very son Esau or not!" murmured the old man, hiding half-playful expression in the words of Scripture, for feelings beyond his failing powers.

Tom knelt down—and the old man passed his hands in silence over and over the forehead, and face, and beard, while all stood silent.

Mark Arnsworth burst out blubbing like a great boy—

"I said so! I always said so! The devil could not kill him, and God wouldn't!"

"You won't go away again, dear boy? I'm getting old—and forgetful, and I don't think I could hear it again, you see."

Tom saw that the old man's powers were failing. "Never again, as long as I live, daddy!" said he, and then, looking round—"I think that we are too many for my father. I will come and shake hands with you all presently."

"No, no," said the doctor. "You forget that I cannot see you, and so must only listen to you."

It will be a delight to hear your voice and theirs;—they all love you!"

A few moments of breathless congratulation followed, during which Mark had seized Tom by both his shoulders, and held him admiringly at arm's length.

"Look at him, Mr. Mellot! Mr. Stangrave! Look at him!" As they said of Liberty Wilkes, you might rob him, strip him, and hit him over London Bridge—and you find him the next day in the same place, with a lined coat, a sword by his side, and money in his pocket! But how did you come in without our knowing?"

"I waited outside, afraid of what I might hear—for how could I tell?" and he, lowering his voice, "but when I saw you go in, I knew all was right, and followed you, and when I heard my father laugh, I knew that he could bear a little surprise. But, Stangrave, did you say? Ah! this is too delightful, old fellow! How's Marie and the children?"

Stangrave, who was very uncertain as to how Tom would receive him, had been about to make his amuse honorable in a fashion grateful, magnificent, and, as he expressed it afterwards laughingly to Thornall himself, "altogether highfalutin!" but whatsoever chivalrous and courtly words had arranged themselves upon the tip of his tongue, were so utterly upset by Tom's matter-of-fact bonhomie, and by the cool way in which he took for granted the fact of his marriage, that he burst out laughing, and caught both Tom's hands in his—

"It is delightful, and all it needs to make it perfect is to have Marie and the children here."

"How many?" asked Tom.

"Two."

"Is she as beautiful as ever?"

"More so, I think."

"I dare say you're right, you might to know best, certainly."

"You shall judge for yourself. She is in London at this moment."

"Tom!" says his father, who has been sitting quietly, his face covered in his handkerchief, listening to all, while holy tears of gratitude steal down his face.

"Sir!"

"You have not spoken to Grace yet!"

"Grace!" cries Tom, in a very different tone from that in which he had yet spoken.

"Grace Harvey, my boy. She was in the room when you came in."

"Grace! Grace! What is she doing here?"

"Nursing him, like an angel as she is!" said Mark.

"She is my daughter now, Tom, and has been these twelve months past."

Tom was silent, as one astonished.

"If she is not, she will be soon," said he quietly, between his clenched teeth. "Gentlemen, if you'll excuse me for five minutes, and see to my father"—and he walked straight out of the room, closing the door behind him to find Grace waiting in the passage.

She was trembling from head to foot, stepping to and fro, her hands and face all but convulsed, her left hand over her bosom, clutching at her dress, which seemed to have been just disarranged, her right drawn back, holding something, her lips parted, struggling to speak, her great eyes opened to preternatural wideness, fixed on him with an intensity of eagerness, — was she mad?

At last words bubbled forth. 'There! there! There it is! — the belt! your belt! Take it! take it, I say!'

He stood silent and wondering, she thrust it into his hand.

'Take it! I have carried it for you worn it next my heart, till it has all but eaten into my heart. To Vania, and you were not there! — Sventur, Balaklava, and you were not there! — I bound it only a week after! — I told you I should! and you were gone! (Noel, not to wait! And Mr. Amisworth has the money — every farthing and the gold — he has had it these two years!'

I would give you the belt myself, and now I have done it, and the snake is unclasped from my heart at last, at last, at last!'

Her arms dropped by her side, and she burst into an agony of tears.

Tom caught her in his arms — but she put him back, and looked up in his face again.

'Promise me!' she said, in a low clear voice, 'promise me this one thing only, as you are a gentleman, as you have a man's pity, a man's gratitude, in you —'

'Anything!'

'Promise me that you will never ask, or seek to know, who had that ball!'

'I promise! — but, Grace —'

'Then my work is over,' said she in a calm collected voice. 'Amen! So lettest thou thy servant depart in peace. Good bye, Mr. Thurnall! I must go and pack up my few things now. You will forgive and forget!'

'Grace!' cried Tom, 'stay!' and he girdled her in a grasp of iron. 'You and I never part more in this life, perhaps not in all lives to come!'

'No! — I! let me! — I am not worthy of you!'

'I have heard that once already, the only folly which ever came out of those sweet lips. No, (No! — I love you, as much as I love but once, and you shall not refuse me! You will not have the heart, Grace! You will not dare, Grace! For you have begun the work, and you must finish it!'

'Work! What work?'

'I don't know,' said Tom. 'How should I? I want you to tell me that!'

She looked up in his face, puzzled. His old self-confident look seemed strangely past away.

'I will tell you,' he said, 'because I love you. I don't like to show it to them, but I've been frightened, Grace, for the first time in my life!'

She paused for an explanation, but she did not struggle to escape from him.

'Frightened, beat, run to earth myself, though I talked so bravely of running others to earth just now. (Grace, I've been in prison!'

'In prison! In a Russian prison! Oh, Mr. Thurnall!'

'Ay, Grace, I'd tried everything but that, and I could not stand it. Death was a joke to that. Not to be able to get out! — To rage up and down for hours like a wild beast, — long to fly at one's gaoler and tear his heart out, — beat one's head against the wall in the hope of knocking one's brains out, — anything to get rid of that horrid notion, night and day over one — I can't get out!'

Grace had never seen him so excited.

'But you are safe now,' said she soothingly.

'Oh, those brutal Russians!'

'But it was not Russians! — if it had been, I could have borne it. That was all in my bargain, the fair chance of war, but to be shot up by a rustlike! at the very outset, too by a boorish villain of a khin, on a drunken suspicion, — a fellow whom I was trying to save, and who wouldn't, or wouldn't, or damn't under stand me. Oh, Grace I was caught in my own trap! I went out full blown with self conceit. Never was any one so cunning as I was to be! — Such a game as I was going to play, and make my fortune by it! And this brute to stop me short — to make a fool of me — to keep me there eighteen months threatening to cut my head off once a quarter, and wouldn't understand me, let me talk with the tongue of the old serpent!'

'He did not stop you — God stopped you!'

'You're right, Grace, I saw that at last! I found out that I had been lying for years which was the stronger. God or I, I found out I had been lying whether I could not do well enough without Him — and there I found that I could not, Grace, could not! I felt like a child who had marched off from home, fancying it can find its way, and is lost at once! I felt like a lost child in Aushdu once, for one moment — but not as I felt in that prison — for I had not heard you, Grace, then! I did not know that I had a Father in heaven, who had been looking after me, when I fancied that I was looking after myself, — I don't half believe it now — If I did, I should not have lost my nerve as I have done! — Grace, I dare hardly stir about now, lest some harm should come to me! I fancy at every turn, what if that chimney fell? what if that horse kicked out? — and, Grace, you, and you only, can cure me of my new cowardice! I said in that prison, and all the way home, — If I can but find her! let her but see her — ask her — let her teach me, and I shall be sure! Let her teach me, and I shall be brave again! Teach me, Grace! and forgive me!'

Grace was looking at him with her great soft eyes opening slowly, like a startled hound's, as if the wonder and delight were too great to be taken in at once. The last words unlocked her lips.

'Forgive you? What? Do you forgive me?'

'You! It is I am the brute, ever to have suspected you! My conscience told me all along I was a brute! And you — have you not proved it to me in this last minute, Grace!—proved to me that I am not worthy to kiss the dust from off your feet!’

Grace lay silent in his arms but her eyes were fixed upon him, her hands were folded on her bosom, her lips moved as if in prayer.

He put back her long tresses tenderly, and looked into her deep glorious eyes.

‘There! I have told you all. Will you forgive my baseness, and take me, and teach me, about this Father in heaven, through poverty and wealth, for better, for worse, as my wife my wife?’

She leapt up at him suddenly as if waking from a dream, and wreathed her arms about his neck.

‘Oh, Mr Thurnall! my dear, brave, wise, wonderful Mr Thurnall! come home again!—home to God!—and home to me! I am not worthy! Too much happiness, too much, too much—but you will forgive, will you not,—and forget—forget!’

And so the old heart passed away from THOMAS THURNALL and instead of it grew up a heart like his father’s, even the heart of a little child.

TO THOMAS WRIGHT, ESQ, F S A, ETC ETC

MY DEAR WRIGHT,

Thus does Hereward, the hero of your youth, reappear at last in a guise fitted for a modern drawing-room. To you is due whatever new renown he may win for himself in that new field. You first disinterred him, long ago, when scarcely a hand or foot of him was left standing out from beneath the dust of ages. You taught me, since then, how to furlish his rusty harness, botch his hursten saddle, and send him forth once more, upon the ghost of his gallant mare. Truly he should feel obliged to you, and though we cannot believe that the last infirmity of noble minds endures beyond the grave, or that any touch of his old vanity still stains the spirit of the mighty Wake, yet we will please ourselves --why should we not!-- with the fancy that he is as grateful to you as I am this day.

Yours faithfully,

C. KINGSLEY.

HERWARD THE WAKE

'LAST OF THE ENGLISH'

PRELUDE

OF THE FEN

THE heroic deeds of highlanders, both in these islands and elsewhere, have been told in verse and prose, and not more often, nor more loudly, than they deserve. But we must remember, now and then, that there have been heroes like wise in the lowland, and in the fen. Why, however, poets have so seldom sung of them, why no historian, save Mr Motley in his Rise of the Dutch Republic, has condescended to tell the tale of their mighty deeds, is a question not difficult to answer.

In the first place, they have been fewer in number. The lowlands of the world, being the richest spots, have been generally the soonest conquered, the soonest civilised, and therefore the soonest taken out of the sphere of romance and wild adventure into that of order and law, hard work and common sense, as well as—too often—into the sphere of slavery, cowardice, luxury, and ignoble greed. The lowland populations, for the same reasons, have been generally the first to deteriorate, though not on account of the vices of civilisation. The vices of incivilisation are far worse, and far more destructive of human life, and it is just because they are so, that rude tribes deteriorate physically less than polished nations. In the savage struggle for life, none but the strongest, healthiest, cunningest, have a chance of living, prospering and propagating their race. In the civilised state, on the contrary, the weakest and the silliest, protected by law, religion, and humanity, have their chance likewise, and transmit to their offspring their own weakness or silliness. In these islands, for instance, at the time of the Norman Conquest, the average of man was doubtless superior, both in body and mind, to the average of man now, simply because the weaklings could not have lived at all; and the rich and delicate beauty, in which the women of the Eastern Counties still surpass all other races in these isles, was doubtless far more common in proportion to the numbers of the population.

Another reason why lowland heroes 'carent vate sacro,' is that the lowlands and those who live in them are wanting in the poetic and romantic elements. There is in the lowland none of that background of the unknown, fantastic, magical, terrible, perpetually feeding curiosity and wonder, which still remains in the Scottish highlands, and which, when it disappears from thence, will remain embalmed for ever in the pages of Walter Scott. Against that half-magical background his heroes stand out in vivid relief, and justly so. It was not put there by him for stage purposes, it was there as a fact, and the men of whom he wrote were conscious of it, were moulded by it, were not ashamed of its influence. For nature among the mountains is too fierce, too strong for man. He cannot conquer her, and she awes him. He cannot dig down the cliffs, or chain the storm blasts, and his fear of them takes bodily shape. He begins to people the weird places of the earth with weird beings, and sees nixes in the dark fens as he fishes by night, dwarfs in the caves where he digs, half-trembling, morsels of iron and copper for his weapons, witches and demons on the snow-blast which overwhelms his herd and his hut, and in the dark clouds which brood on the untrodden mountain peak. He lives in fear and yet, if he be a valiant-hearted man, his fears do him little harm. They may break out, at times, in witch manias, with all their horrible suspicions, and thus breed cruelty, which is the child of fear; but on the whole they rather produce in man thoughtfulness, reverence, a sense, confused yet precious, of the boundless importance of the unseen world. His superstitious develop his imagination, the moving accidents of a wild life call out in him sympathy and pathos, and the mountaineer becomes instinctively a poet.

The lowlander, on the other hand, has his own strength, his own 'virtues,' or manfulnesses, in the good old sense of the word; but they are not for the most part picturesque, or even poetical.

He finds out, soon enough for his weal and his bane, that he is stronger than nature and right tyrannously and irreverently he lords it over her, clearing, delving, dyking, building, without fear or shame. He knows of no natural force greater than himself, save an occasional thunderstorm, and against that, as he grows more cunning, he ensures his crops. Why should he reverence nature? Let him use her, and live by her. One cannot blame him. Man was sent into the world (so says the Scopdaro) to fill and subdue the earth. But he was sent into the world for other purposes also, which the lowlander is but too apt to forget. With the awe of nature, the awe of the unseen dies out in him. Meeting with no visible superior, he is apt to become not merely impious and irreverent, but somewhat of a sensualist and an atheist. The sense of the beautiful dies out in him more and more. He has little or nothing around him to refine or lift up his soul, and unless he meet with a religion, and with a civilisation which can deliver him, he may sink into that dull brutality which is too common among the lowest classes of the English lowlands, and remain for generations gilded with the strength and industry of the ox, and with the courage of the lion, but, alas! with the intellect of the former and the self-restraint of the latter.

Nevertheless, there may be a period in the history of a lowland race when they, too, become historic for a while. There was such a period for the men of the Eastern and Central Counties for they proved it by their deeds.

When the men of Wessex, the once conquering, and even to the last the most civilised, race of Britain, fell at Hastings once and for all, and struck no second blow, then the men of the Danelagh disdained to yield to the Norman invader. For seven long years they held their own, not knowing, like true Englishmen, when they were beaten, and fought on desperate, till there were none left to fight. Then bones lay white on every island in the fens, then corpses rotted on gallows beneath every Norman keep, then few survivors crawled into manasteries, with eyes pucked out, hands and feet cut off, or took to the wild wood as strong outlaws, like their successors and representatives, Robin Hood, Scarlet, and Little John, Adam Bell, and Glyn of the Clough, and William of Clonteske. But they never really bent their necks to the Norman yoke, they kept alive in their hearts that proud spirit of personal independence which they brought with them from the moors of Denmark and the dales of Norway, and they kept alive, too, though in abeyance for a while, those free institutions which were without a doubt the germs of our British liberty.

They were a changed folk since first they settled in that Danelagh, - since first in the days of King Beorntrix, 'in the year 787, three ships of Northmen came from Hferetha land, and the king's reeve rode to the place and would have driven them up to the kugg's town, for he knew not what men they were' but they slew him there and then', and after that the Saxons and Angles began to find out to their little bale what men they were, those fierce Vikings out of the dark north-east.

But they had long ceased to burn farms, sack convents, torture monks for gold, and slay every human being they met, in mere Berserker lust of blood. No Barnakill could now earn his meknamo by murdering his comrades, as they tossed the children on their spear-points, to 'Na kill the hams'. Gradually they had settled down on the land, intermarried with the Angles and Saxons, and colonised all England north and east of Wathing Street (a rough line from London to Chester), as far as the Tees.¹ Gradually they had deserted Thor and Odm for 'the white Christ', had their own priests and bishops, and built their own minsters. The convents which the fathers had destroyed, the sums, or at least the goldsmiths, rebuilt, and often casting away sword and axe, they entered them as monks themselves, and Peterborough, Ely, and above all Crowland, destroyed by them in Alfred's time with a horrible destruction, had become then holy places, where they decked the altars with gold and jewels, with silks from the far East, and furs from the far North, and where, as in sacred fortresses, they, and the liberty of England with them, made their last manful stand.

For a while they had been lords of all England. The Anglo-Saxon time was wearing out. The men of Wessex, priest-ridden and enslaved by their own aristocracy, quailed before the free Norsemen, among whom was not a single serf. The God-descended line of Cerdic and Alfred was exhausted. Vain, incapable, profligate kings, the tools of such prelates as Odo and Dunstan, were no match for such wild heroes as Thorkill the Tall, or Olaf Trygvasson, or Swend Forkbeard. The Danes had gradually scored not only their own Danelagh and Northumbria, but great part of Wessex. Vast sums of Danegelt were yearly sent out of the country to buy off the fresh invasions which were perpetually threatened. Then Ethelred the Unready, or, rather Evil counsel, advised himself to fulfil his name, and the curse which Dunstan had pronounced against him at the baptismal font. By his counsel the men of Wessex rose against the unrespecting Danes, and on St. Bruce's Eve, A.D. 1002, murdered them all, or nearly all, man, woman, and child. It may be that they only did to the children as the fathers had done to them, but the deed was 'worse than a crime, it was a mistake.' The Danes of the Danelagh and Northumbria, their brethren of Denmark and Norway, the Orkneys and the east coast of Ireland, remained unharmed. A mighty host of Vikings poured from thence into England the very next year, under Swend Forkbeard and the great Canute, and after thirteen fearful campaigns came the great battle of Assingdon in Essex, where 'Canute had the victory, and all the English nation fought against him, and all the nobility of the English race was there destroyed.'

That same year saw the mysterious death of Edmund Ironside, the last man of Cerdic's race worthy of the name. For the next twenty-five years Danish kings ruled from the Forth to the Land's End.

A noble figure he was, that great and wise Canute, the friend of the famous Godiva, and Leofric, Godiva's husband, and Godwin Ulfbiothsson, and Seward Digre, trying to expiate by justice and mercy the dark deeds of his hindstained youth, trying (and not in vain) to blend the two races over which he ruled, rebuilding the churches and monasteries which his father had destroyed, bringing back in state to Canterbury the body of Archbishop Elphege—not unjustly called by the Saxons martyr and saint—whom Tall Thorkill's men had murdered with beef bones and ox skulls, because he would not give up to them the money destined for God's poor, remarking, as every child has heard, his housewives' flattery by setting his chain on the hump of this rising tide, and then laying his golden crown, in token of humility, on the high altar of Winchester, never to wear it more. In Winchester he has homes unto this day, or what of them the civil wars have left, and by them he the bones of his son Harthacnut in whom, as in his half brother Harold Harefoot before him, the Danish power fell to swift decay, by insolence and drink and civil war, while with the Danish power England fell to pieces likewise.

Canute had divided England into four great earldoms, each ruled, under him, by a jarl, or earl, a Danish, not a Saxon title.

At his death in 1036 the earldoms of Northumbria and East Anglia—the more strictly Danish parts—were held by a true Danish hero, Seward Bunn, alias Digre, 'the Stout,' conqueror of Maelket and son of the Fairy Bear; proving his descent, men said, by his pointed and hairy ears.

Mercia, the great central plateau of England, was held by Earl Leofric, husband of the famous Lady Godiva.

Wessex, which Canute had at first kept in his own hands, had passed into those of the famous Earl Godwin, the then ablest man in England. Possessed of boundless tact and cunning, gifted with an eloquence which seems from the accounts remaining of it to have been rather that of a Greek than an Englishman, and married to Canute's niece,¹ he was fitted, alike by fortunes and by talents, to be the king-maker which he became.

Such a system may have worked well as long as the brain of a hero was there to overlook it all. But when that brain was turned to dust, the history of England became, till the Norman Conquest, little more than the history of the rivalries of the two great houses of Godwin and Leofric.

Leofric had the first success in king-making. He, though bearing a Saxon name, seems to have been the champion of the Danish party, and of Canute's son, or reputed son, Harold Harefoot, and he succeeded, by the help of the Danes north of Thames, and the fishermen of London, which city was more than half Danish in those days, in setting his puppet on the throne. But the blood of Canute had exhausted itself. Within seven years Harold Harefoot and Harthacnut, who succeeded him, had died as fully as they lived, and Godwin's turn had come.

He, though married to a Danish princess, and acknowledging his Danish connection by the Norse names which were borne by his three most famous sons, Harold, Sweyn, and Tostig, constituted himself (with a sound patriotic instinct) the champion of the men of Wessex and the house of Cerdic. He had probably counsel, or at least allowed, to be murdered, Alfred the Etheling, King Athelred's son and heir-apparent, when he was supporting the claims of Harthacnut against Harefoot, he now tried to atone for that crime (if indeed he actually committed it) by placing Alfred's youngest brother on the throne, to become at once his king, his son-in-law, and his puppet.

It had been well, perhaps, for England, had Godwin's power over Edward been even more complete than it actually was. The 'Confessor' was, if we are to believe the monks, unmixed virtue and piety, meekness and magnanimity, a model ruler of men. No wonder, therefore, that (according to William of Malmesbury) the happiness of his times (inward as he was both for miracles and the spirit of prophecy) was revealed in a dream to Brithnot, bishop of Winton, who made it public, for meditating in King Canute's time on the near extinction of the royal race of the English, he was rapt up on high, and saw St. Peter consecrating Edward king. 'His ohaste life also was pointed out, and the exact period of his reign (twenty-four years) determined, and when he inquired about his posterity, it was answered, "The kingdom of the English belongs to God. After Edward, He will provide a king according to His pleasure." But the conduct which earned him the title of Confessor was the direct cause of the Norman Conquest and the ruin of his people; while those who will look at facts will see in the holy king's character little but what is pitiable, and in his reign little but what is tragical —

Civil wars, invasions, outlawry of Godwin and his sons by the Danish and French parties, then of Alfgar, Leofric's son, by the Saxon party, the outlaws on either side attacking and plundering the English shores by the help of Norsemen, Welshmen, Irish, and Danes—any mercenaries who could be got together, and then—"In the same year Bishop Aldred consecrated the minster at Gloucester to the glory of God and of St. Peter, and then went to Jerusalem with such splendour as no man had displayed before him", and so forth. The sum and substance of what was done in those 'happy times' may be well described in the words of the Anglo-Saxon chronicler for the year 1058. 'This year Alfgar the earl was banished but he came in again with violence, through and at Griffin (the king of North Wales, his brother-in-law). And this year came a fleet from Norway. It is tedious to tell how these matters went.'—These were the normal phenomena of a reign which seemed to the eyes of chroniclers a holy and a happy one, because the king refused, whether from spite or superstition, to leave an heir to the house of Cerdic, and spent his time between prayer, hunting, the seeing of fancied visions, the uttering of fancied prophecies, and the performance of fancied miracles.

But there were excuses for him. An Englishman only in name, a Norman, not only by his mother's descent (she was aunt of William the Conqueror), but by his early education on the Continent, he loved the Norman better than the Englishman. Norman knights and clerks filled his court, and often the high dignities of his provinces, and returned as often as they were expelled, the Norman-French language became fashionable, Norman customs and manners the signs of civilisation, and thus all was preparing steadily for the great catastrophe, by which, within a year of Edward's death, the Norman became master of the land.

We have gained, doubtless, by that calamity. By it England and Scotland, and in due time Ireland, became integral parts of the county of Christendom, and partakers of that classic civilisation and learning, the fount wherof, for good or for evil, was Rome and the pope of Rome: but the method was at least wicked, the actors in it tyrannous, brutal, treacherous, hypocritical; and to say that so it must have been; that by no other method could the result (or some far better result) have been obtained—is it not to say that men's crimes are not merely overruled by, but necessary to, the gracious designs of Providence; and that—to speak plainly—the Deity has made this world so ill, that He is forced at times to do ill that good may come?

Against the new tyranny the freemen of the Danelagh and of Northumbria rose. If Edward the descendant of Cerdic had been little to them, William the descendant of Rollo was still less. That French-speaking knights should expel them from their homes, Frenchchanting monks from their convents, because Edward had promised the crown of England to William, his foreign cousin, or because Harold Godwinsson of Wessex had sworn on the relics of all the saints to be William's man, was contrary to their common sense of right and reason.

So they rose, and fought; too late, it may be, and without unity or purpose, and they were worsted by an enemy who had both unity and purpose, whom superstition, greed, and feudal discipline kept together, at least in England, in one compact body of unscrupulous and terrible confederates.

And theirs was a land worth fighting for—a good land and large from Humber mouth inland to the Trent and merry Sherwood, across to Chester and the Dee, round by Leicester and the five burghs of the Banas, eastward again to Huntingdon and Cambridge (then a poor village on the site of an old Roman town), and then northward again into the wide fens, the land of the Gyrvi, where the great central plateau of England slides into the sea, to form, from the rain and river washings of eight shires, lowlands of a fertility inexhaustible, because ever-growing to this day.

Into those fens, as into a natural fortress, the Anglo-Danish noblemen crowded down mustotively from the inland, to make their last stand against the French. Children of the old Vikings, or 'Crookers,' they took, in their great need, ^{from} the seaward and the estuaries, as other conquered races take to the mountains, and died, like their forefathers, within scent of the salt sea from whence they came.

They have a beauty of their own, these great fens, even now, when they are dyked and drained, tilled and fenced—a beauty as of the sea, of boundless expanse and freedom. Much more had they that beauty eight hundred years ago, when they were still, for the most part, as God had made them, or rather was making them even then. The low rolling uplands were clothed in primeval forest; oak and ash, beech and elm, with here and there perhaps a group of ancient pines, ragged and decayed, and fast dying out in England even then, though lingering still in the forests of the Scotch highlands.

Between the forests were open wolds, dotted with white sheep and golden gorse, rolling plains of rich though ragged turf, whether cleared by the hand of man or by the wild fires which often swept over the hills. And between the wood and the wold stood many a Danish 'town,' with its clusters of low straggling buildings round the holder's house, of stone or mud below, and of wood above, its high dykes round tiny fields, its flocks of sheep ranging on the wold, its herds of swine in the forest, and below—a more precious possession still—its herds of mares and colts, which fed with the cattle and the geese in the rich grass-fen.

For always, from the foot of the wolds, the green flat stretched away, illimitable, to an horizon where, from the roundness of the earth, the distant trees and islands were hulled down like ships at sea. The firm horse-fen lay, bright green, along the foot of the wold, beyond it, the browner peat, or deep fen, and, among that, dark velvet alder beds, long lines of reed-pond, emerald in spring and golden under the autumn sun, shining 'eas' or river-reaches, broad meres dotted with a million fowl, while the cattle waded along their edges after the rich sedge-grass, or wallowed in the mire through the hot summer's day. Here and there, too, upon the far horizon, rose a tall line of ash trees, marking some island of firm rich soil. In some of them, as at Ramsey and Crowland, the huge ashes had disappeared before the axes of the monks, and a minster tower rose over the fen, amid orchards, gardens, cornfields, pastures, with here and there a tree left standing for shade. 'Painted with flowers in the spring,' with 'pleasant shores embosomed in still lakes,' as the monk chronicler of Ramsey has it, those islands seemed to such as the monk terrestrial paradises.

Overhead the arch of heaven spread more ample than elsewhere, as over the open sea, and that vastness gave, and still gives, such cloudlands, such sunrises, such sunsets, as can be seen nowhere else within these isles. They might well have been star worshippers, those Gyrns, had their sky been as clear as that of the East, but they were like to have worshipped the clouds rather than the stars, according to the too universal law, that mankind worship the powers which do them harm, rather than the powers which do them good. Their priestly teachers, too, had darkened still further their notion of the world around, as accursed by sin, and swarming with evil spirits. The gods and fairies of their old mythology had been transformed by the Church into fiends, alluring or loathsome, but all alike destructive to man, against whom the soldier of God, the celibate monk, fought day and night with relics, Agnus Dei, and sign of Holy Cross.

And therefore the Danelagh men, who feared not mortal sword or axe, feared witches, ghosts, Puks, Wills-o'-the-Wisp, Werewolves, spirits of the wells and of the trees, and all dark, capricious, and harmful beings whom their fancy conjured up out of the wild, wet, and unwholesome marshes, or the dark wolf-haunted woods. For that fair land, like all things on earth, had its darker aspect. The foul exhalations of autumn called up fever and ague, crippling and enervating, and tempting, almost compelling, to that wild and desperate drinking which was the Scandinavian's special sin. Dark and sad were these short autumn days, when all the distances were shut off, and the air choked with foul brown fog and drenching rains from off the eastern sea, and pleasant the hurrying forth of the keen north-east wind, with all its whirling snow-storms. For though it sent men hurrying out into the storm, to drive the cattle in from the fen, and lift the sheep out of the snow-wreaths, and now and then never to return, lost in instant mire, in ice and snow,—yet all knew that after the snow would come the keen frost and bright sun and cloudless blue sky, and the tenant's yearly holiday, when, work being impossible, all gave themselves up to play, and swarmed upon the ice on skates and sledges, to run races, township against township, or visit old friends full forty miles away, and met everywhere faces as bright and ruddy as their own, cheered by the keen wine of that dry and bracing frost.

Such was the Fenland, hard, yet cheerful, rearing a race of hard and cheerful men, showing their power in old times in valiant fighting, and for many a century since in that valiant industry which has drained and embanked the land of the Gyrn, till it has become a very Garden of the Lord. And the highlander who may look from the promontory of Peterborough, the 'golden borough' of old time, or from that Witham on the Hill, which once was a farm of Hereward the Wake's, or from the tower of Crowland, while he and Torfrida sleep in the ruined nave beneath, or from the heights of that Isle of Ely which was so long the camp of refuge for English freedom, over the labyrinth of dykes and lodes, the squares of rich corn and verdure,—will confess that the lowlands, as well as the high lands, can at times breed gallant men.

Most gallant of them all, and their leader in the fatal struggle against William, was Hereward the Wake, Lord of Beornes, and ancestor of that family of Wake, the arms of whom appear at the beginning of this book. These, of course, are much later than the time of Hereward. Not so, probably, the badge of the 'Wake Knot,' in which (according to tradition) two monks' girdles are worked into the form of the letter W. It, and the motto 'Vigila et ora,' may well have been used by Hereward himself. I owe them (as I do unnumbered details and corrections) to the exceeding courtesy of that excellent antiquary, the Rev. E. Trollope, of Leasingham, in those parts.

Hereward's pedigree is a matter of no importance, save to a few antiquaries, and possibly to his descendants, the ancient and honourable house of the Wakes. But as I have, in this story, followed facts as strictly as I could, altering none which I found, and inventing little more than was needed to give the story coherence, or to illustrate the manners of the time, I owe it to myself to give my reason for believing Hereward to have been the son of Earl Leofric and Godiva, a belief in which I am supported, as far as I know, only by Sir Henry Ellis (Introduction to Domesday) and by Mr Thomas Wright. The reasons against my belief (well known to antiquaries) are these - Richard of Ely calls him simply the son of Leofric, Lord of Brunne, and of Æliva, and his MS is by far the most important document relating to Hereward. But he says that the older MSS which he consulted were so ruined by damp, and torn, that 'vix ex eis jamquam a gemeribus ejus incertum, et pance incerto expressimus, et nomen', in fact, that he had much difficulty in making out Hereward's pedigree. He says, moreover, as to Leofric the Mercian's Anglo-Saxon MSS, 'In quibus (Anglice littere) vero non licet non satis pariti aut potius exarare deleta incognitarum litterarum' - which passage (whatever may have been the word now wanting to complete it) certainly confesses that he was but a poor adept at deciphering Anglo-Saxon MSS. He need hardly have confessed as much, for the misspellings of English names in his work are more gross than even those in Domesday, and it is not improbable that among the rest he may have rendered Godiva, in its English equivalent, by Æliva.

That he should have been ignorant that Leofric was not merely Lord of Brunne, but Earl of Mercia, will not seem surprising to those who know how utterly the English nobility were trampled into the mud. To the Normans they were barbarians without a name or a race. They were dead and gone, too, and who cared for the pedigree of a dead man whose lands had passed to another? Thus of Mailesweyn nothing is known. Of Ædric the Wild, a great chieftain in his day, all but nothing. Gospatric's pedigree has been saved, in part, by his relationship to royalty, both Scotch and English, and Sward Digra's, like that of Gyda, his kinswoman, by their relationship with the kings of Denmark and the Fairy Bear. But Gyda's husband, the great Earl Godwin, had become within three generations a 'barbarian's son,' and even Mr Freeman's research and judgment cannot decide his true pedigree. As to Leofric, we know that he was son (according to Florence of Worcester) of Leofwin the Alderman, and had two brothers, one Norman, killed by Canute with Ædric Stroom 1017 (according to Ingulf), the other Ædric Edwin, killed by the Welsh 1039. But we know no more.

That Ingulf should make him die A.D. 1057 is not strange, in spite of his many mistakes, for the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle gives the same date. But the monk who, probably a century or more after Ingulf, interpolated from Richard of Ely the passage beginning, 'At this time a nobleman, the Lord of Bourne, etc.,' sub anno 1063, may well have been ignorant that Leofric, Lord of Bourne, was also Earl of Mercia. But what need to argue over any statement of the so-called Ingulf, or rather 'Ingulfic Cycle'? I shall only add that this passage sub anno 1066, beginning 'Hereward, who has been previously mentioned,' seems to be again by a different hand.

Meanwhile the Excerptum de Familia Herewardi calls him plainly the son of Leofric, Earl of Mercia, and the Lady Godiva, giving to her the same genealogy as is given by Richard of Ely to Æliva.

This account of Hereward's family is taken from a document of no greater antiquity than the thirteenth century, a genealogical roll of the Lords of Bourne and Dering, who traced their descent and title to the lands from Hereward's daughter but it was no doubt taken either from previously existing records, or from the old tradition of the family, and, with no authority for contradicting it, and considering its general agreement with the other evidence, it is plain that Leofric of Bourne was generally understood to be the great Earl of Mercia of that name.

But the strongest evidence of the identity between Leofric of Bourne and Leofric, Earl of Mercia, is to be found in Domesday-book.

The Lord of Bourne at the time of the Conquest, as is proved by the Chronicles de Kentuari, was Morcar, Leofric of Mercia's grandson. This one fact is all but conclusive, unless we suppose that Leofric of Bourne had been dispossessed of his 'dominium' by Morcar, or by Earl Algar his father, or, again, by Earl Leofric his grandfather. But such an hypothesis accords ill with the acuity between Morcar and Hereward, and it is all but impossible that, if Hereward's family were then dispossessed, the fact should not appear in any of his sagas.

But Domesday-book gives no hint of any large landholders in or near Bourne, save Morcar, lord of Leccol, whose name still lingers in the 'Monkey Woods,' a few miles off, Edwin his brother, and Algar his father, son of Earl Leofric and Godiva. The famous Godiva, also, was probably a Lincolnshire woman, though the manors which she held in her widowhood were principally in Shropshire. The domains of her ancestor, 'the magnificent Earl Osric,' who lived in the days of King Edgar, were Deira, i.e. Danish Northumbria, from Humber to Tees, and he may have sprung from (as his name hints) the ancient kings of Deira. But charters (as far as we can trust them) connect him both with Peterborough and Crowland, and his descendant was Thorold of Bokenhale near Crowland, sheriff of Lincoln; from whom the ancient Thorolds of those parts claim descent, and this Thorold appears, in a charter of 1061, attested by Leofric and Godiva, as giving the cell of Spalding to Crowland. The same charter describes the manor of Spalding as belonging to Earl Leofric. His son Algar, whose name remains in Algarkirk,¹ appears as a benefactor to

¹ The first Earl 'Algar,' who signs a charter in the days of Beorhred, king of the Mercians, and who does doughty deeds about A.D. 870, is, to me, as mythical as the first 'Morcar,' Lord of Deira, who accompanies him, the first Thorold of Bokenhale, who gave that place to Crowland about A.D. 804, and the first Leofric, or 'Leovic,' Earl of Leicester (i.e. Mercia), who helps to Crowland. And, in fine, the great folk of Bourne, as well as Spalding, were without doubt the family of Leofric, Earl of Mercia and Chester, and of the Lady Godiva, the parents, as I conceive, of Herward. He would thus, on the death of Morecar, son of his elder brother Algar, take possession by natural right of the lordship of Bourne, and keep up a special annuity against Ivo Taillebois, who had taken Spalding from his patrimony.

Lastly, it is difficult to me to suppose that Herward would have been allowed to take the undivided command of a rebellion so aristocratic as that of the Fens, over the heads of three earls, Morecar among them, had he not possessed some such natural right of birth as an earl's son, and, probably, like most great English earls' families, of ancient royal, and therefore God descended, blood.

On the supposition, too, that he was the last remaining heir of the Earls of Mercia, may be explained William's strong desire to spare his life and receive his homage, as an atonement for his conduct to Edwin and Morcan, and a last effort to attach to himself the ancient English nobility. But of this enough, and more than enough, and so to my story.

CHAPTER I

HOW HERWARD WAS OUTLAWED, AND WENT NORTH TO SEEK HIS FORTUNES

IN Kesteven of Lincolnshire, between the forest and the fen, lies the good market-town of Bourne, the birthplace, according to all tradition, of two great Englishmen of Cecil Lord Burleigh, justly remembered throughout all time, and of Herward the Wake, not unjustly, perhaps, long forgotten. Two long streets meet opposite the house where Burleigh was born, one from Spalding and the eastern fens, the other from the forest, and the line of the old Roman road on the north. From thence the Watergang Street leads, by the side of clear running streams, to the old Priory church, and the great labyrinth of grass-grown banks, which was once the castle found in Crowland, A. D. 716, a 'monastery of black monks.' The Monks of Crowland were, perhaps, trying to work on King Eadwig, Herward's son-in-law, or Richard of Eborac, his grandfather-in-law, as they were trying to work on the Norman kings, when they invented these charters of the eighth and ninth centuries, with names of Saxon kings, and nobles of Leofric and Godiva's house, or, again, the land being notoriously given to Crowland by men of certain names, who were then of no authority as rebels and dispossessed, it was necessary to invent men of like names, who were safely entrenched behind Saxon antiquity with the ancestors of Edward the Confessor. But in their clumsiness they seem to have mingled with them, in the said charters and their mythic battles against the Danes, purely Danish names, such as Siward, Asketyl, Aser, Harding, Grimketyl, Wulfketyl, etc., which surely prove the fraud. Meanwhile, the very names of Leofric, Algar, Morecar, Thorold, genuine or not, seem to prove that the houses of Leofric and Godiva were ancient rulers in these parts, whose phantoms had to be evoked when needed.

of the Wakes. Originally, it may be, those earthworks were a Roman camp, guarding the King Street, or Roman road, which splits off from the Ermine Street near Castor, and runs due north through Bourne to Sleaford. They may have guarded, too, the Car-dyke, or great Cat-hwater drain, which runs from Peterborough northward into the heart of Lincolnshire, a still-enduring monument of Roman genius. Their site, not on one of the hills behind, but on the dead flat meadow, was determined doubtless by the noble fountain, bourn, or brunne, which rises among the earthworks, and gives its name to the whole town. In the flat meadow bubbles up still the great pool of limestone water, crystal clear, suddenly and at once, and runs away, winter and summer, a stream large enough to turn many a mill, and spread perpetual verdure through the fat champagne lands.

The fountain was, doubtless, in the middle ages, miraculous and haunted perhaps, in heathen times, divine and consecrated. Even till a late date, the millers of Bourne paid water-dues to those of a village some miles away, on the strength of the undoubted fact, that a duck put into Bourne Pool would pass underground into the mill-race of the said village. Doubtless it was a holy well, such as were common in the eastern counties, as they are still in Ireland, a well where rains, flowers, and other gaw-gaws might have been seen bringing offerings to the spirit of the well, whether one of those 'nickers,' 'devils,' or 'luther-gosses,' which St. Botulf met when he founded Boston near by, or one of those 'tan ladies,' 'elves,' or water-nymphs, who, exorcised from the North, still linger in the fountains of modern Greece. Exorcised, certainly, the fury of Bayne was at an early date, for before the Conquest the Peterborough monks had founded a cell outside the castle ditch, and, calling in the aid of the chief of the Apostles against those spirits of darkness who peopled, innumerable earth, air, water, and fen, had rechristened it as 'Peterspool,' which name it bears unto this day.

Military skill has, evidently, utilised the waters of the Peterspool from the earliest times. They filled, at some remote period, the dykes at a great earthwork to the north, which has been overlooked by antiquaries, because it did not (seemingly) form part of the enceinte of the medieval castle of the Wakes. It still fills the dykes of that castle, whereof nothing remains now save banks of turf, and one great artificial barrow, on which stood the keep, even in Ireland's time, it would seem, somewhat dismally. 'I here appear,' he says, 'great ditches, and the dungeon hill of an ancient castle again the west end of the Priory.' It long led to the Lord Wake, and much service of the Wake too is done to this Castle, and every feodary knoweth his station and place of service.

Of the stonework nothing now remains. The square dungeon, 'a fayre and prettie building, with iv. square towers . . . hall, chambers, all manner of houses and offices for the lord and his train,¹ and so forth, is utterly gone. The gate-house, thirty feet high, with its circular Saxon (probably Norman) arch, has been pulled down by the Lords of Bureleigh, to build a farmhouse, the fair park is divided into fair meadows, and a large part of the town of Bourne is, probably, built of the materials of the Wakes' castle, and the Priory, which arose under its protection. Those Priory lands passed into the hands of Trollopas and Pochins, as did the lands of the castle into those of the Cocles, and of that foe of the Wakes, all, as far as I know, is lost, for l'honneur, which shone out of late in that hero of Arrah, who proved, by his valour, pertinacity, and shiftfulness, not unworthy of his great ancestor Hereward. Verily the good old blood of England is not yet worn out.

A pleasant place, and a rich, is Bourne now, and a pleasant place and rich must it have been in the old Anglo-Danish times, when the hall of Loofric, the great Earl of Mercia, stood where the Wakes' feudal castle stood in after years. To the south and west stretched, as now, the illimitable flat of fen, with the spires of Crowland gleaming bright between high trees upon the southern horizon, and to the north, from the very edge of the town fields, rose the great Brunescwald, the forest of oak, and ash, and elm, which still covers many miles of Lincolnshire, as Bourne Wood, Grimsthorpe Park, and parks and woodlands without number. To the south-west it joined the great forest of Rookingham, in Northamptonshire. To the west, it all but marched with Charnwood Forest in Leicestershire, and to the north-west, with the great Sherwood, which covered Nottinghamshire, and reached over the borders of Yorkshire. Mighty fowling and fishing was there in the fen below, and mighty hunting on the wealth above, where still haunt, in Grimsthorpe Park, the primeval red deer, descendants of those who fell by Hereward's bow, ere yet the first Lovell had built his castle on the steep, or the Cistercian monks of Fountains had found out the deep-cumbersome vale of God, and settled themselves in the glen beneath the castle walls.

It is of those earlier days that this story tells, of the latter half of the eleventh century, and the eve of the Norman Conquest, when Leofric the Earl had the dominion in forest and manorial rights, in wood, and town, and fen, and beside him, upon the rich strip of champaign, other free Danish holders, whose names may be still found in Domesday-book, held small estates and owed, probably, some military service to the great earl at the hall within the Roman earthwork.

The house of Bourne, as far as it can be reconstructed by imagination was altogether unlike one of the tall and gloomy Norman castles which, in the course of the next few generations, must have taken its place. It was much more like a house in a Chinese painting, an irregular group of low buildings, almost all of one story, stone below and timber above, with high-peaked roofs—at least in the more Danish country—affording a separate room, or rather house, for each different need of the family. Such a one may be seen in illuminations of the century. In the centre of the building is the hall, with a door or doors opening out into the court, and sitting-thorvat, at the top of a flight of steps, the lord and lady, dealing clothes to the naked and bread to the hungry. Behind the hall is a round tower, seemingly the strong place of the whole house. It must have stood at Bourne upon the dungeon hill. On one side of the hall is a chapel, by it a large room or bower for the ladies, on the other side a kitchen, and stuck on to lower, kitchen, and every other principal building, lean to after lean-to, the uses of which it is impossible now to discover. The house had grown with the wants of the family—as many good old English houses have done to this day. Round it would be scattered barns and stables, in which grooms and herdsmen slept side by side with their own horses and cattle, beyond, the yard, garth, or garden-fence, high earth-banks with palisades on top, while the waters of the Peterspool wandered around out side all. Such was most probably the 'villa,' 'ton,' or 'town,' of Earl Leofric, the Lord of Bourne, such too, probably, the hall at Loughiton-en-le-Moithen in Yorkshire, which belonged to his grandson Edwin, and therefore, probably, to him. Leofric's other residence, the castle of Warwick, was already, it may be, a building of a more solid and Norman type, such as had been built already here and there, for Edward the Confessor's French courtiers, by the hands of 'Welsh men,' i.e. French speaking foreigners.¹

Known, I presume, to all is Lady Godiva, mistress of Bourne, the most beautiful as well as the most saintly woman of her day, who, all her life, kept at her own expense thirteen poor folk wherever she went, who, throughout Lent, watched in the church at triple matins, namely, one for the Trinity, one for the Cross, and one for St. Mary, who every day read the psalter through, and so persevered in good and holy works to her life's end, the devoted friend of St. Mary, ever a virgin, who enriched monasteries without number—Leominster, Wenlock, Chester St. Mary's Stow by Lincoln, Worcester, Evesham, and who, above all, founded the great monastery in that town of Coventry which has made her name immortal for another and a far nobler deed, and enriched it so much, that no monastery in England possessed such abundance of gold, silver, jewels, and precious stones, besides that most precious jewel of all, the arm of St. Augustine, which not Lady Godiva, but her friend Archbishop Ethelnoth, presented to Coventry, having bought it at Pavia for a hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold.²

Less known, save to students, is her husband Leofric, whose bones lie by those of Godiva in that same minster of Coventry, how 'his counsel was as if one had opened the divine oracles', very 'wise,' says the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, 'for God and for the world, which was a blessing to all this nation', the greatest man, as I have said, in Edward the Confessor's court, save his still greater rival, Earl Godwin.

Less known, again, are the children of that illustrious pair, Algar, or Alfgar, Earl of Merca after his father, who died after a short and stormy life, leaving two sons, Edwin and Morcar, the fair and hapless young earls, always spoken of together, as if they had been twins, a daughter, Aelfthra, or Elfgyva, married first (according to some) to Guthin, King of North Wales, and certainly afterwards to Harold, King of England, and another, Lucia (as the Normans at least called her), whose fate was, if possible, more sad than that of her brothers.

Their second son was Hereward, whose history this tale sets forth, their third and youngest, a boy whose name is unknown.

They had probably another daughter besides, married, it may be, to some son of Leofric's staunch friend old Siward Digre, and the mother, may be, of the two young Siwards, the 'white' and the 'red,' who figure in chronicle and legend as the nephews of Hereward. But this last pedigree is little more than a conjecture.

Be these things as they may, Godiva was the greatest lady in England, save two Edith, Harold's sister, the nominal wife of Edward the Confessor, and Githa, or Gytha, as her own Danes called her, Harold's mother, niece of Canute the Great. Great was Godiva, and might have been proud enough, had she been inclined to that pleasant sin. But always (for there is a skeleton, they say, in every house) she carried that about her which might well keep her humble, namely, shame at the misconduct of Hereward, her son.

Now on a day—about the year 1054—while Earl Siward was helping to bring Binham wood to Dunsunane, to avenge his murdered brother-in-law, Lady Godiva sat, not at her hall-door, dealing food and clothing to her thirteen poor folk, but in her bower, with her youngest son, a two-years' boy, at her knee. She was listening with a face of shame and horror to the complaint of Herhelm, steward of Peterborough, who had fallen in that afternoon with Hereward and his crew of housecarles.

To keep a following of stout housecarles, or men-at-arms, was the pride as well as the duty of an Anglo-Danish lord, as it was, till lately, of a Sooto-Danish Inghland laird. And Hereward, in imitation of his father and his elder brother, must needs have his following from the time he was but fifteen years old. All the unruly youths of the neighbourhood, sons of free 'holders,' who owed some sort of military service to Earl Leofric, Geri, Hereward's cousin, Winter, whom he called his brother-in-arms, the Wulfrics, the Wulfards, the Azers, and many another wild blade, had banded themselves round a young nobleman more unruly than themselves. Their names were already a terror to all decent folk, at wakes and fairs, alehouses and village sports. They atoned, be it remembered, for their early sins, by making those names in after years a terror to the invaders of their native land, but as yet their prowess was limited to drunken brawls and faction fights, to upsetting old women at their work, levying blackmail from quiet chapmen on the high road, or bringing back in triumph, sword in hand and club on shoulder, their leader Hereward from some duel which his insolence had provoked.

But this time, if the story of the steward was to be believed, Hereward and his housecarles had taken an ugly stride forward toward the pit. They had met him riding along, intent upon his psalter, home towards his abhey from its cell at Bourne—'Whereon your son, most gracious lady, bade me stand, saying that his men were thirsty, and he had no money to buy ale withal, and none so likely to help him thereto as a fat parst—for so he scandalously termed me, who, as your ladyship knows, am leaner than the minster bell ropes, with fasting Wednesday and Fridays throughout the year, beside the vigils of the saints, and the former and latter Lent.'

'But when he saw who I was, as if injured by a malignant spirit, he shouted out my name, and bade his companions throw me to the ground.'

'Throw you to the ground?' shuddered the Lady Godiva.

'In much mire, madam. After which he took my palfrey, saying that heaven's gate was too lowly for men on horseback to get in thereto, and then my marten's fur gloves and cape which your gracious self bestowed on me, alleging that the rules of my order allowed only one garment, and no furs save catskins and suchlike. And lastly—I tremble while I relate, thinking not of the loss of my poor money, but the loss of an immortal soul—took from me a purse with sixteen silver pennies, which I had collected from our tenants for the use of the monastery, and said blasphemously that I and mine had cheated your ladyship, and therefore him your son, out of many a fat manor ere now, and it was but fair that he should take the rents thereof, as he should never get the hinds out of our claws again, with more of the like, which I blush to repeat—and so left me to trudge hither in the mire.'

'Wretched boy!' said the Lady Godiva, and hid her face in her hands, 'and more wretched I, to have brought such a son into the world!'

The monk had hardly finished his doleful story, when there was a pattering of heavy feet, a noise of men shouting and laughing outside, and a voice above all calling for the monk by name, which made that good man crouch behind the curtain of Lady Godiva's bed. The next moment the door of the bower was thrown violently open, and in swaggered a noble lad eighteen years old. His face was of extraordinary beauty, save that the lower jaw was too long and heavy, and that his eyes wore a strange and almost sinister expression, from the fact that the one of them was gray, and the other blue. He was short, but of immense breadth of chest and strength of limb, while his delicate hands and feet and long locks of golden hair marked him of most noble, and even, as he really was, of ancient royal race. He was dressed in a gaudy costume, resembling on the whole that of a Highland chieftain. His wrists and throat were tattooed in blue patterns,¹ and he carried sword and dagger, a gold ring round his neck,² and gold rings on his wrists. He was a lad to have gladdened the eyes of any mother, but there was no gladness in the Lady Godiva's eyes as she received him, nor had there been for many a year. She looked on him with sternness, with all but horror, and he, his face flushed with wine, which he had tossed off as he passed through the hall to steady his nerves for the coming storm, looked at her with smiling defiance, the result of long estrangement between mother and son.

'Well, my lady,' said he, ere she could speak, 'I heard that this good fellow was here, and came home as fast as I could, to see that he told you as few lies as possible.'

'He has told me,' said she, 'that you have robbed the Church of God.'

'Robbed him, it may be, an old hoody crow, against whom I have a grudge of ten years' standing.'

'Wretched, wretched boy! What wickedness next? Know you not that he who robs the Church, robs God Himself?'

'If a man sin against another,' put in the monk from behind the curtain, 'the judge shall judge him: but if a man sin against the Lord, who shall intreat for him?'

'Who indeed?' cried Lady Godiva. 'Think, think, hapless boy, what it is to go about the world henceforth with the wrath of Him who made it abiding on you—cut off from the protection of all angels, open to the assaults of all devils! How will your life be safe a moment from lightning, from flood, from shipping knife, ¹Some antiquaries have denied, on the ground of insufficient evidence, that the English tattooed themselves. Others have referred to some such custom the secret marks by which heroes are so often recognised in old romances, as well as those by which Edith the Swan neck is said to have recognised Harold's body on the field of Hastings. Hereward is, likewise, recognised by 'signis satis exquisitis in corpore designatis vulnera tenebimusque cicatricebus.' I am not answerable for the Latin, but as I understand it, it refers not to war-wounds but to very delicate marks. Moreover, William of Malmesbury, sub anno 1066, seems sufficiently explicit when he says that the English 'adorned their skins with punctured designs.'

May not our sailors' fashion of tattooing their arms and chests with strange devices be a remnant of this very fashion, kept up, if not originated, by the desire that the corpse should be recognised after death?

from stumbling horse, from some hidden and hideous death! If the fen-fiends lure you away to drown you in the river, or the wood-fiends leap on you in the thicket to wring your neck, of what use to you then the suffrages of the saints, or the sign of the holy cross! What help, what hope, for you—for me—but that you must perish foully, and, it may be, never find a grave!'

Lady Godiva—as the constant associate of clerks and monks—spoke after an artificial and Latinised fashion, at which Hereward was not wont to laugh and jest, but as he believed, no less than his pious mother, in innumerable devils and ghosts, and other uncanny creatures, who would surely do him a mischief if they could, he began to feel somewhat frightened, but he answered none the less stoutly—

'As for devils, and suchlike, I never saw one yet, by flood or field, night or day. And if one comes, I must just copy old Baldwin Bras-des-Fers of Flanders, and see whether the devil or I can hit hardest. As for the money—I have no grudge against St. Peter, and I will warrant myself to rob some one else of sixteen pennies ere long, and pay the saint back every farthing.'

'The saint takes not the fruits of robbery. He would hurl them far away, by might divine, were they laid upon his altar,' quoth the steward.

'I wonder he has not hurled thee away long ago, then, with thy gifts about thine ears, for thou hast brought many a bag of grist to his mill, ere now, that was as fondly earned as aught of mine. I tell thee, man, if thou art wise, thou wilt hold thy tongue, and let me and St. Peter settle this quarrel between us. I have a long score against thee, as thou knowest, which a gentle battery in the greenwood has but half paid off, and I warn thee not to make it longer by thy tongue, lest I shorten the said tongue for thee with cold steel.'

'What does he mean?' asked Godiva, shuddering.

'Thus!' quoth Hereward, fiercely enough, 'that this monk forgets that I have been a monk myself, or should have been one by now, if you, my pious mother, had had your will of me, as you may if you like of that baby there at your knee. He forgets why I left Peterborough Abbey, when Winter and I turned all the priest's books upside down in the choir, and they would have flogged us—me, the earl's son—me, the Viking's son—me, the champion, as I will be yet, and make all lands ring with the fame of my deeds, as they rang with the fame of my forefathers, before they became the slaves of monks, and how, when Winter and I got hold of the kitchen spits, and up to the top of the peat-stack by Bolldyke-gate, and held them all at bay there, a whole abbeyful of cowards there against two seven-years' children,—it was that weasel there bade set the peat-stack alight under us, and so bring us down, and would have done it, too, had it not been for my uncle Brand, the only man that I care for in this wide world. Do you think I have not owed you a grudge ever since that day, monk! And do you think I will not pay it? Do you think I would not have burned Peterborough minster over your head before now, had it not been for uncle Brand's sake? See that I do not do it yet! See that when there is another prior in Borough you do not find Hereward the Berserker smoking you out some dark night, as he would smoke a wasp's nest. And I will, ify—'

'Hereward, Hereward!' cried his mother, 'godless, God-forgotten boy, what words are these? Silence, before you burden your soul with an oath which the devils in hell will accept and force you to keep,' and she sprang up, and seizing his arm, laid her hand upon his mouth.

Hereward looked at her majestic face, once lovely, now stern and careworn, and trembled for a moment. Had there been any tenderness in it, his history might have been a very different one, but alas! there was none. Not that she was in herself untender, but that her great pity (call it not superstition, for it was then the only form known or possible to pure and devout souls) was so outraged by this insult to that clergy whose willing slave she had become, that the only method of reclaiming the sinner had been long forgotten in genuine horror at his sin. 'Is it not enough,' she went on sternly, 'that you should have become the bully and the ruffian of all the fens?—that Hereward the leaper, Hereward the wrestler, Hereward the thrower of the hammer—sports after all only fit for the sons of slaves, should be also Hereward the drunkard, Hereward the common fighter, Hereward the breaker of houses, Hereward the leader of mobs of boon companions who bring back to us, in shame and sorrow, the days when our heathen forefathers ravaged this land with fire and sword? Is it not enough for me that my son should be a common stabber—?'

'Whoever called me stabber to you, hea! I have killed men, or had them killed, I have done it in fair fight.'

But she went on unheeding—'Is it not enough that after having squandered on your fellows all the money that you could wring from my bounty or win at your base sports, you should have robbed your own father, collected his rents behind his back, taken money and goods from his tenants by threats and blows, but that, after outraging them, you must add to all this a worse sin likewise, outraging God, and driving me—me who have borne with you, me who have concealed all for your sake—to tell your father that of which the very telling will turn my hair to gray?'

'So you will tell my father!' said Hereward coolly.

'And if I should not, this monk himself is bound to do so, or his superior, your uncle Brand.'

'My uncle Brand will not, and your monk dare not.'

'Then I must. I have loved you long and well; but there is one thing which I must love better than you, and that is my conscience and my Maker.'

'Those are two things, my lady mother, and not one, so you had better not confound them. As for the latter, do you not think that He who made the world is well able to defend His own property—if the lands, and houses, and cattle, and money, which these men wheedle and threaten and forge out of you and my father, are really His property, and not merely their plunder? As for your conscience, my lady mother, really you have done so many good deeds in your life, that it might be beneficial to you to do a bad deed once in a way, so as to keep your soul in a wholesome state of humility.'

The monk groaned aloud. Lady Godiva groaned, but it was inwardly. There was silence for a moment. Both were abashed by the lad's utter shamelessness.

'And you will tell my father?' said he again. 'He is at the old miracle-worker's court at Westminster. He will tell the miracle-worker, and I shall be outlawed.'

'And if you be, wretched boy, whom have you to blame but yourself? Can you expect that the king, sainted even as he is before his death, dare pass over such an offence against Holy Church?'

'Blame? I shall blame no one. Pass over? I hope he will not pass over it. I only want an excuse like that for turning kempy-man—knight-errant, as those Norman puppets call it—like Ragnar Lothbrok, or Hrolf, or Harold Hardraade, and try what a man can do for himself in the world with nothing to help him in heaven and earth, with neither saint nor angel, friend or counsellor, to see to him, save his wits and his good sword. So send off the messenger, good mother mine, and I will promise you I will not have him hamstringing on the way, as some of my housecarles would do if I but held up my hand, and let the miracle monger fill up the measure of his folly by making an enemy of one more bold fellow in the world.'

And he swaggered out of the room.

When he was gone the Lady Godiva bowed her head into her lap, and wept long and bitterly. Neither her maidens nor the priest dare speak to her for nigh an hour, but at the end of that time she lifted up her head, and settled her face again, till it was like that of a marble saint over a minster door, and called for ink and paper, and wrote her letter, and then asked for a trusty messenger who should carry it up to Westminster.

'None so swift or sure,' said the house steward, 'as Martin Lightfoot.'

Lady Godiva shook her head. 'I mistrust that man,' she said. 'He is too fond of my poor—of the Lord Hereward.'

'He is a strange one, my lady, and no one knows whence he came, and I sometimes fancy whether he may go either, but ever since my lord threatened to hang him for talking with my young master he has never spoken to him, nor scarcely, indeed, to living soul. And one thing there is makes him or any man sure, as long as he is well paid, and that is, that he cares for nothing in heaven or earth save himself and what he can get.

So Martin Lightfoot was sent for. He came in straight into the lady's bedchamber, after the simple fashion of those days. He was a tall, bony man, as was to be expected from his nickname, lean as a rake, with a long hooked nose, a scanty brown beard, and a high conical head. His only garment was a shabby gray woollen tunic which served him both as coat and kilt, and laced breeches of untanned hide. He might have been any age from twenty to forty, but his face was disfigured with deep scars and long exposure to the weather. He dropped on one knee, holding his greasy cap in his hand, and looked, not at his lady's face, but at her feet, with a stupid and frightened expression. She knew very little of him, save that her husband had picked him up upon the road as a wanderer some five years since, that he had been employed as a doer of odd jobs and runner of messages, and that he was supposed from his taciturnity and strangeness to have something uncanny about him.

'Martin,' said the lady, 'they tell me that you are a skilful and a prudent man.'

'That am I.'

'"Tongue breaketh lance,"
Though she herself hath none.'

'I shall try you, do you know your way to London?'

'Yes, Cardyke, King Street, Emma Street, London Town.'

'To your lord's lodgings?'

'Yes.'

'How long shall you be going there with this letter?'

'A day and a half.'

'When shall you be back hither?'

'On the fourth day.'

'And you will go to my lord and deliver this letter safely?'

'Yes.'

'And safely bring back an answer?'

'Nay, not that.'

'Not that?'

Martin made a doleful face, and drew his hand first across his leg, and then across his throat, as hints of the doom which he expected.

'He—the Lord Hereward—has promised not to let thee be harmed.'

Martin gave a start, and his dull eyes flashed out a moment, but the next he answered, as earnestly as was his wont.

'The more fool he. But women's bodkins are sharper as well as men's knives.'

'Bodkins? Whose? What habblest of?'

'Them,' said Martin, pointing to the hower maidens—girls of good family who stood round, chosen for their beauty, after the fashion of those times, to attend on great ladies. There was a cry of angry and contemptuous denial, not unminged with something like laughter, which showed that Martin had but spoken the truth. Hereward, in spite of all his sins, was the darling of his mother's bower, and there was not one of the damsels but would have done anything short of murder to have prevented Martin carrying the letter.

'Silence, man!' said Lady Godiva, so sternly that Martin saw that he had gone too far. 'How knows such as thou what is in this letter?'

'All the town must know,' said Martin sullenly.

'Best that they should, and know that right is done here,' said she, trying to be stern.

'I will take it,' said Martin. He held out his hand, took it and looked at it, but made no move and without any attempt to read it.

'Thy own mother,' said he, after a while.

'What is that to thee?' said Lady Godiva, blushing and kindling.

'Nothing—I had no mother. But God has one.'

'What meanest thou, knave? Wilt thou take the letter or no?'

'I will take it.' And he again looked at it, without rising off his knee. 'His own father, too.'

'What is that to thee, I say again?'

'Nothing—I have no father. But God's Son has one.'

'What wilt thou, thou strange man?' asked she, puzzled and half frightened, 'and how earnest thou, again I ask, to know what is in this letter?'

'All the town, I say again, must know. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid. On the fourth day from this I will be back.'

And Martin rose, and putting the letter solemnly into the purse at his girdle, shot out of the door with clenched teeth, as a man upon a fixed purpose which it would lighten his heart to carry out. He ran rapidly through the huge outer hall past the long oak table, at which Hereward and his boon companions were drinking and roystering. As he passed the young lord he cast on him a look so full of meaning, that though Hereward knew not what the meaning was, it startled him, and for a moment softened him. Did this man, who had sullenly avoided him for more than two years, whom he had looked on as a cloid or a post in the field beneath his notice, since he could be of no use to him, did this man still care for him? Hereward had reason to know better than most that there was something strange and uncanny about the man. Did he mean him well? Or had he some grudge against him, which made him undertake this journey willingly and out of spite—possibly with the will to make bad worse? For an instant Hereward's heart misgave him. He would stop the letter at all risks. 'Hold him!' he cried to his comrades.

But Martin turned to him, laid his finger on his lips, smiled kindly, and saying, 'You promised!' caught up a loaf from the table, slipped from amongst them like an eel, and darted through the door, and out of the close. They followed him to the great gate, and there stopped, some cursing, some laughing. To give Martin Lightfoot a yard of law was never to come up with him again. Some called for bows to bring him down with a parting shot. But Hereward forbade them, and stood leaning against the gate-post, watching him trot on like a lean wolf over the lawn, till he sprang upon the Cadyke bank, and fled straight south into the misty fen.

'Now, lads,' said Hereward, 'home with you all, and make your peace with your fathers. In this house you never drink¹ ale again.'

They looked at him, surprised.

'You are disbanded, my gallant army. As long as I could cut long thoughts out of other men's hides, I could feel you like early sons, but now I must feel myself, and a dog over his bone wants no company. Outlawed I shall be before the week is out, and unless you wish to be outlawed too, you will obey orders, and home.'

'We will follow you to the world's end,' cried some.

'To the rope's end, lads—that is all you will get in my company. Go home with you, and those who feel a calling, let them turn monks, and those who have not, let them learn

'For to plough and to sow,
And to reap and to mow,
And to be a farmer's boy

Good-night.'

And he went in and shut the great gates after him, leaving them astonished.

To take his advice, and to go home, was the simplest thing to be done. A few of them on their return were soundly beaten, and deserved it, a few were hounded by their mothers for a week in hay lots and hen roosts, till their fathers' anger had passed away. But only one seems to have found monk or clerk, and that was Leofric the Unlucky, grandson of the great earl, and poet in ordinary to the king.

The next morning at dawn Hereward mounted his best horse, armed himself from head to foot, and rode over to Peterborough.

When he came to the abbey gate, he smote 'theroon with his lance butt, till the porter's teeth rattled in his head for fear.

'Let me in!' he shouted. 'I am Hereward Leolinsson. I must see my uncle Brand.'

'Oh, my most gracious lord,' cried the porter, thrusting his head out of the wicket, 'what is this that you have been doing to our steward?'

'The title of what I will do unless you open the gate.'

'Oh, my lord!' said the porter, as he opened it, 'if our Lady and St. Peter would but have mercy on your fair face, and convert your soul to the fear of God and man—'

'She would make me as good an old fool as you. Fetch my uncle the prior.'

The porter obeyed. The son of Earl Leofric was as a young lion among the sheep in those parts, and few dare say him nay, certainly not the monks of Peterborough, moreover, the good porter could not help being strangely fond of Hereward—as was every one whom he did not insult, rob, or kill.

Out came Brand, a noble elder more fit, from his eye and gait, to be a knight than a monk. He looked sully at Hereward.

'"Dear is bought the honey that is haked off the thorn,"' quoth Hereward, said he.

'Hereward bought his wisdom by experience, I suppose,' said Hereward, 'and so must I. So I am just starting out to see the world, uncle.'

'Naughty, naughty boy! If we had thee safe here again for a week, we would take this hot blood out of thee, and send thee home in thy right mind.'

'Bring a rod and whip me, then. Try, and you shall have your chance. Every one else has had, and this is the end of their labours.'

'By the chains of St. Peter,' quoth the monk, 'that is just what thou needest. To hoist thee on such another fool's back, truss thee up, and lay it on lustily, till thou art ashamed. To treat thee as a man is only to make thee a more heavily blown up ass than thou art already.'

'True, most wise uncle. And therefore my still wiser parents are going to treat me like a man indeed, and send me out into the world to seek my fortunes.'

'Eh?'

'They are going to prove how thoroughly they trust me to take care of myself, by outlawing me. Eh? say I in return. Is not that an honour, and a proof that I have not shewn myself a fool, though I may have a madman?'

'Outlaw you? Oh, my boy, my darling, my jade! Get off thy horse, and don't sit up there, ham on hip, like a timbered Saracen, chiding God and man. But come down and talk reason to me, for the sake of St. Peter and all saints.'

Hereward threw himself off his horse, and threw his arms round his uncle's neck.

'Fish! Now, uncle, don't cry, do what you will, but I cry too. Help me to be a man while I live, even if I go to the black place when I die.'

'It shall not be!' and the monk swore by all the relics in Peterboroughminster.

'It must be. It shall be. I like to be outlawed. I want to be outlawed. It makes me feel like a man. There is not an earl in England, save my father, who has not been outlawed in his time. My brother Algar will be outlawed before he dies, if he has the spirit of a man in him. It is the fashion, my uncle, and I must follow it. So hey for the merry greenwood and the long ships, and the swan's bath, and all the rest of it. Uncle, you will lend me fifty silver pennies?'

'I? I would not lend thee one, if I had it, which I have not. And yet, old fool that I am, I believe I would.'

'I would pay thee back honestly. I shall go down to Constantinople to the Varangers, get my Polotasawit¹ out of the kaiser's treasure, and pay thee back five to one.'

'What does this son of Belial here?' asked an austere voice.

'Ah! Abbot Leofric, my very good lord. I have come to ask hospitality of you for some three days. By that time I shall be a wolf's head, and out of the law and then, if you will give me ten minutes' start, you may put your bloodhounds on my track, and see which run fastest, they or I. You are a gentleman, and a man of honour, so I trust to you to feed my horse fairly the meanwhile, and not to let your monks poison me.'

The abbot's face relaxed. He tried to look as solemn as he could, but he ended in bursting into a very great laughter.

'The insolence of this lad passes the miracles of all saints. He robs St. Peter on the highway, breaks into his abbey, insults him to his face, and then asks him for hospitality, and—'

'And gets it,' quoth Hereward.

'What is to be done with him, Brand, my friend? If we turn him out—'

'Which we cannot do,' said Brand, looking at the well-mailed and armed lad, 'without calling in half a dozen of our men-at-arms.'

'In which case there would be bloodshed and scandal made in the holy precincts.'

'And nothing gained, for yield he would not till he was killed outright, which Heaven forbid!'

Amen. And if he stay here, he may be persuaded to repentance.'

'And restitution.'

As for that,' quoth Hereward (who had remounted his horse from prudential motives, and set him athwart the gateway, so that there was no chance of the doors being slammed behind him), 'if either of you will lend me sixteen pennies, I will pay them back to you and St. Peter before I die, with interest enough to satisfy any Jew, on the word of a gentleman and an earl's son.'

The abbot burst again into a great laughter. 'Come in, thou graceless renegade, and we will see to thee and thy horse, and I will pray to St. Peter, and I doubt not he will have patience with thee, for he is very merciful, and after all, thy parents have been exceeding good to us, and the righteousness of the father, like his sins, is sometimes visited on the children.'

Now, why were the two ecclesiastics so uncanonically kind to this wicked youth?

Perhaps because both the old hachelors were wishing from their hearts that they had just such a son of their own. And beside, Earl Leofric was a very great man indeed, and the wind might change, for it is an unstable world.

'Only, mind, one thing,' said the naughty boy, as he dismounted, and hallooed to a lay-brother to see to his horse, 'don't let me see the face of that Herluin.'

'And why? You have wronged him, and he will forgive you, doubtless, like a good Christian as he is.'

'That is his concern. But if I see him, I cut off his head. And as uncle Brand knows, I always sleep with my sword under my pillow.'

'Oh, that such a mother should have borne such a son!' groaned the abbot, as they went in.

On the fifth day came Martin Lightfoot, and found Hereward in Prior Brand's private cell.

'Well?' asked Hereward coolly.

'Is he——? Is he——?' stammered Brand and could not finish his sentence.

Martin nodded.

Hereward laughed—a loud, swaggering, uneasy laugh.

'See what it is to be born of just and pious parents. Come, Master Trot-alone, speak out and tell us all about it. Thy lean wolf's legs have run to some purpose. Open thy lean wolf's mouth and speak for once, lest I ease thy legs for the rest of thy life by a cut across the hams. Find thy lost tongue, I say!'

'Walls have ears, as well as the wild wood,' said Martin.

'We are safe here,' said the prior, 'so speak, and tell us the whole truth.'

'Well, when the earl read the letter, he turned red, and pale again, and then nought but—"Men, follow me to the king at Westminster." So we went all with our weapons, twenty or more, along the Strand, and up into the king's new hall, and a grand hall it is, but not easy to get into, for the crowd of monks and beggars on the stairs, hindering honest folk's business. And there saw the king on a high settle, with his pink face and white hair, looking as royal as a bell-wether new washed, and on either side of him, on the same settle, sat the old fox and the young wolf!'

'Godwin and Harold? And where was the queen?'

'Sitting on a stool at his feet, with her hands together as if she were prying, and her eyes downcast, as demure as any cat. And so is fulfilled the story, how the sheep-dog went out to get married, and left the fox, the wolf, and the cat to guard the flock.'

'If thou hast found thy tongue,' said Brand, 'thou art like enough to lose it again by sheer of knife, talking such ribaldry of dignities. Dost not know?—and he sank his voice—'that Abbot Leofric is Earl Harold's man, and that Harold himself made him abbot!'

'I said—Walls have ears. It was you who told me that we were safe. However, I will bridle the unruly one.' And he went on. 'And your father walked up the hall, his left hand on his sword-hilt, looking an earl all over, as he is.'

'He is that,' said Hereward in a low voice.

'And he bowed, and the most magnificent, powerful, and virtuous Godwin (as that speaking evil of dignities¹) would have beckoned him up to sit on the high settle, but he looked straight at the king, as if there were never a Godwin or a Godwinsson on earth, and cried as he stood—

"Justice, my lord the king!"'

'And at that the king turned pale, and said:

¹ It must be remembered that the house of Godwin is spoken of throughout this book by hereditary enemies.

"Who! What! O miserable world! O last days drawing nearer and nearer! O earth, full of violence and blood! Who has wronged thee now, most dear and noble earl!"

"Justice against my own son"

'At that the fox looked at the wolf, and the wolf at the fox, and if they did not smile, it was not for want of will, I warrant. But your father went on, and told all his story, and when he came to your robbing master monk—

"O apostate!" cries the bell-wether, "O spawn of Beelzebub! excommunicate him, with bell, book, and candle. May he be thrust down with Korah, Balaam, and Iscariot, to the most Stygian pot of the sempiternal Tartarus."

'And at that your father smiled. "That is bishops' work," says he, "and I want king's work from you, lord king. Outlaw me this young rebel's sinful body, as by law you can, and leave his sinful soul to the priests—or to God's mercy, which is like to be more than theirs."

'Then the queen looked up. "Your own son, noble earl! Think of what you are doing—and one, too, whom all say is so gallant and so fair. Oh, persuade him, father—persuade him, Harold, my brother—or, if you cannot persuade him, persuade the king at least, and save this poor youth from exile."

'Puss Velvet-paw knew well enough,' said Hereward in a low voice, 'that the way to lighten my father's heart was to set Godwin and Harold on softening it. They ask my pardon from the king! I would not take it at their asking, even if my father would.'

'There spoke a true Leofricsson,' said Brand, in spite of himself.

"By the——" (and Martin repeated a certain very solemn oath), 'said your father, "justice I will have, my lord king. Who talks to me of my own son! You put me into my earldom to see justice done, and law obeyed, and how shall I make others keep within bound? I am not to keep in my own flesh and blood! Here is this land running headlong to ruin, because every nobleman—ay every churl who owns a manor, if he dares—must needs arm and mickle, and levy war on his own behalf, and harry and slay the king's lieges, if he have not garlic to his roast goose every time he chooses"—and there your father did look at Godwin, once and for all—"and shall I let my son follow the fashion, and do his best to leave the land open and weak for Norseman, or Dane, or Frenchman, or whoever else hopes next to mount the throne of a king who is too holy to leave an heir behind him!"'

'Aho! Martin the silent! Where learnedst thou so suddenly the trade of preaching! I thought thou hadst kept thy wind for thy running this two years past. Thou wouldst make as good a talker among the Witan as Godwin himself. Thou givest it us all, word for word, and voice and gesture withal, as if thou wert King Edward's French chancellor.'

Martin smiled. 'I am like Falada the horse, my lords, who could only speak to his own true princess. Why I held my tongue of late was only lest they should cut my head off for talking, as they did poor Falada's.'

'Thou art a very crafty knave,' said Brand, and hast had clerk-learning in thy time, I can see, and made bad use of it. I misdoubt very much that thou art some runaway monk.'

'That am I not, by St Peter's chains!' said Martin, in an eager, terrified voice. 'Lord Hereward, I came hither as your father's messenger and servant. You will see me safe out of this abbey, like an honourable gentleman.'

'I will. All I know of him, uncle, is that he used to tell me stories, when I was a boy, of enchanters and knights and dragons, and such-like, and got into trouble for filling my head with such fancies. Now let him tell his story in peace.'

'He shall. But I misdoubt the fellow very much. He talks as if he knew Latin, and what business has a foot-running slave to do that?'

So Martin went on, somewhat abashed. "And," said your father, "justice I will have, and leave injustice, and the over looking of it, to those who wish to profit thereby."

'And at that Godwin smiled, and said to the king, "The earl is wise, as usual, and speaks like a very Solomon. Your Majesty must, in spite of your own tenderness of heart, have these letters of outlawry made out."

'Then all our men murmured—and I as loud as any. But old Surturbrand the housecarle did more, for out he stepped to your father's side, and spoke right up before the king.

"Bonny times," he said, "I have lived to see, when a lad of Earl Oslac's blood is sent out of the land, a beggar and a wolf's head for playing a boy's trick or two, and upsetting a shaveling priest! We managed such wild young colts better, we Vikings who conquered the Danelagh. If Canute had had a son like Hereward—as would to God he had had—he would have dealt with him as old Swend Forkbeard (God grant I meet him in Valhalla, in spite of all priests!) did by Canute himself when he was young, and kicked and plunged awhile at being first bitten and saddled."

"What does the man say?" asked the king, for old Surturbrand was talking broad Danish.

"He is a housecarle of mine, Lord King, a good man and true, but old age and rough Danish blood have made him forget that he stands before kings and earls."

"By the head of Odin's horse, earl!" says Surturbrand, "I have fought knee to knee beside a braver king than that there, and nobler earls than ever a one here, and was never afraid, like a free Dane, to speak my mind to them by sea or land. And if the king, with his French ways, does not understand a plain man's talk, the two earls yonder do right well, and I say—Deal by this lad in the good old fashion. Give him half a dozen long ships, and what crews he can get together, and said him out, as Canute would have done, to seek his fortune like a Viking, and if he comes home with plenty of wounds and plunder, give him an earldom as he deserves. Do you ask your countess, Earl Godwin—she is of the right Danish blood, God bless her! though she is your wife—and see if she does not know how to bring a naughty lad to his senses."

"Then Harold the earl said: "The old man is right, king, listen to what he says." And he told them all, quite eagerly."

"How did you know that? Can you understand French?"

"I am a poor idiot, give me a halfpenny," said Martin in a doleful voice, as he threw into his face and whole figure a look of helpless stupidity and awkwardness, which set them both laughing.

But Hereward checked himself. "And then thinkest he was in earnest?"

"As sure as there are holy crows in Crowland. But it was of no use. Your father got a parchment, with an outlandish Norman seal hanging to it, and sent me off with it that same night to give to the lawman. So wolf's head you are, my lord, and there is no use crying over spilt milk."

"And Harold spoke for me? Not that I care, but it will be as well to tell Abbot Leofric that, in case he be inclined to turn traitor, and refuse to open the gates. Once outside them, I fear not mortal man."

"My poor boy, there will be many a one whom thou hast wronged only too ready to be in wait for thee, now thy life is in every man's hand. If the outlawry is published, thou hadst best start to-night, and get past Lincoln before morning."

"I shall stay quietly here, and get a good night's rest, and then ride out to-morrow morning in the face of the whole shire. No, not a word! You would not have me sneak away like a coward!"

Brand smiled and shrugged his shoulders, being very much of the same mind.

"At least, go north!"

"And why north?"

"You have no quarrel in Northumberland, and the king's wit runs very slowly there, if at all. Old Sward Digne may stand your friend."

"He? he is a fast friend of my father's."

"What of that? the old Viking will like you none the less for having shown a touch of his own temper. Go to him, I say, and tell him that I sent you."

"But he is fighting the Scots beyond the Forth."

"So much the better. There will be good work for you to do. And Gilbert of Ghent is up there too, I hear, trying to settle himself among the Scots. He is your mother's kinsman, and as for your being an outlaw, he wants hard hitters and hard riders, and all is fish that comes to his net. Find him out too, and tell him that I sent you."

"You are a good old uncle," said Hereward. "Why were you not a soldier?"

Brand laughed somewhat sadly.

"If I had been a soldier, lad, where wouldst thou have looked for a friend this day? No God has done what was moreiful with me and my sin. May He do the same by thee and thine."

Hereward made an impatient movement. He disliked any word which seemed likely to soften his own hardness of heart. But he kissed his uncle lovingly on both cheeks.

"By the hye, Martin—any message from my lady mother?"

"None!"

"Quite right and pious. I am an enemy to Holy Church and therefore to her. Good-night, uncle."

"Hey?" asked Brand, "who is that footman Martin you call him? I must have another word with him."

But Martin was gone.

"No matter. I shall question him sharply enough to-morrow, I warrant."

And Hereward went out to his lodging while the good prior went to his prayers.

When Hereward entered his room, Martin started out of the darkness, and followed him in. Then he shut the door carefully, and pulled out a bag.

"There was no message from my lady but there was this."

The bag was full of money.

"Why did you not tell me of this before?"

"Never show money before a monk."

"Villain! would you mistrust my uncle?"

"Any man with a shaven crown. St Peter is his God, and Lord, and conscience, and if he saw but the shine of a penny, for St Peter he would wint it."

"And he shall have it," quoth Hereward, and flung out of the room, and into his uncle's.

"Uncle, I have money. I have come to pay back what I took from the steward, and as much more into the bargain." And he told out eight and-thirty pieces.

"Thank God and all His saints!" cried Brand, weeping abundantly for joy, for he had acquired, by long devotion, the domum lacrymarum—that lachrymose and somewhat hysterical temperament common among pious monks, and held to be a mark of grace.

"Blessed St. Peter, thou art repaid, and thou wilt be merciful."

Brand believed, in common with all monks then, that Hereward had robbed, not merely the abbey of Peterborough, but what was more, St. Peter himself, thereby converting into an impudable and intercessor for the chief of the Apostles, the rock on which was founded the whole Church.

"Now, uncle," said Hereward, "do me one good deed in return. Promise me that, if you can help it, none of my poor housecarles shall suffer for my sin. I led them into trouble. I am punished. I have made restitution—at least to St. Peter. See that my father and mother, if they be the Christians they call themselves, forgive and forget all offences except mine."

'I will so help me all saints and our Lord
Oh, my boy, my boy, thou shouldst have been a king's thane and not an outlaw!'

And he hurried off with the news to the abbot.
When Hereward returned to his room, Marian was gone.

'Farewell, good men of Peterborough,' said Hereward, as he leapt into the saddle next morning. 'I had made a vow against you, and came to try you, and see whether you would force me to fulfil it or not. But you have been so kind that I have half repented thereof, and the evil shall not come in the days of Abbot Leofric, nor of Brand the prior, though it may come in the days of Herlun the steward, if he live long enough.'

'What meanest thou, incarnate fiend, only fit to worship Thor and Odin?' asked Brand.

'That I would burn Goldenborough, and Herlun the steward within it, ere I die. I fear
I shall do it. I fear I must do it. Ten years ago came Lammias Herlun bade light the pentstack under me, do you recollect?'

'And so he did, the brand!' quoth Brand.
'I had forgotten that.'

'Little Hereward never forgets foe or friend.
Ever since, on Lammias night, hold still, horse!
- I dream of fire and flame, and of Golden-borough in the glare of it. If it is written in the big book, happen it must, if not, so much the better for Goldenborough, for it is a pretty place, and honest Englishmen in it. Only see that there be not too many Frenchmen crept in when I come back, beside our French friend Herlun, and see, too, that there be not a pentstack handy at the Bulldyke-gate—a word is enough to wise men like you. Good-bye!'

'God help thee, thou sinful boy!' said the abbot.

'Hereward, Hereward! come back,' cried Brand.
But the boy had spurred his horse through the gateway, and was far down the road.

'Leofric, my friend,' said Brand sadly, 'this is my sin, and no man's else. And heavy penance will I do for it, till that lad returns in peace.'

'You sin!'

'Minc, abbot. I persuaded his mother to send him hither to be a monk. Alas! alas!
How long will men try to be wiser than He who maketh men?'

'I do not understand thee,' quoth the abbot.
And no more he did.

It was four o'clock on a May morning when Hereward set out to see the world, with good armour on his back, good weapon by his side, good horse between his knees, and—rare luxury in those penniless, though otherwise plentiful days—good money in his purse. What could a lad of eighteen want more, who under the harsh family rule of those times had known nothing of a father's, and but too little of a mother's, love? He rode away westward, avoiding, of course, Kesteven and Bourne. Through Milton woods he rode, and lingered but one moment, as he crossed the King Street at Castor Haughlands, to glance up the straight Roman road which led toward his home. That led to the old world. He was going to the new, and he pricked his horse gaily on through Bainton woods, struck the Ermine Street on Southorpe Heath, and so on towards the Welland, little dreaming that on those open volds a palace would one day arise, beside which King Edward's new Hall at Westminster would show but as a tything-barn, and that the great patriot who would build that palace would own as his birthplace the very house from which Hereward fled that day.

Over the Welland to Brig Casterton, where Dick Tuppyn crossed in after times, like him avoiding Stamford town, and then up the Ermine Street, through princely glades of mighty oak and ash, with holly and thorn beneath, swarming with game, which was as highly preserved then as now, under Canute's severe forest laws. The yellow oaks stood and stared at him knee deep in the young fern, the pheasant called his hens out to feed in the dewy grass, the blackbird and thrush sang out from every bough, the wood-lark tilled above the high oak tops, and sank down on them as his song sank down. And Hereward rode on, rejoicing in it all. It was a fine world in the Brimeswald. What was it then outside? Not to him, as to us, a world circular, round, circum-scribed, mapped, botanised, zoologised, a tiny planet about which everybody knows, or thinks they know, everything, but a world infinite, mystical, supernatural, because unknown, a vast flat plain reaching no one knew whence or where, save that the mountains stood on the four corners thereof to keep it steady, and the four winds of heaven blew out of them, and in the centre, which was to him the Brimeswald, such things as he saw but beyond, things unspeakable—dragons, giants, rocs, orcs, witch whyles, griffins, chimeras, satyrs, onchiders, Pygmies, Saracens, towers and Sultans, Kaisers of Constantinople, Kaisers of Ind and of Cathay, and beyond them ignom of lands as yet unknown. At the very least he could go to Brittany, to the forest of Broche-saunde, where (so all men said) barres might be seen bathing in the fountains, and possibly be won and wedded by a bold and dexterous knight, after the fashion of Sir Grucel. What was there not to be seen and conquered? Where would he go? Where would he not go? For the spirit of Odin the Goer, the spirit which has sent his children round the world, was strong within him. He would go to Iceland, to the Ostmen, or Irish Danes, at Dublin, Waterford, or Cork, and marry some beautiful Irish princess with gray eyes, and raven locks, and saffron smock, and great gold bracelets from her native hills. No, he would go off to the Orkneys, and join Binn and Ranaid, and the Vikings of 1 Wace, author of the Roman de Rou, went to Brittany a generation later, to see those same fairies, but had no sport, and sang—

'Fol i alai, fol m'en revins, Folle quia, por fol me tina.'

the northern seas, and all the hot blood which had found even Norway too hot to hold it, he would sail through witch-whales and icebergs to Iceland and Greenland, and the sunny lands which they said lay even beyond, across the all but unknown ocean. Or he would go up the Heltie to the Joinaburg Vikings, and fight against Lett and Esthoman heathen, and pierce inland, perhaps, through Puleyn and the bison forests, to the land from whence came the magic swords and the old Persian coins which he had seen so often in the halls of his forefathers. No, he would go south, to the land of sun and wine, and see the magicians of Cordova and Seville, and heard Mussulman hounds worshipping their Mahomets, and perhaps bring home an Emir's daughter,

'With more gay gold about her middle,
Than would buy half Northumberland'

Or he would go up the Straits, and on to Constantinople and the great Kaiser of the Greeks, and join the Varanger Guard, and perhaps, like Harold Hardraade in his own days, after being cast to the lion for carrying off a fair Greek lady, tear out the monster's tongue with his own hands, and show the Easterns what a Viking's son could do. And as he dreamed of the infinite world and its infinite wonders, the enchanters he might meet, the jewels he might find, the adventures he might essay, he held that he must succeed in all, with hope and wit, and a strong arm, and forgot altogether that, mixed up with the cosmogony of an infinite flat plain called the earth, there was joined also the belief in a flat roof above called heaven, on which (seen at times in visions through clouds and stars) sat saints, angels, and archangels, for evermore harping off their golden harps, and knowing neither vanity nor vexation of spirit, lust nor pride, murder nor war, and underneath a floor, the name whereof was hell, the months whereof (as all men knew) might be seen on Hecla, Etua, and Stromboli, and the fiends heard within, tormenting, amid fire, and smoke, and clanking chains, the souls of the endlessly lost.

As he rode on, slowly though cheerfully, as a man who will not tire his horse at the beginning of a long day's journey, and knows not where he shall pass the night, he was aware of a man on foot coming up behind him at a slow, steady, loping, wolf-like trot, which in spite of its slowness gained ground on him so fast, that he saw at once that the man could be no common runner.

The man came up, and behold, he was none other than Martin Lightfoot.

'What! art thou here?' asked Hereward suspiciously, and half cross at seeing any visitor from the old world which he had just cast off.

'How gottest thou out of St. Peter's last night?' Martin's tongue was hanging out of his mouth like a running hound's, but he seemed, like a hound, to perspire through his mouth, for he answered without the least sign of distress, without even pulling in his tongue

'Over the wall, the moment the prior's back was turned. I was not going to wait till I was chained up in some rat's hole with a half-hundred of iron on my leg, and flogged till I confessed that I was what I am not—a runaway monk.'

'And why art here?'

'Because I am going with you.'

'Going with me?' said Hereward. 'What can I do for thee?'

'I can do for you,' said Martin.

'What?'

'Groom your horse, wash your shirt, clean your weapons, find your inn, fight your enemies, cheat your friends—anything and everything. You are going to see the world. I am going with you.'

'Thou canst be my servant? A right slippery one, I expect,' said Hereward, looking down on him with some suspicion.

'Some are not the rogues they seem. I can keep my secrets and yours too.'

'Before I can trust thee with my secrets, I shall expect to know some of thine,' said Hereward.

Martin Lightfoot looked up with a cunning smile. 'A man can always know his master's secrets if he likes. But that is no reason a master should know his man's.'

'Thou shalt tell me things, man, or I shall ride off and leave thee.'

'Not so easy, my lord. Where that heavy horse can go, Martin Lightfoot can follow. But I will tell you one secret, which I never told to living man. I can read and write like any clerk.'

'Thou read and write?'

'Ay, good Latin enough, and French, and Irish too, what is more. And now because I love you, and because you I will serve, willy nilly, I will tell you all the secrets I have, as long as my breath lasts, for my tongue is rather still after that long story about the bell-wether. I was born in Ireland, in Waterford town. My mother was an English slave, one of those that Earl Godwin's wife—not this one that is now, Gyda, but the old one—used to sell out of England by the score, tied together with ropes, boys and girls from Bristol town.¹ Her master, my father that was (I shall know him again), got tired of her, and wanted to give her away to one of his kernes. She would not have that, so he hung her up hand and foot, and beat her that she died. There was an abbey hard by, and the Church laid on him a penance—all that they dared get out of him—that he should give me to the monks, being then a seven-years' boy. Well, I grew up in that abbey, they taught me my fa fa mi fa, but I liked better conning ballads and hearing stories of ghosts and enchanters, such as I used to tell you. I'll tell you plenty more whenever you're tired. Then they made me work, and that I never could abide at all. Then they beat me every day; and that I could abide still less, but always I stoek to my book, for one thing I saw—that learning is power, my lord, and that the reason why the monks are masters of the land is, they are scholars, and you fighting men are none. Then I fell in love (as young blood will) with an Irish lass, when I was full seventeen years old, and when they found out that, they held me down on the floor and beat me till I was well-nigh dead. They put me in prison for a month, and between bread-and-water and darkness I went nigh foolish. They let me out, thinking I could do no more harm to man or law, and when I found out how profitable folly was, foolish I remained, at least as foolish as seemed good to me. But one night I got into the abbey church, stole therefrom that which I have with me now, and which shall serve you and me in good stead yet—out and away aboard a ship among the buscarles, and off into the Norway sea. But after a voyage or two, so it befell, I was wrecked in the Wash by Botulfston Deeps, and begging my way inland, met with your father, and took service with him, as I have taken service now with you.

'Now, what has made thee take service with me?'

'Because you are you.'

'Give me none of thy parables and dark sayings, but speak out like a man. What canst see in me that thou shouldst share an outlaw's fortune with me?'

'I had run away from a monastery, so had you. I hated the monks, so did you. I liked to tell stories—since I found good to shut my mouth I tell them to myself all day long, sometimes all night too. When I found out you liked to hear them, I loved you all the more. Then they told me not to speak to you, I held my tongue. I bided my time. I knew you would be outlawed some day. I knew you would turn Viking and kemperry-man, and kill giants and enchanters, and win yourself honour and glory, and I knew I should have my share in it. I knew you would need me some day, and you need me now, and here I am, and if you try to cut me down with your sword, I will dodge you, and follow you, and dodge you again, till I force you to let me be your man. I never loved you as I do now. You let me take that letter safe, like a true hero. You let yourself be outlawed like a true hero. You made up your mind to see the world like a true hero. You are the master for me, and with you I will live and die. And now I can talk no more.'

'And with me thou shalt live and die,' said Hereward, pulling up his horse, and frankly holding out his hand to his new friend.

Martin Lightfoot took his hand, kissed it, hoked it almost, as a dog would have done. 'I am your man,' he said, 'amon, and true man I will prove to you, if you will prove true to me.' And he dropped quietly back behind Hereward's horse, as if the business of his life was settled, and his mind utterly at rest.

'There is one more likeness between us,' said

Hereward, after a few minutes' thought. 'If I have robbed a church, thou hast robbed one too. What is this precious spoil which is to serve me and thee in such mighty stead?'

Martin drew from inside his shirt and under his waistband a small battle-axe and handed it up to Hereward. It was a tool the like of which in shape Hereward had seldom seen, and never its equal in beauty. The handle was some fifteen inches long, made of thick strips of black whalobone, curiously bound with silver, and buttied with narwhal ivory. This handle was evidently the work of some cunning Norseman of old. But who had been the maker of the blade? It was some eight inches long, with a sharp edge on one side, a sharp crooked pick on the other, of the finest steel, inlaid with strange characters in gold, the work probably of some Circassian, Tartar, or Persian, such a battle-axe as Rustinn or Zohrab may have wielded in fight on the banks of Oxus, one of those magic weapons, brought, men knew not how, out of the magic East, which were hereditary in many a Norse family, and sung of in many a Norse saga.

'Look at it,' said Martin Lightfoot. 'There is magic in it. It must bring us luck. Whoever holds that must kill his man. It will pick a lock of steel. It will crack a mail corselet as a nut-hatch cracks a nut. It will hew a lance in two at a single blow. Devils and spirits forged it—I know that, Virgilus the Enchanter, perhaps, or Solomon the Great, or whosoever's name is on it, graven there in letters of gold. Handle it, feel its balance, but no—do not handle it too much. There is a devil in it, who would make you kill me. Whenever I play with it I long to kill a man. It would be so easy—so easy. Give it me back, my lord, give it me back, lest the devil come through the handle into your palm, and possess you.'

Hereward laughed, and gave him back his battle-axe. But he had hardly less doubt of the magic virtues of such a blade than had Martin himself.

'Magical or not, thou wilt not have to hit a man twice with that, Martin, my lad. So we two outlaws are both well armed, and having neither wife nor child, land nor beeves to lose, ought to be a match for any six honest men who may have a grudge against us, and yet have sound reasons at home for running away.'

And so those two went northward through the green Buneswald, and northward through merry Sherwood, and were not seen in that land again for many a year.

CHAPTER II

HOW HERWARD SLEW THE BEAR¹

Of Hereward's doings for the next few months nought is known. He may very likely have joined Siward in the Scotch war. He may have looked, wondering, for the first time in his life, upon the bones of the old world, where they rise at Dunkeld out of the lowlands of the Tay, and have trembled lest the black crags of Binnam should topple on his head with all their pines. He may have marched down from that famous leaguer with the Gospatrics and Dolphines, and the rest of the kindred of Crinan, and of Siward, of the murdered Duncan, and the outraged Silalla. He may have helped himself to bring Binnam Wood to Dunmure on the day of the Seven Sleepers, and heard Siward, when his son Asbjorn's corpse was carried into camp, ask only, 'Has he all his wounds in front?' He may have seen old Siward, after Macbeth's defeat (not death, as Shakespeare relates the story), go back to Northumbria 'with such booty as no man had obtained before,' a proof—if the fact be true—that the Scotch lowlands were not, in the eleventh century, the poor and barbarous country which some have reported them to have been.

¹ This story of the bear is likely not to be a myth, but

All this is not only possible, but probable enough, though the chroniclers, the chroniclers, however, are silent. They only say that Hereward was in those days beyond Northumberland with Gilbert of Ghent.

Gisbert, Gislebert, Gilbert, Guibert, Goslicht, of Ghent,¹ who afterwards won, by chance of war, many a fair maiden in Lincolnshire and elsewhere, was one of those valiant Flemings who settled along the east and north-east coast of Scotland in the eleventh century. They fought with the Celtic Macdonnells, and then married with their daughters, got to themselves lands by the title-deed of the sword, and so became—the famous Freskin the Fleming especially—the ancestors of the best aristocracy, both physically and intellectually, in the world. They had their connections, moreover, with the Norman court of Rouen, through the Duchesses among the most authentic of Hereward's famous deeds. So likewise is the story of the Cornish princess, and of his deeds in Flanders. For Richard of Ely, if I understand him rightly, says that he got his information from the actual MSS. of Loufrie of Boucon, Hereward's missus priest, 'up to the place where he came home again; and more was than the average of monk writers, kept to the crude matter, too little compressed and ornate by the care of any English intellect, or by dialect and the like enigmas.' For 'always he was deluded by vain hope, or from the beginning, by folks saying that in this place and that is a great book about the same Cornish deeds,' which book never appearing, he seems to have finished his work from popular tradition, leaving, to do him justice, the dialect and rhetorical enigmas to be added by the author of the Liber Hibernie. But, like him, wandering sadly in his chronology, I have retained every detail, I believe, which he gives in the earlier part of his story, as valuable and all but unique sketches of the manners of the eleventh century.

¹ Shakespeare calls his son 'young Siward.' He, too, was slain in the battle, but he was old Siward's nephew.

² Our English genealogists make him son of Baldwin of Meos and Richilda of Hainsnit, which is a manifest error. Mr. Forster, in his learned notes to Ordericus Vitalis, says that he was son of Balf, the Lord of Alost, and confirms the story that his eldest son died prematurely. He may have been nevertheless a near relation of the Marquis Baldwin.

Matilda, daughter of their old Seigneur, Baldwin Marquis of Flanders, their connections, too, with the English Court, through Countess Judith, wife of Earl Tosti Godwinsson, another daughter of Baldwin's. Their friendship was sought, their enmity feared, far and wide throughout the north. They seem to have been, with the instinct of true Flemings, civilisers, and cultivators, and traders, as well as conquerors, they were in those very days bringing to order and tillage the rich lands of the north-east, from the Firth of Moray to that of Forth, and forming a rampart for Scotland against the invasions of Swayn, Harthraute, and all the wild Vikings of the northern seas.

Amongst them, in those days, Gilbert of Ghent seems to have been a notable personage, to judge from the great house which he kept, and the 'miles tyrannus,' or squires in training for the honour of knighthood, who fed at his table. Where he lived, the chroniclers report not. To them the country 'ultra Northumbriam,' beyond the Forth, was as Russia or Cathay, where

'Geographers in pathless dories
Pit ch plants for west of towns.'

As indeed it was to that French map-maker who, as late as the middle of the eighteenth century (not having learned Aberdeen or Elgin), left all the country north of the Tay a blank, with the inscription—'Terra innotata scilicet, habite par les Highlanders.'

Wherever Gilbert lived, however, he heard that Hereward was outlawed, and sent for him, says the story,¹ saying, it would seem, some connection with his father. And there he lived, doubtless happily enough, fighting Celts and hunting deer, so that as yet the pains and penalties of exile did not press very hardly upon him. The handsome, petulant, good-humoured lad had become in a few weeks the darling of Gilbert's ladies, and the envy of all his knights and gentlemen. Hereward the singer, harp-player, dancer, Hereward the rider and hunter, was in all mouths. But he himself was discontented at having as yet taken in with no adventure worthy of a man, and he looked enviously and longingly at the menagerie of wild beasts enclosed in strong wooden cages, which Gilbert kept in one corner of the great courtyard, not for any scientific purposes, but to try with them, at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, the mettle of the young gentlemen who were candidates for the honour of knighthood. But after looking over the bulls and stags, wolves and bears, Hereward settled it in his mind that there was none worthy of his steel, save one huge white bear, whom no man had yet dared to face, and whom Hereward, indeed, had never seen, hidden as he was all day within the old oven-shaped Pict's house of stone, which had been turned into his den. There was a mystery about the uncanny brute which charmed Hereward. He was said to be half human, perhaps wholly human, to be a son of the Fairy Bear, near kinsman, if not brother, nephew, or cousin, of Siward Digre himself. He had, like his fairy father, iron claws, he had human intellect, and understood human speech, and the arts of war,—at least so all in the place believed, and not as absurdly as at first sight seems.

For the brown bear, and much more the white, was, among the Northern nations, in himself a creature magical and superhuman. 'He is God's dog,' whispered the Lapp, and called him, 'the old man in the fur cloak,' afraid to use his right name, even inside the tent, for fear of his overhearing and avenging the insult. 'He has twelve men's strength, and eleven men's wit,' sang the Norseman, and paraded himself accordingly, like a true Norseman, on outwitting and slaying the enchanted monster.

Terrible was the brown bear, but more terrible 'the white sea-leop,' as the Saxons called him, the horned Hyman, the whale's bane, the seal's dread, the rider of the neberg, the sailor of the floe, who ranged for his prey under the six months' night lighted by Snitir's fires, even to the gates of Musgillheim. To slay him was a feat worthy of Beowulf's self, and the greatest wonder, perhaps, among all the wealth of Crowland, was the twelve white bear skins which lay before the altars, the gift of the great Caunter. How Gilbert had obtained his white bear, and why he kept him there in durance vile, was a mystery over which men shook their heads. Again and again Hereward asked his host to let him try his strength against the monster of the North. Again and again the shrieks of the ladies, and Gilbert's own pity for the strapping youth, brought a refusal. But Hereward settled it in his heart, nevertheless, that somehow or other, when Christmas time came round, he would extract from Gilbert, drunk or sober, leave to fight that bear, and then either make himself a name, or die like a man.

Meanwhile Hereward made a friend. Among all the ladies of Gilbert's household, however kind they were inclined to be to him, he took a fancy only to one—a little girl of ten years old. Alfrida was her name. He liked to amuse himself with this child, without, as he feared, any danger of falling in love, for already his dreams of love were of the highest and most fantastic, and an Emn's daughter, or a Princess of Constantinople, were the very lowest game at which he meant to fly. Alfrida was beautiful, too, exceedingly, and precocious, and, it may be, vain enough to repay his attentions in good earnest. Moreover she was English, as he was, and royal likewise, a relation of Elfgiva, daughter of Ethelred, once King of England. She, as all know, married Uelhtred, Prince of Northumberland, the grandfather of Gospatrik, Earl of Northumberland, and ancestor of all the Dunbars.¹ Between the English lad, then, and the English maiden grew up in a few weeks an innocent friendship, which had almost become more than friendship, through the intervention of the Fairy Bear.

For as Hereward was coming in one afternoon from hunting, hawk on fist, with Martin Light-foot trutting behind, crane and heron, duck and hare, slung over his shoulder, on reaching the courtyard gates he was aware of screams and shouts within, tumult and terror among man and beast. Hereward tried to force his horse in at the gate. The beast stopped and turned, snorting with fear, and no wonder, for in the midst of the courtyard stood the Fairy Bear, his white mane bristled up till he seemed twice as big as any of the sober brown bears which Hereward yet had seen. His long snake neck and cruel visage wreathing about in search of prey. A dead horse, its back broken by a single blow of the paw, and two or three writhing dogs, showed that the beast had turned (like too many of his human kindred in those days) 'Baserker'. The courtyard was utterly empty, but from the ladies' bower came shrieks and shouts, not only of women but of men, and knocking at the bower door, adding her screams to those inside, was a little white figure, which Hereward recognised as Alfrida's. They had barricaded themselves inside, leaving the child out, and now dared not open the door, as the bear swung and rolled towards it, looking savagely right and left for a fresh victim.

Hereward leaped from his horse, and drawing his sword, rushed forward with a shout which made the bear turn round.

He looked once back at the child, then round again at Hereward, and making up his mind to take the largest morsel first, made straight at him with a growl which there was no mistaking.

He was within two paces, then he rose on his hind legs a head and shoulders taller than Hereward, and lifted the non talons high in air. Hereward knew that there was but one spot at which to strike, and he struck true and strong, before the iron paw could fall, right on the muzzle of the monster.

He heard the dull crash of the steel, he felt the sword jammed tight. He shut his eyes for an instant, fearing lest, as in dreams, his blow had come to nought, lest his sword had turned aside, or melted like water in his hand, and the next moment would find him crushed to earth, blinded and stunned. Something tugged at his sword. He opened his eyes, and saw the huge carcass bend, reel, roll slowly over to one side, dead, tearing out of his hand the sword, which was firmly fixed into the skull.

Hereward stood a while staring at the beast like a man astounded at what he himself had done. He had had his first adventure, and he had conquered. He was now a champion in his own right—a hero of the horses—one who might take rank, if he went on, beside Beowulf, Frotho, Ragnar Lodbrog, or Harold Hardraade. He had done this deed. What was there after this which he might not do? And he stood there in the fulness of his pride, defiant of earth and heaven, while in his heart arose the thought of that old Viking who cried, in the pride of his godlessness, 'I never on earth met him whom I feared, and why should I fear him in heaven? If I met Odin I would fight with Odin. If Odin were the stronger he would slay me, if I were the stronger I would slay him.' There he stood, staring, and dreaming over renown to come, a true pattern of the half-savage hero of those rough times, capable of all vices except cowardice, and capable, too, of all virtues save humility.

'Do you not see,' said Martin Lightfoot's voice close by, 'that there is a fair lady trying to thank you, while you are so rude or so proud that you will not vouchsafe her one look?'

It was true. Little Alfruda had been clinging to him for five minutes past. He took the child up in his arms and kissed her with pure kisses, which for a moment softened his hard heart, then setting her down, he turned to Martin.

'I have done it, Martin.'

'Yes, you have done it, I spied you. What will the old folks at home say to this?'

'What care I?'

Martin Lightfoot shook his head, and drew out his knife.

'What is that for?' said Hereward.

'When the master kills the game, the knave can but skin it. We may sleep warm under this fur in many a cold night by sea and moor.'

'Nay,' said Hereward, laughing, 'when the master kills the game, he must first carry it home. Let us take him and set him up against the bower door there, to astonish the brave knights inside.' And stooping down, he attempted to lift the huge carcass—but in vain. At last, with Martin's help, he got it fairly on his shoulders, and the two dragged their burden to the bower, and dashed it against the door, shouting with all their might to those within to open it.

Windows, it must be remembered, were in those days so few and far between, that the folks inside had remained quite unaware of what was going on without.

The door was opened cautiously enough, and out looked, to the shame of knighthood, be it said, two or three knights who had taken shelter in the bower with the ladies. Whatever they were going to say the ladies forestalled, for, rushing out across the prostrate bear, they overwhelmed Hereward with prayers, thanks, and, after the straightforward custom of those days, with substantial kisses.

'You must be knighted at once,' cried they. 'You have knighted yourself by that single blow.'

'A pity then,' said one of the knights to the others, 'that he had not given that accolade to himself, instead of to the bear.'

'Unless some means are found,' said another, 'of taking down this boy's conceit, life will soon be not worth having here.'

'Either he must take ship,' said a third, 'and look for adventures elsewhere, or I must.'

Martin Lightfoot heard those words, and knowing that envy and hatred, like all other vices in those rough-hewn times, were apt to take very startling and unmistakable shapes, kept his eye accordingly on those three knights.

'He must be knighted—he shall be knighted, as soon as Sir Gilbert comes home,' said all the ladies in chorus.

'I should be sorry to think,' said Hereward, with the blundering mock humility of a self-conceited boy, 'that I had done anything worthy of such an honour. I hope to win my spurs by greater feats than these.'

A burst of laughter from the knights and gentlemen followed.

'How loud the young cockerel crows after his first scuffle!'

'Hark to him! What will he do next? Eat a dragon? Fly to the moon? Marry the Sophy of Egypt's daughter?'

The last touched Hereward to the quick, for it was just what he thought of doing, and his blood, heated enough already, beat quicker, as some one cried, with the evident intent of picking a quarrel.

'That was meant for us. If the man who killed the bear has not deserved knighthood, what must we have deserved, who have not killed him? You understand his meaning, gentlemen—do not forget it!'

Hereward looked down, and setting his foot on the bear's head, wrenched out of it the sword, which he had left till now, with pardonable pride, fast set in the skull.

Martin Lightfoot, for his part, drew stealthily from his bosom the little magic axe, keeping his eye on the brain-pan of the last speaker.

The lady of the house cried 'Shame!' and ordered the knights away with haughty words and gestures, which, because they were so well deserved, only made the quarrel more deadly.

Then she commanded Hereward to sheath his sword.

He did so, and, turning to the knights, said with all courtesy, 'You mistake me, sirs. You were where brave knights should be, within the beleaguered fortress, defending the ladies. Had you remained outside, and been eaten by the bear, what must have befallen them, had he burst open the door? As for this little lass, whom you left outside, she is too young to requite knight's prowess by lady's love, and therefore beneath your attention, and only fit for the care of a boy like me.' And taking up Alfruda in his arms, he carried her in and disappeared. Who now but Hereward was in all men's mouths? The minstrels made ballads on him, the lassos sang his praises (says the chronicler) as they danced upon the green. Gilbert's lady would need give him the seat, and all the honours, of a belted knight, though knight he was none. And daily and weekly the valiant lad grew and hardened into a valiant man, and a courteous one withal, giving no offence himself, and not over ready to take offence at other men.

The knights were civil enough to him, the ladies more than civil, he hunted, he wrestled, he tilted, he was promised a chance of fighting for glory, as soon as a Highland chief should declare war against Gilbert or drive off his cattle—an event which (and small blame to the Highland chiefs) happened every six months.

No one was so well content with himself as Hereward, and therefore he fancied that the world must be equally content with him, and he was much disconcerted when Martin drew him aside one day, and whispered—

‘If I were my lord, I should wear a mail shirt under my coat to-morrow out hunting.’

‘What!’

‘The arrow that can go through a deer’s blade-bone can go through a man’s.’

‘Who should harm me?’

‘Any man of the dozen who eat at the same table.’

‘What have I done to them? If I had my laugh at them, they had their laugh at me, and we are quits.’

‘There is another score, my lord, which you have forgotten, and that is all on your side.’

‘Eh!’

‘You killed the bear. Do you expect them to forgive you that, till they have repaid you with interest?’

‘Fish!’

‘You do not want for wit, my lord. Use it, and think. What right has a little boy like you to come here, killing bears which grown men cannot kill? What can you expect but just punishment for your insolence—say, a lance between your shoulders while you stoop to drink, as Sigfrid had for daring to tame Brunhild!’ And more, what right have you to come here, and so win the hearts of the ladies, that the lady of all the ladies should say, “If aught happen to my poor boy—and he cannot live long—I would adopt Hereward for my own son, and show his mother what a fool some folks think her.” So, my lord, out on your mail shirt to-morrow, and take care of narrow ways and sharp corners. For to-morrow it will be tried, that I know, before my Lord Gilbert comes back from the Highlands—but by whom, I know not, and care little, seeing that there are half a dozen in the house who would be glad enough of the chance.’

Hereward took his advice, and rode out with three or four knights the next morning into the fir-forest, not afraid, but angry and sad. He was not yet old enough to estimate the virulence of envy, to take ingratitude and treachery for granted. He was to learn the lesson then, as a wholesome chastener to the pride of success. He was to learn it again in later years, as an additional bitterness in the humiliation of defeat, and find out that if a man once fall, or seem to fall, a hundred ours spring up to bark at him, who dared not open their mouths while he was on his legs.

So they rode into the forest, and parted, each with his footman and his dogs, in search of boar and deer, and each had his sport without meeting again for some two hours or more.

Hereward and Martin came at last to a narrow gully, a murderous place enough. Huge fir-trees roofed it in, and made a night of noon. High banks of earth and great boulders walled it in right and left for twenty feet above. The track, what with pack-horses’ feet, and what with the wear and tear of five hundred years’ rainfall, was a rut three feet deep and two feet broad, in which no horse could turn. Any other day Hereward would have cantered down it with merely a tightened rein. To-day he turned to Martin, and said—

‘A very fit and proper place for this same treason unless thou hast been drinking beer and thinking beer.’

But Martin was nowhere to be seen.

A pebble thrown from the right bank struck him, and he looked up. Martin’s face was peering through the heather overhead, his finger on his lips. Then he pointed cautiously, first up the pass, then down.

Hereward felt that his sword was loose in the sheath, and then gripped his lance, with a heart beating, but not with fear.

The next moment he heard the rattle of a horse’s hoofs behind him, looked back, and saw a knight charging desperately down the gully, his bow in hand, and arrow drawn to the head.

To turn was impossible. To stop, even to walk on, was to be ridden over and hurled to the ground helplessly. To gain the mouth of the gully, and then turn on his pursuer, was his only chance. For the first and almost the last time in his life, he struck spurs into his horse and ran away. As he went, an arrow struck him sharply in the back, piercing the corselet, but hardly entering the flesh. As he neared the mouth, two other knights crashed their horses through the brushwood from right and left, and stood awaiting him, their spears ready to strike. He was caught in a trap. A shield might have saved him, but he had none.

He did not flinch. Dropping his reins, and driving in the spurs once more, he met them in full shock. With his left hand he thrust aside the left-hand lance, with his right he hurled his own with all his force at the right-hand foe, and saw it pass clean through the felon’s chest, while his lance-point dropped, and passed harmlessly.

So much for lances in front. But the knight behind? Would not his sword the next moment be through his brain?

There was a clatter, a crash, and looking back, Hereward saw horse and man rolling in the rut, and rolling with them Martin Lightfoot. He had already pumed the knight’s head against the steep bank, and, with uplifted axe, was meditating a pick at his face which would have stopped alike his love-making, and his fighting.

‘Hold thy hand,’ shouted Hereward. ‘Let us see who he is, and remember that he is at least a knight.'

'But one that will rule no more to-day I finished his horse going as I rolled down the bank'

It was true. He had broken the poor beast's leg with a blow of the axe, and they had to kill the horse out of pity ere they left.

Martin dragged his prisoner forward

'You?' said Hereward. 'And I saved your life three days ago.'

'The knight answered nothing

'You will have to walk home. Let that be punishment enough for you.' And he turned. 'He will have to ride in a woodman's cart, if he have the luck to find one.'

The third knight had fled, and after him the dead man's horse. Hereward and his men rode home in peace, and the wounded man, after trying vainly to walk a mile or two, fell and lay, and was fain to fulfil Martin's prophecy, and he brought home in a cart, to bury for years after, like Sir Lancelot, the nickname of the Chevalier de la Chasteté.

And so was Hereward avenged of his enemies, and began to win for himself the famous sobriquet of 'Wake', the Watcher whom no man ever took unawares. Judicial, even private inquiry into the matter there was none. That gentlemen should meet in the forest, try to commit murder on each other's bodies, was rather too common a mishap to stir up more than an extra gossiping among the women, and an extra cursing among the men, and as the former were all on Hereward's side, his plain story was taken as it stood.

'And now, fair lady,' said Hereward to his hostess, 'I must thank you for your hospitality, and bid you farewell for ever and a day.'

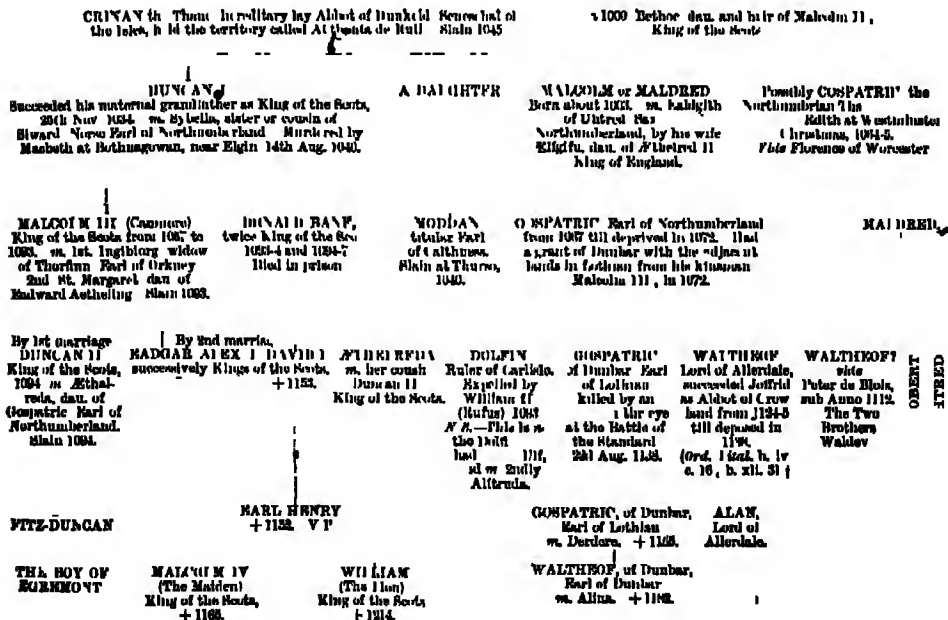

She wept, and entreated him only to stay till her lord came back, but Hereward was firm.

'You, lady, and your good lord will I ever love, and at your service my sword shall over be laid not here. Ill blood I will not make. Among traitors I will not dwell. I have killed two of them, and shall have to kill two of their kinsmen next, and then two more, till you have no knights left, and pity that would be. No, the world is wide, and there are plenty of good fellows in it who will welcome me without forcing me to wear mail under my coat out hunting.'

And he armed himself cap-à-pié, and rode away. Great was the weeping in the tower, and great the chuckling in the hall, but never saw they Hereward again upon the Scottish shore.

NOTE

I insert below the pedigree of Gospatric and the Dunbars, with many thanks to the gallant Dunbar to whom I owe the greater part thereof. It illustrates that connection between the royal houses of Scotland and of England which influenced so much the course of the Norman Conquest. The singular name Gospatric, or Gospatrick, is, it should be remembered, remarkable as perhaps the earliest instance of an hereditary name. I am sorry to say that Scottish antiquaries can as yet throw no light on its etymology.

CHAPTER III

HOW HEReward SUCCURED A PRINCESS OF CORNWALL.

THE next place in which Hereward appeared was far away on the south-west, upon the Cornish shore. He went into port on board a merchant ship carrying wine, and intending to bring back tin. The merchants had told him of one 'Alef,'¹ a valiant 'regulus,' or kinglet, living at Gweek, up the Helford river, who was indeed a distant connection of Hereward himself, having married, as did so many of the Celtic princes, the daughter of a Danish sea rover of Siward's blood. They told him also that the kinglet increased his wealth, not only by the sale of tin and of red cattle, but by a certain amount of 'summer leding' (i.e. journey between seed-time and harvest) in company with his Danish brothers-in-law from Dublin and Waterford and Hereward, who believed, with most Englishmen of the East Country, that Cornwall still produced a fair crop of giants, some of them with two and even three heads, had hopes that Alef might show him some adventure worthy of his sword. He sailed in, therefore, over a rolling bar, between jagged points of black rock, and up a tide river which wandered and branched away inland like a landlocked lake, between high green walls of oak and ash, till they saw at the head of the tide Alef's town, nestling in a glen which sloped towards the southern sun. They discovered, besides, two ships drawn up upon the beach, whose long lines and snake-heads, beside the stout carved on the beak-head of one, and the adler on that of the other, bore witness to the piratical habits of their owner. The merchants, it seemed, were well known to the Cornishmen on shore, and Hereward went up with them unopposed, past the ugly dykes and muddy leats, where Alef's slaves were gleaning the gravel for tin ore, through rich alluvial pastures spotted with red cattle, and up to Alef's town. Earthworks and stockades surrounded a little church of ancient stone, and a cluster of granite cabins thatched with turf, in which the slaves abode. In the centre of all a vast stone barn, with low walls and high sloping roof, contained Alef's family, treasures, housecarles, horses, cattle, and pigs. They entered at one end between the pigstyes, passed on through the cow-stalls, then through the stables; till they saw before them, dim through the reek of peat-smoke, a long oaken table, at which sat huge dark-haired Cornishmen, with here and there among them the yellow head of a Norseman, who were Alef's following or fighting men. Boiled meat was there in plenty, barley cakes and ale. At the head of the table, on a high-backed settle, was Alef himself, a jolly giant, who was just setting to work to drink himself stupid with mead made from narcotic heather honey. By his side sat a lovely dark-haired girl, with great gold torcs upon her throat and wrists, and a great gold brooch fastening a shawl which had plainly come from the looms of Spain or of the East, and next to her again, feeding her with tit-bits cut off with his own dagger, and laid on barley cake instead of a plate, sat a more gigantic personage even than Alef, the biggest man that Hereward had ever seen, with high cheek-bones and small ferret eyes, looking out from a greasy mass of bright red hair and beard.

No questions were asked of the newcomers. They set themselves down in silence in empty places, and according to the laws of the good old Cornish hospitality, were allowed to eat and drink their fill before they spoke a word.

'Welcome here again, friend,' said Alef at last, in good enough Danish, calling the eldest merchant by name. 'Do you bring wine?'

The merchant nodded.

'And you want tin?'

The merchant nodded again, and lifting his cup drank Alef's health, following it up by a coarse joke in Cornish, which raised a laugh all round.

The Norse trader of those days, it must be remembered, was none of the cringing and effeminate chapmen who figure in the stories of the middle ages. A free Norse or Dane, himself often of noble blood, he fought as willingly as he bought, and held his own as an equal, whether at the court of a Cornish kinglet or at that of the great Kaiser of the Greeks.

'And you, fair sir,' said Alef, looking keenly at Hereward, 'by what name shall I call you, and what service can I do for you? You look more like an earl's son than a merchant, and are come here surely for other things besides tin.'

'Health to King Alef,' said Hereward, raising the cup. 'Who I am I will tell to none but Alef's self, but an earl's son I am, though an outlaw and a rover. My lands are the breadth of my boot sole. My plough is my sword. My treasure is my good right hand. Nothing I have, and nothing I need, save to serve noble kings and earls, and win me a champion's fame. If you have battles to fight, tell me, that I may fight them for you. If you have none, thank God for His peace, and let me eat and drink, and go in peace.'

'King Alef needs neither man nor boy to fight his battle as long as Ironhook¹ sits in his hall.'

It was the red-bearded giant who spoke, in a broken tongue, part Scotch, part Cornish, part Danish, which Hereward could hardly understand. But that the ogre intended to insult him he understood well enough.

Hereward had hoped to find giants in Cornwall, and behold he had found one at once; though rather, to judge from his looks, a Pictish than a Cornish giant, and true to his reckless determination to defy and fight every man and beast who was willing to defy and fight him, he turned on his elbow and stared at Ironhook in scorn, meditating some speech which might provoke the hoped for quarrel.

¹ 'Ulcus Ferrus,' says Richard of Ely, surely a misreading for uncus. The hook was a not uncommon weapon among seamen.

As he did so his eye happily caught that of the fair princess. She was watching him with a strange look, admiring, warning, imploring, and when she saw that he noticed her, she laid her finger on her lip in token of silence, crossed herself devoutly, and then laid her finger on her lip again, as if beseeching him to be patient and silent in the name of the heavenly powers.

Hereward, as is well seen, wanted not for quick wit or for chivalrous feeling. He had observed the rough devotion of the giant to the lady. He had observed, too, that she shrank from it, that she turned away with loathing when he offered her his own cup, while he answered by a dark and deadly scowl.

Was there an adventure here? Was she in duress either from this Ironhook, or from her father, or from both? Did she need Hereward's help? If so, she was so lovely that he could not refuse it. And on the chance, he swallowed down his high stomach, and answered blandly enough.

'One could see without eyes, noble sir, that you were worth any ten common men—but as every one has not like you the luck of so lovely a lady by your side, I thought that perchance you might hand over some of your lesser quarrels to one like me, who has not yet seen so much good fighting as yourself, and enjoy yourself in pleasant company at home, as I should surely do in your place.'

The princess shuddered and turned pale, then looked at Hereward and smiled her thanks. Ironhook laughed a savage laugh.

Hereward's jest being translated into Cornish for the benefit of the company, was highly approved by all, and good humour being restored, every man got drunk save Hereward, who found the meal too sweet and sickening.

After which those who could go to bed, went to bed, not as in England,¹ among the rushes on the floor, but in the bunks or berths of wattle which stood two or three tiers high along the wall.

The next morning, as Hereward went out to wash his face and hands in the brook below (he being the only man in the house who did so), Martin Lightfoot followed him.

'What is it, Martin? Hast thou had too much of that sweet mead last night that thou must come out to cool thy head too?'

'I came out for two reasons—first to see fair play, in case that Ironhook should come to wash his ugly visage, and find you on all fours over the brook—you understand? And next to tell you what I heard last night among the maids.'

'And what didst thou hear?'

'Fine adventures, if we can but compass them. You saw that lady with the carrot-headed fellow? I saw that you saw. Well, if you will believe me, that man has no more gentle blood than I have. He is a No-man's son, a Pict from Galloway, who came down with a pirate crew, and has made himself the master of this drunken old prince, and the darling of all his housecarles, and now will needs be his son-in-law whether he will or not.'

'I thought as much,' said Hereward; 'but how didst thou find out this?'

'I went out and sat with the knaves and the maids, and listened to their harp-playing (and harp they can, these Cornish, like very elves), and then I too sang songs and told them stories, for I can talk their tongue somewhat, till they all blest me for a right good fellow. And then I fell to praising up Ironhook to the women.'

'Praising him up, man?'

'Ay, just because I suspected him, for the women are so contrary that if you speak evil of a man they will surely speak good of him, but if you will only speak good of him, then you will hear all the evil of him he ever has done, and more besides. And thus I heard, that the king's daughter cannot abide him, and would as lief marry a seal.'

'One did not need to be told that,' said Hereward, 'as long as one has eyes in one's head. I will kill the fellow and carry her off, ere four-and-twenty hours be past.'

'Softly, softly, my young master. You need to be told something that your eyes would not tell you, and that is that the poor lass is betrothed already to a son of old King Randal the Ostman, of Waterford, son of old King Sigtryg, who ruled there when I was a boy.'

'He is a kinsman of mine then,' said Hereward.

'All the more reason that I should kill this ruffian.'

'If you can,' said Martin Lightfoot.

'If I can?' retorted Hereward fiercely.

'Well, well, wilful heart must have its way, only take my counsel, speak to the poor young lady first, and see what she will tell you, lest you only make bad worse, and bring down her father and his men on her as well as you.'

Hereward agreed, and resolved to watch his opportunity of speaking to the princess.

As they went in to the morning meal they met Alef. He was in high good humour with Hereward, and all the more so when Hereward told him his name, and how he was the son of Leofric.

'I will warrant you are,' he said, 'by the gray head you carry on green shoulders. No discounter man, they say, in these isles than the old sail.'

'You speak truth, sir,' said Hereward, 'though he be no father of mine now, for of Leofric it is said in King Edward's Court, that if a man ask counsel of him, it is as though he had asked it of the oracles of God.'

'Then you are his true son, young man. I saw how you kept the peace with Ironhook, and I owe you thanks for it; for though he is my good friend, and will be my son-in-law ere long, yet a quarrel with him is more than I can abide.'

just now, and I should not like to have seen my guest and my kinsman slain in my house.'

Hereward would have said that he thought there was no fear of that—but he prudently held his tongue, and having an end to gain, listened instead of talking.

'Twenty years ago, of course, I could have thrashed him as easily as—' but now I am getting old and shaky, and the man has been a great help in need, six kings of these parts has he killed for me, who drove off my cattle, and stopped my tin works, and plundered my monks' cells too, which is worse, while I was away sailing the seas, and he is a right good fellow at heart, though he be a little rough. So be friends with him as long as you stay here, and if I can do you a service I will.'

They went into their morning meal, at which Hereward resolved to keep the peace which he longed to break, and therefore, as was to be expected, broke.

For during the meal the fair lady, with no worse intention perhaps than that of teasing her tyrant, fell to open praises of Hereward's fair face and golden hair, and being insulted therefore by the Ironhook, retaliated by observations about his personal appearance, which were more common in the eleventh century than they happily are now. He, to comfort himself, drank deep of the French wine which had just been brought and broached, and then went out into the courtyard, where in the midst of his admiring fellow-ruffians he enacted a scene as ludicrous as it was pitiable. All the childish vanity of the savage boiled over. He strutted, he shouted, he tossed about his huge limbs, he called for a harper, and challenged all around to dance, sing, leap, fight, do anything against him, meeting with nothing but admiring silence, he danced himself out of breath, and then began boasting once more of his fights, his cruelties, his butcheries, his impossible escapes and victories, till at last, as luck would have it, he espied Hereward, and poured out a stream of abuse against Englishmen and English courage.

'Englishmen,' he said, 'were nought. Had he not slain three of them himself with one blow!'

'Of your mouth, I suppose,' quoth Hereward, who saw that the quarrel must come, and was glad to have it done and over.

'Of my mouth!' roared Ironhook, 'of my sword, man!'

'Of your mouth,' said Hereward. 'Of your brain were they begotten, of the breath of your mouth they were born, and by the breath of your mouth you can slay them again as often as you choose.'

The joke, as it has been handed down to us by the old chroniclers, seems clumsy enough, but it sent the princess, say they, into shrieks of laughter.

'Were it not that my lord Alef was here,' shouted Ironhook, 'I would kill you out of hand.'

'Promise to fight fair, and do your worst.

The more fairly you fight, the more honour you will win,' said Hereward.

Whereupon the two were parted for the while.

Two hours afterwards Hereward, completely armed with helmet and mail shirt, sword and javelin, hurried across the great courtyard with Martin Lightfoot at his heels, towards the little church upon the knoll above. The two wild men entered into the cool darkness, and saw before them by the light of a tiny lamp the crucifix over the altar, and beneath it that which was then believed to be the body of Him who made heaven and earth. They stopped trembling for a moment, bowed themselves before that to them perpetual miracle, and then hurried on to a low doorway to the right, inside which dwelt Alef's chaplain, one of those good Celtic priests who were supposed to represent a Christianity more ancient than, and all but independent of, the then all-absorbing Church of Rome.

The cell was such an one as a convict would now disdain to inhabit. A low lean-to roof, the slates and rafters unciled, the stone walls and floor unplastered, ill lighted by a hand-laid window, unglazed, and closed with a shutter at night. A truss of straw and a rug, the priest's bed, lay in a corner. The only other furniture was a large oak chest, containing the holy vessels and vestments and a few old books. It stood directly under the window for the sake of light, for it served the good priest for both table and chair, and on it he was sitting reading in his book at that minute, the sunshine and the wind streaming in behind his head, doing no good to his rheumatism of thirty years' standing.

'Is there a priest here?' asked Hereward hurriedly.

The old man looked up, shook his head and answered in French.

'Speak to him in Latin, Martin may be he will understand that.'

Martin spoke. 'My lord here wants a priest to shrive him, and that quickly. He is going to fight the great tyrant Ironhook, as you call him.'

'Ironhook?' answered the priest in good Latin enough, 'And he so young! God help him, he is a dead man. What is this? A fresh soul sent to its account by the hands of that man of Belial? Cannot he entreat him, can he not make peace, and save his young life? He is but a stripling, and that man, like Goliath of old, a man of war from his youth up.'

'And my master,' said Martin Lightfoot proudly, 'is like young David—one that can slay a giant and kill him, for he has slain, like David, his lion and his bear ere now. At least, he is one that will neither make peace, nor entreat the face of living man. So shrive him quickly, master priest, and let him begone to his work.'

Poor Martin Lightfoot spoke thus bravely

only to keep up his spirits and his young lord's—for in spite of his confidence in Hereward's prowess, he had given him up for a lost man, and the tears ran down his rugged cheeks as the old priest, rising up and seizing Hereward's two hands in his, besought him, with the passionate and graceful eloquence of his race, to have mercy upon his own youth.

Hereward understood his meaning, though not his words.

'Tell him,' he said to Martin, 'that fight I must, and tell him that shrieve me he must and that quickly. Tell him how the fellow met me in the wood below just now, and would have slain me there, unarmed as I was, and how, when I told him it was a shame to strike a naked man, he told me he would give me but one hour's grace to go, back, on the faith of a gentleman, for my armour and weapons, and meet him there again to die by his hand. So shrieve me quick, sir priest.'

Hereward knelt down. Martin Lightfoot knelt down by him, and with a trembling voice began to interpret for him.

'What does he say?' asked Hereward, as the priest murmured something to himself.

'He said,' quoth Martin, now fairly dumbfounded, 'that, fair and young as you are, your shrift should be as short and as clean as David's.'

Hereward was touched. 'Anything but that,' said he, smiting on his breast, 'Mea culpa—mea culpa—mea maxima culpa.'

'Tell him how I robbed my father.'

The priest groaned as Martin did so.

'And how I mocked at my mother, and left her in a rage, without ever a kind word between us. And how I have slain I know not how many men in battle, though that, I trust, need not lie heavily on my soul, seeing that I killed them all in fair fight.'

Again the priest groaned.

'And how I robbed a certain priest of his money and gave it away to my horsecarles.'

Here the priest groaned more bitterly still.

'Oh, my son, my son, where hast thou found time to lay all these burdens on thy young soul!'

'It will take less time,' said Martin bluntly, 'for you to take the burdens off again.'

'But I dare not absolve him for robbing a priest. Heaven help him! He must go to the bishop for that. He is more fit to go on pilgrimage to Jerusalem than to battle.'

'He has no time,' quoth Martin, 'for bishops or Jerusalem.'

'Tell him,' says Hereward, 'that in this purse is all I have, that in it he will find sixty silver pennies, besides two strange coins of gold.'

'Sir priest,' said Martin Lightfoot, taking the purse from Hereward, and keeping it in his own hand, 'there are in this bag monsigns.'

Martin had no mind to let the priest into the secret of the state of their finances.

'And tell him,' continued Hereward, 'that if I fall, in this battle I give him all that money, that he may part it among the poor for the good of my soul.'

'Pish!' said Martin to his lord; 'that is paying him for having you killed. You should pay him for keeping you alive.' And without waiting for the answer, he spoke in Latin.

'And if he comes back safe from this battle, he will give you ten pennies for yourself and your church, priest, and therefore expects you to pray your very loudest while he is gone.'

'I will pray, I will pray,' said the holy man. 'I will wrestle in prayer. Ah! that he could slay the wicked, and reward the proud according to his deservings. Ah! that he could rid me and my master, and my young lady, of this son of Belial—this devourer of widows and orphans—this slayer of the poor and needy, who fills this place with innocent blood—him of whom it is written, "They stretch forth their mouth unto the heaven, and then tongue goeth through the world. Therefore fall the people unto them, and thereout suck they no small advantage." I will shrieve him shrieve him of all save robbing the priest, and for that he must go to the bishop, if he live and, if not, the Lord have mercy on his soul.'

And so, weeping and trembling, the good old man pronounced the words of absolution.

Hereward rose, thanked him, and then hurried out in silence.

'You will pray your very loudest, priest,' said Martin, as he followed his young lord.

'I will, I will,' quoth he, and kneeling down began to chant that noble 73d Psalm, 'Quam bonus Israel,' which he had just so fitly quoted.

'Thou gavest him the bag, Martin!' said Hereward, as they hurried on.

'You are not dead yet. "No pay no play" is as good a rule for priest as for layman.'

'Now then, Martin Lightfoot, good-bye (come not with me. It must never be said, even slanderously, that I brought two into the field against one, and if I die, Martin—'

'You won't die!' said Lightfoot, shutting his teeth.

'If I die, go back to my people somehow, and tell them that I died like a true earl's son.'

Hereward held out his hand, Martin fell on his knees and kissed it, watched him with set teeth till he disappeared in the wood, and then started forward and entered the bushes at a different spot.

'I must be nigh at hand to see fair play,' he muttered to himself, 'in case any of his ruffians be hanging about. Fair play I'll see, and fair play I'll give, too, for the sake of my lord's honour, though I be bitterly loth to do it. So many times as I have been a villain when it was of no use, why mayn't I be one now, when it would serve the purpose indeed! Why did we ever come into this accursed place! But one thing I will do,' said he, as he ensconced himself under a thick holly, whence he could see the meeting of the combatants upon an open lawn some twenty yards away, 'if that bug bull calf kills my master, and I do not jump on his back and pick his brains out with this trusty steel of mine, may my right arm—'

And Martin Lightfoot swore a fearful oath, which need not here be written.

The priest had just finished his chant of the 73d Psalm, and had betaken himself in his spiritual warfare, as it was then called, to the equally apposite 52d, 'Quid gloriaris!'

'Why boastest thou thyself, thou tyrant, that thou canst do mischief, whereas the goodness of God endureth yet daily?'

'Father! father!' cried a soft voice in the doorway, 'where are you?'

And in hurried the princess.

'Hide this,' she said, breathless, drawing from beneath her mantle a huge sword, 'hide it, where no one dare touch it, under the altar behind the holy rood—no place too secret.'

'What is it?' asked the priest, rising from his knees.

'His sword—the Ogre's—his magic sword, which kills whomsoever it strikes. I coax'd him to let me have it last night when he was tipsy, for fear he should quarrel with the young stranger, and I have kept it from him ever since by one excuse or another, and now he has sent one of his ruffians in for it, saying that if I do not give it up at once he will come back and kill me.'

'He dare not do that,' said the priest.

'What is there that he dare not?' said she. 'Hide it at once, I know that he wants it to fight with this Hereward.'

'If he wants it for that,' said the priest, 'it is too late, for half an hour is past since Hereward went to meet him.'

'And you let him go? You did not persuade him, stop him? You let him go hence to his death?'

In vain the good man expostulated, and explained that it was no fault of his.

'You must come with me this instant to my father—to them, they must be parted. They shall be parted. If you dare not, I dare. I will throw myself between them, and he that strikes the other shall strike me.'

And she hurried the priest out of the house, down the knoll, and across the yard. There they found others on the same errand. The news that a battle was toward had soon spread, and the men-at-arms were hurrying down to the fight, kept back, however, by Alef, who strode along at their head.

Alef was sorely perplexed in mind. He had taken, as all honest men did, a great liking to Hereward. Moreover, he was his kinsman and his guest. Save him he would if he could, but how to save him without mortally offending his tyrant Ironhook he could not see. At least he would exert what little power he had, and prevent, if possible, his men-at-arms from helping their darling leader against the hapless lad.

Alef's perplexity was much increased when his daughter bounded towards him, seized him by the arm, and hurried him on, showing by look and word which of the combatants she favoured, so plainly that the ruffians behind broke into scornful murmurs. They burst through the bushes. Martin Lightfoot happily heard them coming, and had just time to slip away noiselessly, like a rabbit, to the other part of the cover.

The combat seemed at the first glance to be one between a grown man and a child, so unequal was the size of the combatants. But the second look showed that the advantage was by no means with Ironhook. Stumbling to and fro with the broken shaft of a javelin sticking in his thigh, he vainly tried to seize Hereward with his long iron grapple. Hereward, bleeding, but still active and upright, broke away, and sprang round him, watching for an opportunity to strike a deadly blow. The housecarles rushed forward with yells. Alef shouted to the combatants to desist, but ere the party could reach them, Hereward's opportunity had come. Ironhook after a fruitless lunge stumbled forward. Hereward leapt aside, and spying an unguarded spot below the corselet, drove his sword deep into the giant's body, and rolled him over upon the sword. Then arose shouts of fury.

'Foul play!' cried one.

And others, taking up the cry, called out, 'Sorcery!' and 'Treason!'

Hereward stood over Ironhook as he lay writhing and foaming on the ground.

'Killed by a boy at last!' groaned he. 'If I had but had my sword—my brain luter which that witch stole from me but last night!—and amid foul curses and bitter tears of shame his mortal spirit fled to its doom.'

The housecarles rushed in on Hereward, who had enough to do to keep them at arm's length by long sweeps of his sword.

Alef entreated, threatened, promised a fair trial if the men would give fair play. When, to complete the confusion, the princess threw herself upon the corpse, shrieking and tearing her hair, and to Hereward's surprise and disgust, bewailed the prowess and the virtues of the dead calling upon all present to avenge his murder.

Hereward vowed inwardly that he would never again trust woman's fancy, or fight in woman's quarrel. He was now nigh at his wits' end, the housecarles had closed round him in a ring with the intention of seizing him, and however well he might defend his front, he might be crippled at any moment from behind. But in the very nick of time Martin Lightfoot burst through the crowd, set himself heel to heel with his master, and broke out, not with threats, but with a good-humoured laugh.

'Here is a pretty coil about a red-headed brute of a Pict! Danes, Ostmen,' he cried, 'are you not ashamed to call such a fellow your lord, when you have such a true earl's son as this to lead you if you will?'

The Ostmen in the company looked at each other. Martin Lightfoot saw that his appeal to the antipathies of race had told. He therefore followed it up by a string of witticisms upon the Pictish nation in general, of which the only two fit for modern ears to be set down were the two old stories, that the Piets had feet so large that they used to lie upon their backs and hold up their legs to shelter themselves from the sun, and that when killed, they could not fall down, but died as they were, all standing.

'So that the only foul play I can see is that my master shoved the fellow over after he had stabbed him, instead of leaving him to stand upright there, like one of your Cornish Dolmen, till his flesh should fall off his bones.'

Hereward saw the effect of Martin's words, and burst out in Danish likewise, with a true Viking chant—

'Look at me, dread me!
I am the Hereward,
The watcher, the champion,
The Berserker, the Viking,
The land thief, the sea-thief,
Young summer pirate,
Famous land warrior,
Slayer of witch bears,
Queller of Ogres,
Fattener of ravens,
Darling of gray wolves,
Wild widow maker,
Touch me—to wail and Raven I give you
Ship with me boldly,
Follow me gallily,
Over the swan's road,
Over the whale's bath,
Far to the southward,
Where sun and sea meet,
Where from the palm boughs
Apples of gold hang,
And freight there our long snake
With sandal and orfery,
Dark Moorish maidens,
And gold of Alger.'

'Hark to the Viking! Hark to the right earl's son!' shouted some of the Danes, whose blood had been stirred many a time before by such wild words, and on whom Hereward's youth and beauty had their due effect. And now the counsels of the ruffians being divided, the old priest gained courage to step in. Let them deliver Hereward and his serving-man into his custody. He would bring them forth on the morrow, and there should be full investigation and fair trial. And so Hereward and Martin, who both refused stantly to give up their arms, were marched back into the town, looked in the little church, and left to their meditations.

Hereward sat down on the pavement and cursed the princess. Martin Lightfoot took off his master's corselet, and, as well as the darkness would allow, bound up his wounds, which happily were not severe.

'Were I you,' said he at last, 'I should keep my curses till I saw the end of this adventure.'

'Has not the girl betrayed me shamefully?'

'Not she. I saw her warn you, as far as looks could do, not to quarrel with the man.'

'That was because she did not know me. Little she thought that I could—'

'Don't halloo till you are out of the wood. This is a night for praying rather than boasting.'

'She cannot really love that wretch,' said

1 'Guardian of the Army'

Hereward, after a pause. 'Thou saw'st how she mocked him.'

'Women are strange things, and often cease most where they love most.'

'But such a misbegotten savage.'

'Women are strange things, say I, and with some a lug fellow is a pretty fellow, be he uglier than seven Ironhooks. Still, just because women are strange things, have patience, say I.'

The lock creaked, and the old priest came in. Martin leapt to the open door, but it was slammed in his face by men outside with scornful laughter.

The priest took Hereward's head in his hands, wept over him, blest him for having slain Goliath like young David, and then set food and drink before the two, but he answered Martin's questions only with sighs and shakings of the head.

'Let us eat and drink then,' said Martin, 'and after that you, my lord, sleep off your wounds while I watch the door. I have no fancy for these fellows taking us unawares at night.'

Martin lay quietly across the door till the small hours, listening to every sound, till the key creaked once more in the lock. He started at the sound, and seeing the person who entered round the neck, whispered, 'One word, and you are dead.'

'Do not hurt me,' answered a stifled voice, and Martin Lightfoot, to his surprise, found that he had grasped an armed man, but the slight frame of a young girl.

'I am the princess,' she whispered, 'let me in.'

'A very pretty hostage for us,' thought Martin, and letting her go, seized the key, locking the door in the inside.

'Take me to your master,' she cried, and Martin led her up the church wondering, but half suspecting some further trap.

'You have a dagger in your hand,' said he, holding her wrist.

'I have. If I had meant to use it, it would have been used first on you. Take it, if you like.'

She hurried up to Hereward, who lay sleeping quietly on the altar-steps, knelt by him, wrung his hands, called him her champion, her deliverer.

'I am not well awake yet,' said he cockily, 'and do not know whether this may not be a dream, as more that I have seen and heard seems to be.'

'It is no dream. I am true. I was always true to you. Have I not put myself in your power? Am I not come here to deliver you, my deliverer?'

'The tears which you shed over your Ogres corpse seem to have dried quickly enough.'

'Cruel! What else could I do? You heard him accuse me to his rough followers of having stolen his sword. My life, my father's life, were not safe a moment, had I not dissembled, and done the thing I loathed. Ah!' she went on bitterly 'You men, who rule the world and us by cruel steel, you forget that we poor women have but one weapon left wherewith to hold our own, and that is cunning; and are driven by you day after day to tell the lie which we detest.'

'Then you really stole his sword?'

'And hid it here, for your sake' And she drew the weapon from behind the altar

'Take it. It is yours now. It is magical. Whoever smites with it, need never smite again. Now, quik, you must be gone. But promise one thing before you go.'

'If I leave this land safe I will do it, be it what it may. Why not come with me, lady, and see it done?'

She laughed. 'Vain boy, do you think that I drew the weapon from behind that?'

'I have won you, and why should I not keep you?' said Hereward sullenly.

'Do you not know that I am betrothed to your kinsman? And—though that you cannot know—that I love your kinsman?'

'So I have all the blows and none of the spoil.'

'Tush, you have the glory - and the sword—and the chance, if you will do my bidding, of being called by all ladies a true and gentle knight, who cared not for his own pleasure but for deeds of chivalry. Go to my betrothed—to Waterford over the sea. Take him this ring, and tell him by that token to come and claim me soon, lest he run the danger of losing me a second time, and lose me then for ever, for I am in hard case here, and were it not for my father's sake, perhaps I might dare, in spite of what men might say, to flee with you to your kinsman across the sea.'

'Trust me and come,' said Hereward, whose young blood kindled with a sudden nobleness. 'Trust me and I will treat you like my sister, like my queen. By the holy rood above I will swear to be true to you.'

'I do trust you, but it cannot be. Here is money for you in plenty to hire a passage if you need it is no shame to take it from me. And now one thing more. Here is a cord—you must bind the hands and feet of the old priest inside, and then you must bind mine likewise.'

'Never,' quoth Hereward.

'It must be. How else can I explain your having got the key? I made them give me the key on the pretence that with one who had most cause to hate you it would be safe, and when they come and find us in the morning I shall tell them how I came here to stab you with my own hands—you must lay the dagger by me—and how you and your man fell upon us and bound us, and you escaped. Ah! Mary Mother,' continued the maiden with a sigh, 'when shall we poor weak women have no more need of lying?'

She lay down, and Hereward, in spite of himself, gently bound her hands and feet, kissing them as he bound them.

'I shall do well here upon the altar steps,' said she. 'How can I spend my time better till the morning light than to lie here and pray?'

The old priest, who was plainly in the plot, submitted meekly to the same fate; and Hereward and Martin Lightfoot stole out, locking the door, but leaving the key in it outside. To scramble over the old earthwork was an easy matter, and in a few minutes they were hurrying down the valley to the sea, with a fresh breeze blowing behind them from the north.

'Did I not tell you, my lord,' said Martin Lightfoot, 'to keep your curses till you had seen the end of this adventure?'

Hereward was silent. His brain was still whirling from the adventures of the day, and his heart was very deeply touched. His shrift of the morning, hurried, and formal as it had been, had softened him. His danger—for he felt how he had been face to face with death—had softened him likewise, and he repented somewhat of his vainglorious and bloodthirsty boasting over a fallen foe, as he began to see that there was a purpose more noble in life than ranging land and sea, a Russian among Russians, seeking for glory amid blood and flame. The idea of chivalry, of succouring the weak and the oppressed, of keeping faith and honour not merely towards men who could avenge themselves, but towards women who could not, the dim dawn of purity, gentleness, and the conquest of his own fierce passions—all these had taken root in his heart during his adventure with the fair Cornish girl. The seed was sown. Would it be cut down again by the bitter blasts of the rough fighting world, or would it grow and bear the noble fruit of 'gentle, very perfect knight-hood'?

They reached the ship, clambered on board without ceremony, at the risk of being taken and killed as robbers, and told their case. The merchants had not completed their cargo of tin. Hereward offered to make up their loss to them, if they would set sail at once, and they, feeling that the place would be for some time to come too hot to hold them, and being also in high delight, like honest Ostmen, with Hereward's prowess, agreed to sail straight for Waterford, and complete their cargo there. But the tide was out. It was three full hours before the ship could float, and for three full hours they waited in fear and trembling, expecting the Cornishmen to be down upon them in a body every moment, under which wholesome fear some on board prayed fervently who had never been known to pray before.

CHAPTER IV

HOW HEReward TOOK SERVICE WITH RANALD, KING OF WATERFORD

THE coasts of Ireland were in a state of comparative peace in the middle of the eleventh century. The ships of Loughan, seen far out at sea, no longer drove the population shrieking inland. Heathen Danes, whether fair-haired Fionngall from Norway, or brown-haired Dubhghall from Denmark proper, no longer burned convents, tortured monks for their gold, or (as at Clonmacnoise) set a heathen princess, Oda, wife of Thorkill, son of Harold Haarfagre, aloft on the high altar to receive the homage of the conquered. The Scandinavian invaders had become Christianised, and civilised also—owing to their continual intercourse with foreign nations—more highly than the Irish whom they had overcome. That was easy, for early Irish civilisation seems to have existed only in the convents and for the religious, and when they were crushed, mere barbarism was left behind. And now the same process went on in the east of Ireland, which went on a generation or two later in the east and north of Scotland. The Danes began to settle down into peaceful colonists and traders. Ireland was poor, and the convents plundered once could not be plundered again. The Irish were desperately brave. Ill-armed and almost naked, they were as perfect in the arts of forest warfare as those modern Maories whom they so much resembled, and though their black skenes and light darts were no match for the Danish swords and battle-axes which they adopted during the middle age, or their plaid trousers and felt capes for the Danish helmet and chain corselet, still an Irishman was so ugly a foe, that it was not worth while to fight with him unless he could be robbed afterwards. The Danes, who, like their descendants of Northumbria, Moray, and Sutherland, were canny common sense folk, with a shrewd eye to interest, found, somewhat to their regret, that there were trades even more profitable than robbery and murder. They therefore concentrated themselves round harbours and river mouths, and sent forth their ships to all the western seas, from Dublin, Waterford, Wexford, Cork, or Limerick. Every important seaport in Ireland owes its existence to those sturdy Vikings' sons. In each of these towns they had founded a petty kingdom, which endured until, and even in some cases after, the conquest of Ireland by Henry II. and Strongbow. They intermarried in the meanwhile with the native Irish. Brian Boru, for instance, was so connected with Danish royalty, that it is still a question whether he himself had not Danish blood in his veins. King Sigtryg Silkebeard, who fought against him at Clontarf, was actually his stepson—and so too, according to another Irish chronicler, was King Olaf Kvaran, who, even at the time of the battle of Clontarf, was married to Brian Boru's daughter—a marriage which (if a fact) was startlingly within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity. But the ancient Irish were sadly careless on such points, and as Giraldus Cambrensis says, 'followed the example of men of old in their vices more willingly than in their virtues.'

More than forty years had elapsed since that famous battle of Clontarf, and since Ragnvald, Reginald, or Ragnald, son of Sigtryg the Norseman, had been slain therein by Brian Boru. On that one day, so the Irish sang, the northern invaders were exterminated, once and for all, by the Milesian hero, who had craftily used the strangers to fight his battles, and then the moment they became formidable to himself, crushed them till 'from Howth to Brandon in Kerry, there was not a threshing-floor without a Danish slave threshing thereon, or a quern without a Danish woman grinding thereat.'

Nevertheless, in spite of the total annihilation of the Danish power in the Emerald Isle, Ragnald seemed to the eyes of men to be still a hale old warrior, ruling constitutionally—that is, with a wholesome fear of being outlawed or murdered if he misbehaved—over the Danes in Waterford, with five hundred fair-haired warriors at his back, two-edged axe on shoulder, and two-edged sword on thigh. His ships drove a thriving trade with France and Spain in Irish fish, butter, honey, and furs. His workmen coined money in the old round tower of Dundory, built by his predecessor and namesake about the year 1003, which stands as Ragnald's tower to this day. He had fought many a bloody battle since his death at Clontarf, by the side of his old leader Sigtryg Silkebeard. He had been many a time to Dublin to visit his even more prosperous and formidable friend, and was so delighted with the new church of the Holy Trinity, which Sigtryg and his bishop Donatus had just built, not in the Danish or Ostian town, but in the heart of ancient Celtic Dublin (plain proof of the utter overthrow of the Danish power), that he had determined to build a like church in honour of the Holy Trinity, in Waterford itself. A thriving valiant old king he seemed, as he sat in his great house of pine logs under Ragnald's tower upon the quay, drinking French and Spanish wines out of horns of ivory and cups of gold, and over his head, hanging upon the wall, the huge double-edged axe with which, so his flatterers had whispered, Brian Boru had not slain him, but he Brian Boru.

Nevertheless, then as since, alas! the pleasant theory was preferred by the Milesian historians to the plain truth. And far away inland, monks wrote and harpers sang of the death of Ragnald the fair-haired Fionngall, and all his 'mailed swarms.'

One Teague MacMurrrough, indeed, a famous bard of those parts, composed unto his harp a song of Clontarf, the fame whereof reached Ragnald's ears, and so amused him that he rested not day or night till he had caught the hapless bard and brought him in triumph into Waterford. There he compelled him at sword's point to sing to him and his housecarles the Milesian version of the great historical event; and when the harper in fear and trembling came to the story of Ragnald's own death at Brian Boru's hands, then the jolly old Viking laughed till the tears ran down his face, and instead of cutting off Teague's head, gave him a cup of goodly wine, made him his own harper thenceforth, and bade him send for his wife and children, and sung to him every day, especially the song of Clontarf and his own death, treating him very much, in fact, as English royalty during the last generation treated another Irish lord whose song was even more sweet, and his notions of Irish history even more grotesque than those of Teague MacMurrrough.

It was to this old king, or rather to his son Sigtryg, godson of Sigtryg Silkeard, and distant cousin of his own, that Hereward now took his way, and told his story, as the king sat in his hall, drinking across the fire after the old Norse fashion. The fire of pine logs was in the midst of the hall, and the smoke went out through a hole in the roof. On one side was a long bench, and in the middle of it the king's high arm-chair, right and left of him sat his kinsmen and the ladies, and his sea-captains and men of wealth. Opposite, on the other side of the fire, was another bench. In the middle of that sat his marshal, and right and left all his housecarles. There were other benches behind, on which sat more freemen, but of lesser rank.

And they were all drinking ale, which a servant poured out of a bucket into a great bull's horn, and the men bayded round to each other.

Then Hereward came in, and sat down on the end of the hindmost bench, and Martin stood behind him, till one of the ladies said—

'Who is that young stranger, who sits behind there so humbly, though he looks like an earl's son, more fit to sit here with us on the high bench?'

'So he does,' quoth King Ranald. 'Come forward hither, young sir, and drink.'

And when Hereward came forward, all the ladies agreed that he must be an earl's son, for he had a great gold tore round his neck, and gold rings on his wrists, and a new scarlet coat, bound with gold braid, and scarlet stockings, cross-laced with gold braid up to the knee, and his shoes trimmed with martin's fur, and a short blue silk cloak over all, trimmed with martin's fur likewise, and by his side in a broad belt with gold studs, was the Ogre's sword Brann-linter, with its ivory hilt and velvet sheath, and all agreed that if he had but been a head taller, they had never seen a properer man.

'Aha! such a gay young sea-cock does not come hither for nought. Drink first, man, and tell us thy business after,' and he reached the horn to Hereward.

Hereward took it, and sang—

'In this Bragg beaker, o
Brave Ranald I pledge,
In good liquor, which lightens
Long labour on our bench
Good liquor which sweetens
The song of the scull!'

'Thy voice is as fine as thy feathers, man. Nay, drink it all. We ourselves drink here by the peg at midday, but a stranger is welcome to fill his inside at all hours.'

Whereon Hereward finished the horn duly, and, at Ranald's bidding, sat him down on the high settle. He did not remark that as he sat down, two handsome youths rose and stood behind him.

'Now, then, sir priest,' quoth the king, 'go on with your story.'

A priest, Irish by his face and dress, who sat on the high bench, rose, and renewed an oration which Hereward's entrance had interrupted.

'So, O great king, as says Homer, this wise king called his earls, knights, sea-captains, and housecarles, and said unto them, "Which of these two kings is in the right, who can tell? But mind you, that this king of the Enchanters lives far away in India, and we never heard of him more than his name—but this king Ulixes and his Greeks live hard by, and which of the two is it wiser to quarrel with, him that lives hard by or him that lives far off?" Therefore, King Ranald, says, by the mouth of my humility, the great Feargus, Lord of Ivar—"Take example by Alcimus, the wise king of Fairy, and listen not to the ambassadors of those lying villains, O'Dea Lord of Shevardagh, MacCarthy King of Cashel, and O'Sullivan Lord of Knock-riffin, who all three between them could not raise kerns enough to drive off one old widow's cow. Make friends with me, who live upon your borders, and you shall go peaceably through my lands to conquer and destroy them who live afar off, as they deserve, the sons of Bayhal and Julius.'

And the priest crossed himself, and sat down. At which speech Hereward was seen to laugh.

'Why do you laugh, young sir? The priest seems to talk like a wise man, and is my guest and an ambassador.'

Then rose up Hereward, and bowed to the king. 'King Ranald Sigtrygsson, it was not for rudeness that I laughed, for I learnt good manners long ere I came here, but because I find clerics alike all over the world.'

'How?'

'Quick at hiding false counsel under learned speech. I know nothing of Ulixes, king, nor of this Feargus either, and I am but a lad, as you see, but I heard a bird once in my own country who gave a very different counsel from the priest's.'

'Speak on, then. This lad is no fool, my merry men all.'

'There were three crows, king, in our country, and each crow stood on a hill. In the first there built an eagle, in the second there built a sparrowhawk, in the third there built a crow.'

'Now the sparrowhawk came to the eagle, and said, "Go shares with me, and we will kill the crow, and have her wood to ourselves."

"Humph!" says the eagle, "I could kill the crow without your help, however, I will think of it."

'When the crow heard that, she came to the eagle herself, "King Eagle," says she, "why do you want to kill me, who live ten miles from you, and never flew across your path in my life? Better kill that little rogue of a sparrowhawk who lives between us, and is always ready to poach on your marches whenever your back is turned. So you will have her wood as well as your own.'

"You are a wise crow," said the eagle, and he went out and killed the sparrowhawk, and took his wood.

Laughed King Ranald and his Viking all. 'Well spoken, young man! We will take the sparrowhawk, and let the crow bide.'

'Nay but,' quoth Hereward, 'hear the end of the story. After a while the eagle finds the crow beating about the edge of the sparrowhawk's wood.

"Oho!" says he, "so you can poach as well as that little hook-nosed rogue!" and he killed her too.

"Ah!" says the crow, when she lay a-dying, "my blood is on my own head. If I had but left the sparrowhawk between me and this great tyrant!"

'And so the eagle got all three woods to himself.'

At which the Vikings laughed more loudly than ever, and King Ranald, chuckling at the notion of eating up the hapless Irish princes one by one, sent back the priest (not without a present for his church, for Ranald was a pious man) to tell the great Feargus, that unless he sent into Waterford by that day week, two hundred head of cattle, a hundred pigs, a hundredweight of clean honey, and as much of wax, Ranald would not leave so much as a sucking pig alive in Ivark.

The cause of quarrel, of course, was too unimportant to be mentioned. Each had robbed and cheated the other half a dozen times in the last twenty years. As for the morality of the transaction, Ranald had tithes salve for his conscience, that as he intended to do to Feargus, so would Feargus have gladly done to him, had he been living peaceably in Norway, and been strong enough to invade and rob him. Indeed, so had Feargus done already, ever since he wore beard, to every chieftain of his own race whom he was strong enough to ill-treat. Many a fair herd had he driven off, many a fair farm burnt, many a fair woman carried off a slave, after that inveterate fashion of lawless fends which makes the history of Celtic Ireland from the earliest times one dull and aimless catalogue of murder and devastation, followed by famine and disease, and now as he had done to others, so it was to be done to him.

'And now, young sir, who seem as witty as you are good-looking, you may, if you will, tell us your name and your business. As for the name, however, if you wish to keep it to yourself, Ranald Sigtrygsson is not the man to demand it of an honest guest.'

Hereward looked round, and saw Teague Mac-Murrough standing close to him, harp in hand. He took it from him courteously enough, put a silver penny into the minstrel's hand, and running his fingers over the strings, rose and began

'Outlaw and free thief
Lawless and lawless

Through the world fare I,
Thoughtless of life.
Soft is my beard, but Hard my Brain-biter
Wake, men me call, whom Warrior and warden
Find ever watchful.
Far in Northumberland
Slew I the witch bear,
Cleaving his brain-jaw,
At one stroke I felled him.'

And so forth, chanting all his doughty deeds, with such a voice and spirit, joined to that musical talent for which he was afterwards so famous, till the hearts of the wild Norsemen rejoiced, and 'Skall to the stranger! Skall to the young Viking!' rang through the hall.

Then showing proudly the fresh wounds on his bare arms, he sang of his fight with the Cornish ogre, and his adventure with the princess. But always, though he went into the most minute details, he concealed the name both of her and of her father, while he kept his eyes steadily fixed on Ranald's eldest son, Sigtryg, who sat at his father's right hand.

The young man grew uneasy, red, almost angry, till at last Hereward sang—

'A gold ring she gave me Right royally I warf worked,
To none will I pass it
For prayer or for sword stroke,
Save to him who can claim it
By love and by truth plight,
Let that hero speak
If that hero be here.'

Young Sigtryg half started from his seat: but when Hereward smiled at him, and laid his finger on his lips, he sat down again. Hereward felt his shoulder touched from behind. One of the youths who had risen when he sat down bent over him, and whispered in his ear—

'Ah, Hereward, we know you. Do you not know us? We are the twins, the sons of your sister, Siward the White and Siward the Red, the orphans of Asbiorn Siwardsson, who fell at Drumkane.'

Hereward sprang up, struck the harp again, and sang—

'Outlaw and free thief
My kinsfolk have left me,
And no kinsfolk need I,
Till kinsfolk shall need me.
My sword is my father,
My shield is my mother,
My ship is my sister,
My horse is my brother.'

'Uncle, uncle,' whispered one of them sadly, 'listen now or never, for we have bad news for you and us. Your father is dead, and Earl Algar, your brother, here in Ireland, outlawed a second time.'

A flood of sorrow passed through Hereward's heart. He kept it down, and raving once more, harp in hand—

'Hereward, king, light I
Holy Leofric my father,
In Westminster wiser,
None walked with king Edward.
High ministers he builded,
Pale monks he maintained.

Dead is he, a bed-death,
A leech-death, a priest death,
A straw-death, a cow a-death
Such doom suits not me
To high heaven, all so softly,
The angels upland him,
In meads of May flowers
Mild Mary will meet him—
Me, happier, the Valkyrs
Shall wait from the war-leek,
Shall hail from the Ælhogang
Or helmet-straw noorlatel
And sword-strokes my skrift be,
Sharp spears be my leeches,
With herons' hot corpses
High heaped for my pillow'

'Skall to the Viking!' shouted the Danes once more, at this outburst of heathenism, common enough among their half-converted race, in times when monasterism made so utter a divorce between the life of the devotee and that of the worldling, that it seemed reasonable enough for either party to have their own heaven and their own hell. After all, Hereward was not original in his wish. He had but copied the death-song which Sward Digre had sung for himself some three years before.

All praised his poetry, and especially the quickness of his alliterations (then a note of the highest art), and the old king, filling not thus true the horn, but a golden goblet, bid him drain it and keep the goblet for his song.

Young Sigtryg leapt up, and took the cup to Hereward. 'Such a scald,' he said, 'ought to have no meaner cup-bearer than a king's son.'

Hereward drank it dry, and then fixing his eyes meaningly on the prince, dropt the princess' ring into the cup, and putting it back into Sigtryg's hand, sang—

'The beaker I reach back
More rich than I took it.
No gold will I grasp
Of the king's, the ring giver,
Till, by wit or by weapon,
I worthily win it.
When felled by my faith-blond
False Feargon bes-gory,
With over the wolf's meal
With w-lows are walling

'Does he refuse my gift?' gumbled Ranald. 'He has given a fair reason,' said the prince, as he hid the ring in his bosom, 'leave him to me, for my brother-in-arm he is henceforth.'

After which, as was the custom of those parts, most of them drank too much liquor. But neither Sigtryg nor Hereward drank, and the two Swards stood behind their young uncle's seat, watching him with that intense admiration which lads can feel for a young hero.

That night, when the warriors were asleep, Sigtryg and Hereward talked out their plans. They would equip two ships, they would fight all the kinglets of Cornwall at once, if need was, they would carry off the princess, and burn Alef's town over his head if he said nay. Nothing could be more simple than the tactics required in an age when might was right.

Then Hereward turned to his two nephews, who lingered near him, plainly lag with news.

'And what brings you here, lads?' He had hardened his heart, and made up his mind to show no kindness to his own kin. The day might come when they might need him, then it would be his turn.

'Your father, as we told you, is dead.'

'So much the better for him and the worse for England. And Harold and the Godwinssons, of course, are lords and masters far and wide.'

'Tost has our grandfather Sward's earldom.'

'I know that. I know, too, that he will not keep it long, unless he learns that Northumbrians are free men, and not Wessex slaves.'

'And Algar our uncle is outlawed again, after King Edward had given him peaceably your father's earldom.'

'And why?'

'Why was he outlawed two years ago?'

'Because the Godwinssons hate him, as they will hate you in your turn.'

'And Algar is gone to Griffin, the Welshman, and from him on to Dublin, to get ships, just as he did two years ago, and has sent us here to get ships likewise.'

'And what will he do with them when he has got them? He learnt Harford last time he was outlawed, by way of a wise deed, minster and all, with St. Ethelbert's relics on board, and slew seven priests. But they were only honest canons with wives at home, and not shaveling monks, so I suppose that sin was easily shivered. Well, I robbed a priest of a few pence, and was outlawed, he plunders and burns a whole minster, and is made a great call for it. One law for the weak, and one for the strong, young lads, as you will know when you are as old as I. And now I suppose he will plunder and burn more minsters, and then patch up a peace with Harold again, which I advise him strongly to do, for I warn you, young lads, and you may carry that message from me to Dublin to my good brother your uncle, that Harold's little finger is thicker than his whole body, and that, false Godwinsson as he is, he is the only man with a head upon his shoulders left in England, now that his father and my father, and dear old Sward, whom I loved better than my father, are dead and gone.'

The lads stood silent, not a little awed, and indeed imposed on, by the cynical and worldly-wise tone which their renowned uncle had assumed.

At last one of them asked falteringly, 'Then you will do nothing for us?'

'For you nothing. Against you nothing. Why should I mix myself up in my brother's quarrels? Will he make that white-headed diveller at Westminster reverse my outlawry? And if he does, what shall I get thereby? A younger brother's portion, a dirty oxgang of land in Kesteven. Let him leave me alone as I leave him, and see if I do not come back to him some day, for or against him as he chooses, with such a host of Vikings' sons as Harold Hardrade himself would be proud of. By Thor's hammer, boys, I have been an outlaw but five years now, and I find it so cheery a life, that I do not care if I am an outlaw for fifty mere. The world is a fine place and a wide place, and it is a very little corner of it that I have seen yet, and if you were of my mettle, you would come along with me and see it throughout to the four corners of heaven, instead of mixing yourselves up in these paltry little quarrels with which our two families are tearing England in pieces, and being murdered perchance like dogs at last by treachery, as Sweyn Godwinsson murdered Biorn Ulsson, his own cousin.

The boys listened, wide-eyed and wide-eared. Hereward knew to whom he was speaking, and he had not spoken in vain.

'What do you hope to get here?' he went on. 'Ranald will give you no ships: he will have enough to do to fight this Feargus, and he is too cunning to thrust his head into Algar's quarrels.'

'We hoped to find Vikings here who would go to any war in the hope of plunder.'

'If there be any, I want them more than you, and what is more, I will have them. They know that they will do finer deeds with me for their captain, than hurling a few English housesteads. And so may you. Come with me, lads. Once and for all, come. Help me to fight Feargus. Then help me to another little adventure which I have on hand—as pretty a one as ever you heard a minstrel sing—and then we will fit out a large ship or two, and go where fate leads—to Constantinople if you like. What can you do better? You never will get that earldom from Tosti. Lucky for young Waltheof, your uncle, if he gets it—if he, and you too, are not murdered within seven years, for I know Tosti's humour, when he lists rivals in his way—'

'Algar will protect us,' said one.

'I tell you Algar is no match for the Godwinssons. If the monk-king died to-morrow, neither his earldom nor his life would be safe. When I saw your father Asbjorn Bulax he dead at Dunsmere, I said, "There ends the glory of the house of the bear", and if you wish to make my words come false, then leave England to founder, and rot and fall to pieces—as all men say she is doing—without your helping to hasten her ruin, and seek glory and wealth too with me around the world! The white bear's blood is in your veins, lads. Take to the sea like your forefather, and come over the swan's bath with me!'

'That we will,' said the two lads. And well they kept their word.

CHAPTER V

HOW HEREWARD RESCUED THE PRINCESS OF CORNWALL A SECOND TIME

FAT was the feasting, and loud was the harping, in the halls of Alef, King of Gweek. Savoury was the smell of fried pilchard and lake, more savoury still that of roast porpoise; most savoury of all that of fifty huge squab pies, built up of layers of apples, bacon, onions, and mutton, and at the bottom of each a squab, or young cormorant, which diffused both through the pie and through the ambient air, a delicate odour of mingled guano and polocot. And the occasion was worthy alike of the smell and of the noise, for King Alef, finding that after the Ogre's death the neighbouring kings were but too ready to make reprisals on him for his champion's murders and robberies, had made a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, with Hannibal, the son of Gryll, King of Marazion, and had confirmed the same by bestowing on him the hand of his fair daughter. Whether she approved of the match or not, was asked neither by King Alef nor by King Hannibal.

To-night was the bridal feast. To-morrow morning the church was to hallow the union, and after that Hannibal Grylls was to lead home his bride, among a gallant company.

And as they ate and drank, and harped and piped, there came into that hall four shabbily dressed men—one of them a short, broad fellow, with black elf-looks and a red beard—and sat them down sneakingly at the very lowest end of all the benches.

In hospitable Cornwall, especially on such a day, every guest was welcome, and the strangers sat peaceably, but ate nothing, though there was both lake and pilchard within reach.

Next to them, by chance, sat a great lord of a Dane, as honest, brave, and stupid a fellow as ever tugged at oar, and after a while they fell talking, till the strangers had heard the reason of this great feast, and all the news of the country side.

'But whence did they come, not to know it already, for all Cornwall was talking thereof?'

'Oh—they came out of Devonshire, seeking service down west with some merchant or rover, being seafaring.'

The stranger with the black hair had been, meanwhile, earnestly watching the princess, who sat at the board's head. He saw her watching him in return, and with a face sad enough.

At last she burst into tears.

'What should the bride weep for, at such a merry wedding?' asked he of his companion.

'Oh—cause enough,' and he told bluntly enough the princess's story. 'And what is more,' said he, 'the King of Waterford sent a ship over last week, with forty proper lads on board, and two gallant Holders with them, to demand her, but for all answer, they were put into the strong house, and there they lie, chained to a log, at this minute. Pity it is, and shame, I hold, for I am a Dane myself, and pity, too, that such a bonny lass should go to an unkempt Welshman like this, instead of a tight smart Viking's son, like the Waterford lad.'

The stranger answered nothing, but kept his eyes upon the princess, till she looked at him steadfastly in return.

She turned pale and red again but after a while she spoke.

'There is a stranger there, and what his rank may be I know not but he has been thrust down to the lowest seat, in a house that used to honour strangers, instead of treating them like slaves. Let him take this dish from my hand, and eat joyfully, lest when he goes home he may speak scorn of bridegroom and bride, and our Cornish weddings.'

The servant brought the dish down; he gave a look at the stranger's shabby dress, turned up his nose, and pretending to mistake, put the dish into the hand of the Dane.

'Hold, lads,' quoth the stranger 'If I have ears, that was incant for me.'

He seized the platter with both hands, and therewith the hands both of the Cornishman and of the Dane. There was a struggle but so latter was the stranger's gripe, that (says the chronicler) the blood burst from the nails of both his opponents.

He was called a 'savage,' a 'devil in man's shape,' and other dainty names, but he was left to eat his squab pie in peace.

'Patience, lads,' quoth he, as he filled his mouth 'Before I take my pleasure at this wedding I will hand my own dish round as well as any of you.'

Whereat men wondered, but held their tongues.

And when the eating was over and the drinking began, the princess rose, and came round to drink the farewell health.

With her maids behind her, and her harper before her (so was the Cornish custom), she pledged one by one each of the guests, slave as well as free, while the harper played a tune.

She came down at last to the strangers. Her face was pale, and her eyes red with weeping.

She filled a cup of wine, and one of her maids offered it to the stranger.

He put it back courteously, but firmly 'Not from your hand,' said he.

A growl against his bad manners rose straightway, and the minstrel, who (as often happened in those days) was jester likewise, made merry at his expense, and advised the company to turn the wild beast out of the hall.

'Silence, fool!' said the princess. 'Why should he know our West country ways? He may take it from my hand, if not from hers.'

And she held out to him the cup herself.

He took it, looking her steadily in the face, and it seemed to the minstrel as if their hands lingered together round the cup-handle, and that he saw the glitter of a ring.

Like many another of his craft before and since, he was a vain, meddling vagabond, and must needs pry into a secret which certainly did not concern him.

So he could not leave the stranger in peace, and knowing that his privileged calling protected him from that formidable fist, he never passed him by without a sneer or a jest, as he wandered round the table, offering his harp, in the Cornish fashion, to any one who wished to play and sing.

'But not to you, Sir Elf-locks: he that is rude to a pretty girl when she offers him wine, is too great a boor to understand my trade.'

'It is a fool's trick,' answered the stranger at last, 'to put off what you must do at last. If I had but the tune, I would pay you for your tune with a better one than you ever heard.'

'Take the harp, then, boor!' said the minstrel, with a laugh and a jest.

The stranger took it, and drew from it such music as made all heads turn toward him at once. Then he began to sing, sometimes by himself, and sometimes his comrades, 'more Girvorum tripliciter canentes,' joined their voices in a Fenmen's three-man-glee.

In vain the minstrel, jealous for his own credit, tried to snatch the harp away. The stranger sang on, till all hearts were softened, and the princess, taking the rich shawl from her shoulders, threw it over those of the stranger, saying that it was a gift too poor for such a scald.

'Scald!' roared the bridegroom (now well in his cups) from the head of the table, 'ask what thou wilt, short of my bride and my kingdom, and it is thine.'

'Give me, then, Hannibal Grylls, King of Marazion, the Danes who came from Ranaid of Waterford.'

'You shall have them! Pity that you have asked for nothing better than such tarry ruffians.'

A few minutes after, the minstrel, bursting with jealousy and rage, was whispering in Hannibal's ear.

The hot old Punie's blood flushed up in his cheeks, and his thin Punie lips curved into a snaky smile. Perhaps the old Punie treachery in his heart, for all that Hannibal was heard to reply was, 'We must not disturb the good-fellowship of a Cornish wedding.'

The stranger, nevertheless, and the princess likewise, had seen that bitter smile.

Men drank hard and long that night and when daylight came, the strangers were gone.

In the morning the marriage ceremony was performed, and then began the pageant of leading home the bride. The minstrels went first, harping and piping; then king Hannibal, carrying his bride behind him on a pillow, and after them a string of servants and men-at-arms, leading country ponies laden with the bride's dower. Along with them, unarmed, sulky and suspicious, walked the forty Danes, who were informed that they should go to Marazion, and there be shipped off for Ireland.

Now, as all men know, those parts of Cornwall, flat and open furze-downs aloft, are cut, for many miles inland, by long branches of tide river, walled in by woods and rocks, and by crossing one or more of these, the bridal party would save many a mile on their road towards the west.

So they had timed their journey by the tides, lest, finding low water in the rivers, they should have to wade to the ferry-boats waist-deep in mud, and going down the steep hillside, through oak, and ash, and hazel-epsea, they entered, as many as could, a great flat-bottomed barge, and were rowed across some quarter of a mile, to land under a jutting crag, and go up again by a similar path into the woods.

So the first boat load went up, the minstrels in front, harping and piping till the greenwood rang, King Hannibal next, with his bride, and behind him spear-men and axe men, with a Dane between every two.

When they had risen some two hundred feet, and were in the heart of the forest, Hannibal turned, and made a sign to the men behind him.

Then each pair of them seized the Dane between them, and began to bind his hands behind his back.

'What will you do with us?'

'Send you back to Ireland,—a king never breaks his word,—but pick out your right eyes first, to show your master how much I care for him. Lucky for you that I leave you an eye apiece, to find your friend the harper, whom, if I catch, I slay alive.'

'You promised!' cried the princess.

'And so did you, traitress!' and he gripped her arm, which was round his waist, till she screamed. 'So did you promise but not to me. And you shall pass your bridal night in my dog-kennel, after my dog-whip has taught you not to give rings again to wandering harpers.'

The wretched princess shuddered, for she knew too well that such an atrocity was easy and common enough. She knew it well. Why should she not? The story of the Cid's Daughters and the knights of Carron, the far more authentic one of Robert of Belesme, and many another ugly tale of the early middle age, will prove but too certainly that, before the days of chivalry began, neither youth, beauty, nor the sacred ties of matrimony, could protect women from the most horrible outrages at the hands of those who should have been their protectors.

But the words had hardly passed the lips of Hannibal, ere he reeled in the saddle, and fell to the ground, with a javelin through his heart.

A strong arm caught the princess. A voice which she knew bade her have no fear.

'Bind your horse to a tree, for we shall want him, and wait.'

Three well-armed men rushed on the nearest Cornishmen, and hewed them down. A fourth unbound the Dane, and bade him catch up a weapon and fight for his life.

A second pair were despatched, a second Dane freed, ere a minute was over, the Cornishmen, struggling up the narrow path toward the shouts above, were overpowered in detail by continually increasing numbers, and ere half an hour was over the whole party were freed, mounted on the ponies, and making their way over the downs toward the west.

'Noble, noble Hereward!—The Wake indeed!' said the princess, as she sat behind him on Hannibal's horse. 'I knew you from the first moment, and my nurse knew you too. Is she here? Is she safe?'

'I have taken care of that. She has done us too good service to be left here and be hanged.'

'I knew you, in spite of your hair, by your eyes.'

'Yes,' said Hereward. 'It is not every man who carries one gray eye and one blue. The more difficult for me to go mumming when I need.'

'But how came you hither, of all places in the world?'

'When you sent your nurse to me last night, to warn me that treason was abroad, it was easy for me to ask your road to Marazion, and easier too, when I found that you would go home the very way we came, to know that I must make my stand here or nowhere.'

'The way you came? Then where are we going now?'

'Beyond Marazion, to a little cove—I cannot tell its name. There he—Sigtryg your betrothed, and three good ships of war.'

'There? Why did he not come for me himself?'

'Why? Because we knew nothing of what was toward. We meant to have sailed straight up your river to your father's town, and taken you out with a high hand. We had sworn an oath—which, as you saw, I kept—neither to eat nor drink in your house, save out of your own hands. But the easterly wind would not let us round the Lizard, so we put into that cove, and there I and these two lads, my nephews, offered to go forward as spies, while Sigtryg threw up an earthwork, and made a stand against the Cornish. We meant merely to go back to him, and give him news. But when I found you as good as wedded, I had to do what I could, while I could, and I have done it, like a Wake as I am.'

'You have, my noble and true champion,' said she, kissing him.

'Mumple!' quoth Hereward, laughing. 'Do not tempt me by being too grateful! It is hard enough to gather honey, like the bees, for other folks to eat. What if I kept you myself, now I have got you?'

'Hereward!'

'Oh, there is no fear, pretty lady. I have other things to wake over than making love to you—and one is, how we are to get to our ships, and, moreover, past Marazion town.'

And hard work they had to get thither. The county was soon roused and up in arms, and it was only by wandering a three days' circuit, through bogs and moors, all the ponies were utterly tired out, and left behind (the bulkier part of the dowry being left with them).

that they made their appearance on the shore of Mount's Bay, Hereward leading the princess in triumph upon Hannibal's horse.

After which they all sailed away for Ireland, and there, like young Benches—

'Prepared another wedding,
With all their hearts so full of glee.'

And this is the episode of the Cornish princess, as told (the outlines of it at least) by Richard of Ely, after Leofric the mass-priest's manuscript.

CHAPTER VI

HOW HERWARD WAS WRECKED UPON THE FLANDERS SHORE

HERWARD had drunk his share at Sigtryg's wedding. He had helped to harry the lands of Feargus till (as King Ranaid had threatened) there was not a sucking pig left in Ivark, and the poor folk died of famine, as they did about every seven years, he had burst (says the chronicler) through the Irish camp with a chosen band of Berserkers, slain Feargus in his tent, brought off his war horn as a trophy, and cut his way back to the Danish army—a feat in which the two Swards were grievously wounded, and had in all things shown himself a daring and wakeful captain, as careless of his own life as of other folk's.

Then a great home-sickness had seized him. He would go back and see the old house, and the cattle pastures, and the mees and fens of his boyhood. He would see his widowed mother. Perhaps her heart was softened to him by now, as his was toward her, and if not, he could show her that he could do without her, that others thought him a fine fellow if she did not. Hereward knew that he had won honour and glory for himself, that the Wake's name was in the mouths of all warriors and sea-rovers round the coasts as the most likely young champion of the time, able to rival, if he had the opportunity, the prowess of Harold Harefoot himself. Yes, he would go and see his mother—he would be kind if she was kind, if she were not, he would boast and swagger, as he was but too apt to do. That he should go back at the risk of his life, that any one who found him on English ground might kill him, and that many would certainly try to kill him, he knew very well. But that only gave special zest to the adventure.

Martin Lightfoot heard this news with joy.

'I have no more to do here,' said he. 'I have searched and asked far and wide for the man I want, but he is not on the Irish shores. Some say he is gone to the Orkneys, some to Denmark. Never mind, I shall find him before I die.'

'And for whom art looking?'

'For one Thord Gunlansson, my father

'And what wantest thou with him?'

'To put this through his brain.' And he showed his axe.

'Thy father's brain?'

'Look you, lord. A man owes his father nought, and his mother all. At least, so hold I. "Man that is of woman born," say all the world, and they say right. Now, if any man hang up that mother by hands and feet, and fling her to death, is not he that is of that mother born bound to revenge her upon any man, and all the more if that man had first his wicked will of that poor mother? Considering that last, lord, I do not know but what I am bound to avenge my mother's shame upon the man, even if he had never killed her. No, lord, you need not try to talk this out of my head. It has been there nigh twenty years, and I say it over to myself every night before I sleep, lest I should forget the one thing which I must do before I die. Find him I will, and find him I shall, if there be justice in heaven above.'

So Hereward asked Ranaid for ships, and got at once two good vessels, as payment for his doughty deeds.

One he christened the Garpik, from her narrow build and long leak, and the other the Ulf, because, he said, whatever she grappled she would never let go till she heard the bones crack. They were excellent new 'knuckers,' nearly eighty feet long each, with double banks for twelve oars a side in the waist, which was open save a lighting gangway along the sides, with high poop and forecastle decks, and with one large sail apiece, embroidered by Sigtryg's princess and the other ladies with a huge white bear, which Hereward had chosen as his ensign.

As for men, there were fifty fellows as desperate as Hereward himself, to take service with him for that or any other quest. So they ballasted their ships with great pebbles, stowed under the thwarts, to be used as ammunition in case of boarding, and over them the barrels of ale, and pork, and meal, well covered with tarpaulins. They stowed in the cabins fore and aft their weapons—swords, spears, axes, bows, chests of arrow heads, leather bags of bowstrings, mail-shirts and helmets, and fine clothes for holidays and fighting-days. They hung their shields, after the old fashion, outboard along the gunnel, and a right gay show they made, and so rowed out of Waterford harbour amid the tears of the ladies and the cheers of the men.

But, as it befell, the voyage did not prosper. Hereward found his vessels under-manned, and had to sail northward for fresh hands. He got none in Dublin, for they were all gone to the Welsh marches to help Earl Algar and King Grifin. So he went on through the Hebrides, intending, of course, to plunder as he went, but there he got but little booty, and lost several men. So he went on again to the Orkneys to try for fresh hands from the Norse earls thereof, but there befell a fresh mishap. They were followed by a whale, which they made sure was a witch-whale, and boded more ill luck, and accordingly they were struck by a storm in the Pentland Frith, and the poor Garpiks went on shore on Hoy, and was left there for over and a day, her crew being hardly saved, and very little of her cargo.

However, the Otter was now not only manned, but over-manned, and Hereward had to leave a dozen stout fellows with Karl Bruce in Kirkwal, and sailed southward again, singing cheerily to his men—

'Lightly the long-snake Leaps after tempests,
Gaily the sun gleam
Glow after rain
In labour and daring
Lies luck for all mortals,
Foul winds and foul witch wives
Fray women alone.'

But their mishaps were not over yet. They were hardly out of Stronsay Firth when they saw the witch-whale again, following them up, rolling, and spouting, and breaching, in most uncannily wise. Some said that they saw a gray woman on his back, and they knew, possibly from the look of the sky, but certainly from the whale's behaviour, that there was more heavy weather yet coming from the northward.

From that day forward the whale never left them, nor the wild weather either. They were beaten out of all reckoning. Once they thought they saw low land to the eastward, but what or where, who could tell? and as for making it, the wind, which had blown hard from north-east, backed against the sun and blew from west, from which, as well as from the witch-whale, they expected another gale from north and round to north-east.

The men grew sulky and fearful. Some were for trying to run the witch down and break her back, as did Frithof in like case, when hunted by a whale with two hags upon his back—an excellent recipe in such cases, but somewhat difficult in a heavy sea. Others said that there was a doomed man on board, and proposed to cast lots till they found him out, and cast him into the sea, as a sacrifice to Agir the wave-god. But Hereward scouted that as unmanly and cowardly, and sang—

'With blood of my bold-ones
With hale of my comrades,
Thinks Agir, brine thirsty,
His throat he can slake?
Though salt spray, shrill-sounding,
Sweep round in swan's flight,
True hearts, troth-plighted,
Together we'll die.'

At last, after many days, their strength was all but worn out. They had long since given over rowing, and contented themselves with running under a close-reefed canvas whithersoever the storm should choose. At night a sea broke over them, and would have swamped the Otter, had she not been the best of sea-boats. But she only rolled the lee shields into the water and out again, shook herself, and went on. Nevertheless, there were three men on the poop when the sea came in, who were not there when it went out.

Wet and wild dawned that morning, showing naught but gray sea and gray air. Then sang Hereward—

'Cheerily, my sea-cocks,
Grow for the day-dawn
Weary and wet are we,
Water beladen
Wester our comrades,
Whelmed by the witch-whales
Us Agir granted
Grudging, to Gondul,
Doomed to die dry-shod,
During the foe.'

Whereat the hearts of the men were much cheered.

All of a sudden, as is the wont of gales at dawn, the clouds rose, tore up into ribands, and with a fierce black shower or two, blew clean away, disclosing a bright blue sky, a green rolling sea, and a few miles off to leeward a pale yellow line, seen only as they topped a wave, but seen only too well. To keep the ship off shore was impossible, and as they drifted nearer and nearer, the line of sand-hills rose, uglier and more formidable, through the gray spray of the surf.

'We shall die on shore, but not dry-shod,' said Martin. 'Do any of you knights of the far brush know whether we are going to be drowned in Christian waters? I should like a mass or two for my soul, and shall die the happier within sight of a church tower.'

'One dune is as like another as one pea, we may be anywhere between the Taxel and Cap Gris Nez, but I think nearer the latter than the former.'

'So much the worse for us,' said another. 'If we had gone ashore among these Frieslanders, we should have been only knocked on the head outright, but if we fall among the Frenchmen, we shall be clapt in prison strong, and tortured till we find ransom.'

'I don't see that,' said Martin. 'We can all be drowned if we like, I suppose.'

'Drowned we need not be, if we be men,' said the old sailing-master to Hereward. 'The tide is full high, and that gives us one chance for our lives. Keep her head straight, and row like fiends when we are once in the surf, and then beach her up high and dry and take what befalls after.'

And what was likely to befall was ugly enough. Then, as centuries after, all wrecks and wrecked men were public prey, shipwrecked mariners were liable to be sold as slaves; and the petty counts of the French and Flemish shores were but too likely to extract ransom by prison and torture, as Guy, Earl of Ponthieu, would have done (so at least William, Duke of Normandy, hunted by Harold Godwinsson, had not William, for his own politic ends, begged the release of the shipwrecked earl).

Already they had been seen from the beach. The country folk, who were prowling about the shore after the waifs of the storm, deserted jetsom and legend, and crowded to meet the richer prize which was coming in flotsom, to become jetsom in its turn.

'Axemen and bowmen, put on your harness, and be ready, but nether strike nor shoot till I give the word. We must land peaceably if we can; if not, we will die fighting.'

So said Hereward, and took the rudder into his own hand. 'Now then,' as she rushed into the breakers, 'pull together, rowers all, and with a will!'

The men yolled, and sprang from the thwarts as they tugged at the oars. The sea boiled past them, surged into the waist, blinded them with spray. The Otter graved the sand once, twice, thrice, leaping forward gallantly each time, and then, pressed by a huge wave, drove high and dry upon the beach, as the oars snapped right and left, and the men tumbled over each other in heaps.

The peasants swarmed down like flies to a carcass, but they recoiled as there rose over the fore-castle bulwarks, not the broad hats of peaceful buscarles, but peaked helmets, round red shields, and glittering axes. They drew back, and one or two arrows flew from the crowd into the ship. But at Hereward's command no arrows were shot in answer.

'Bale her out quietly, and let us show these fellows that we are not afraid of them. That is the best chance of peace.'

At this moment a mounted party came down between the sand-hills; it might be, some twenty strong. Before their rode a boy on a jennet, and by him a clerk, as he seemed, upon a mule. They stopped to talk with the peasants, and then to consult among themselves.

Suddenly the boy turned from his party, and galloping down the shore, while the clerk called after him in vain, reined up his horse fetlock deep in water, within ten yards of the ship's bows.

'Yield yourselves!' he shouted in French, as he brandished a hunting spear. 'Yield yourselves, or die!'

Hereward looked at him smiling, as he sat tight, keeping the head of his frightened horse toward the ship with hand and heel, his long locks streaming in the wind, his face full of courage and command, and of honesty and sweetness withal, and thought that he had never seen so fair a lad.

'And who art thou, thou pretty bold boy?'

'I,' said he, haughtily enough, as resenting Hereward's familiar 'thou,' 'am Arnoul,' grandson and heir of Haldwin, Marquis of Flanders, and lord of this land. And to his grace I call on you to surrender yourselves.'

Hereward looked, not only with interest, but respect, upon the grandson of one of the most famous and prosperous of northern potentates, the descendant of the mighty Charlemagne himself. He turned and told the men who the boy was.

'It would be a good trick,' quoth one, 'to catch that young whelp, and keep him as a hostage.'

'Here is what will have him on board before he can turn,' said another, as he made a running noose in a rope.

'Quiet, men! Am I master in this ship, or you?'

Hereward saluted the lad courteously. 'Verily the blood of Haldwin of the Iron Arm has not degenerated. I am happy to behold so noble a son, of so noble a race.'

'And who are you, who speak French so well, and yet by your dress are neither French nor Fleming?'

'I am Harold Næmanson, the Viking, and these my men. I am here, sailing peaceably for England, as for yielding mine yield to no living man, but die as we are, weapon in hand. I have heard of your grandfather, that he is a just man and a bountiful, therefore take this message to him, young sir. If he have wars toward, I and my men will fight for him with all our might, and earn hospitality and ransom with our only treasure, which is our sword. But if he be at peace, then let him bid us go in peace, for we are Vikings, and must fight, or rot and die.'

'You are Vikings?' cried the boy, pressing his horse into the foam so eagerly, that the men, mistaking his intent, had to be repressed again by Hereward. 'You are Vikings.' Then came on shore, and welcome. You shall be my friends. You shall be my brothers. I will answer to my grandfather. I have longed to see Vikings. I long to be a Viking myself.'

'By the hammer of Thor,' cried the old master, 'and thou wouldst make a bonny one, my lad.'

Hereward hesitated, delighted with the boy, but by no means sure of his power to protect them.

But the boy rode back to his companions, and talked and gesticulated eagerly.

Then the clerk rode down, and talked with Hereward.

'Are you Christians?' shouted he, before he would adventure himself near the ship.

'Christians we are, sir clerk, and dare do no harm to a man of God.'

The clerk rode nearer, his handsome palfrey, furred cloak, rich gloves and boots, moreover his air of command, showed that he was no common man.

'I,' said he, 'am the albot of St. Bertin of Sithin, and tutor of your prince. I can bring down, at a word, against you, the chatelem of St. Omer with all his knights, beside knights and men-at-arms of my own. But I am a man of peace, and not of war; and would have no blood shed if I can help it.'

'Then make peace,' said Hereward. 'Your

¹ The French language was at this epoch taking the place of the Teutonic in Southern Flanders, and the boy would call himself Arnoul, while old men would persist in calling him Arnulf, after the fashion of that Count of Guines, who, when upon his death bed, heard his nephew speak to him in French, and told him that he had no more time for trifles and jests—Nugis et jocis se non posse vacare. Lamb. Ard. in Kervyn de Lettenhoven Hist. de Flandre.

lord may kill us if he will, or have us for his guests if he will. If he does the first, we shall kill, each of us, a few of his men before we die, if the latter, we shall kill a few of his foes. If you be a man of God, you will counsel him accordingly.'

'Alas! alas!' said the abbot with a shudder, 'that, ever since Adam's fall, sinful man should talk of nothing but slaying and being slain, not knowing that his soul is slain already by sin, and that a worse death awaits him hereafter than that death of the body, of which he makes so light!'

'A very good sermon, my lord abbot, to listen to next Sunday morning out we are hungry, and wot, and desperate just now, and if you do not settle this matter for us, our blood will be on your head—and maybe your own likewise.'

The abbot rode out of the water faster than he had ridden in, and a fresh consultation ensued, after which the boy, with a warning gesture to his companions, turned and galloped away through the sand-hills.

'He is gone to his grandfather himself, I verily believe,' quoth Hereward.

They waited for some two hours unprovoked, and, true to their policy of seeming recklessness, shifted and dried themselves as well as they could, ate what provisions were unspoiled by the salt water, and, bracing the last barrel of ale, drank healths to each other and to the Flemings on shore.

At last down rode with the boy a noble-looking man, and behind him knights and men-at-arms. He announced himself as the chatelain of St. Omer,¹ and repeated the demand to surrender.

'There is no need for it,' said Hereward. 'We are already that young prince's guests. He has said that we shall be his friends and brothers. He has said that he will answer to his grandfather, the great marquis, whom I and mine shall be proud to serve. I claim the word of a descendant of Charlemagne.'

'And you shall have it!' cried the boy. 'Chatelain! Abbot! these men are mine. They shall come with me, and lodge in St. Bertin.'

'Heaven forfend!' murmured the abbot.

'They will be safe, at least, within your ramparts,' whispered the chatelain.

'And they shall tell me about the sea. Have I not told you how I longed for Vikings, how I will have Vikings of my own, and sail the seas with them, like my uncle Robert, and go to Spain and fight the Moors, and to Constantinople and marry the Kaiser's daughter? Come,' he cried to Hereward, 'come on shore, and he that touches you or your ship, touches me!'

¹ The chronicler says, 'Manasse Count of that land.' But I can find no such person in history. There was a Manasses, Count of Guisnes, about that time, but, as will be seen, it could not have been he who received Hereward. I have supposed, therefore, an insect probable, that the act was that of the chatelain of St. Omer. One Walere held that post in 1072.

'Sir Chatelain and my Lord Abbot,' said Hereward, 'you see that, ~~Viking~~ though I be, I am no barbarous heathen, but a French-speaking gentleman like yourselves. It had been easy for me, had I not been a man of honour, to have cast a rope, as my sailors would have had me do, over that young boy's fair head, and haled him on board, to answer for my life with his own. But I loved him at first sight, and trusted him, as I would an angel out of heaven; and I trust him still. To him, and him only, will I yield myself, on condition that I and my men shall keep all our arms and treasure, and enter his service, to fight his foes and his grandfather's, wheresoever they will, by land or sea.'

'Fair sir,' said the abbot, 'pirate though you call yourself, you speak so courtly and clerkly that I, too, am inclined to trust you, and if my young lord will have it so, into St. Bertin I will receive you, till our lord the marquis shall give orders about you and yours.'

So promises were given all round, and Hereward explained the matter to the men, without whose advice (for they were all as free as himself) he could not act.

'Needs must,' grunted they, as they packed up each his little valuables.

Then Hereward sheathed his sword, and leaping from the bow, came up to the boy.

'Put your hands between his fair air,' said the chatelain.

'That is not the manner of Vikings.'

And he took the boy's right hand, and grasped it in the plain English fashion.

'There is the hand of an honest man. Come down, men, if you be wise, and take this young lord's hand, and serve him in the wars, as I shall do.'

One by one the men came down, and each took Arnoul's hand, and shook it till the lad's face grew red. But none of them bowed or made obeisance. They looked the boy full in the face, and as they stepped back, stared round upon the ring of armed men with a smile and something of a swagger.

'These are they who bow to no man, and call no man master,' whispered the abbot.

And so they were, and so are their descendants of Scotland and Northumbria unto this very day.

The boy sprang from his horse, and walked among them and round them in delight. He admired and handled their double axes; their short sea-bows of horn and deer-sinew; their red Danish coats, their black sea-cloaks, fastened on the shoulder with rich brooches, and the gold and silver bracelets on their wrists. He wondered at their long shaggy beards, and still more at the blue patterns with which the English among them, Hereward especially, were tattooed on throat, and arm, and knee.

'Yes, you are Vikings—just such as my uncle Robert tells me of.'

Hereward knew well the exploits of Robert le Frison in Spain and Greece. 'I trust that your noble uncle,' he asked, 'is well? He was one of us poor sea-cooks, and sailed the swan's path gallantly, till he became a mighty prince. Here is a man here who was with your noble uncle in Spain.'

And he thrust forward the old master.

The boy's delight knew no bounds. He should tell him all about that in St. Bertin.

Then he rode back to the ship, and round and round her (for the tide by that time had left her high and dry), and wondered at her long snake-like lines, and carven stem and stern.

'Tell me about this ship. Let me go on board of her. I have never seen a ship inland at Mons there, and even here there are only heavy ugly busses, and little fishing-boats. No. You must be all hungry and tired. We will go to St. Bertin at once, and you shall be feasted royally. Hearken, villains!' shouted he to the peasants. 'This ship belongs to the fair air here—my guest and friend, and if any man dares to steal from her a stove or a nail I will have his thief's hand cut off.'

'The ship, fair lord,' said Hereward, 'is yours, not mine. You should build twenty more after her pattern, and man them with such lads as these, and then go down to

"Miklagard and Spanieland, That lie so far on the lee, O!"

as did your noble uncle before you.'

And so they marched inland, after the boy had dismounted one of his men and put Hereward on the horse.

'You gentlemen of the sea can ride as well as sail,' said the chatelain, as he remarked with some surprise Hereward's perfect seat and hand.

'We should soon learn to fly likewise,' laughed Hereward, 'if there were any booty to be picked up in the clouds there overhead', and he rode on by Arnoul's side, as the lad questioned him about the sea, and nothing else.

'Ah, my fair boy,' said Hereward at last, 'look there, and let those be Vikings who must.'

And he pointed to the rich pastures, broken by strips of corn-land and snug farms, which stretched between the sea and the great forest of Flanders.

'What do you mean?'

But Hereward was silent. It was so like his own native fens. For a moment there came over him the longing for a home. To settle down in such a fair fat land, and call good acres his own, and marry; and beget stalwart sons, to till the old estate when he could till no more. Might not that be a better life—at least a happier one—than restless, homeless, aimless adventure? And now—just as he had had a hope of peace—a hope of seeing his own land, his own folk, perhaps of making peace with his mother and his king, the very waves would not let him rest, but sped him forth, a storm-tossed walf, to begin life anew, fighting, he cared not whom or why, in a strange land.

So he was silent and sad withal.

'What does he mean?' asked the boy of the abbot.

'He seems a wise man: let him answer for himself.'

The boy asked once more.

'Lad! lad!' said Hereward, waking as from a dream. 'If you be heir to such a fair land as that, thank God there, and pray to Him that you may rule it justly, and keep it in peace, as they say your grandfather and your father do, and leave glory, and fame, and the Vikings' bloody trade, to those who have neither father nor mother, wife nor land, but live like the wolf of the wood, from one meal to the next.'

'I thank you for those words, Sieur Heraud,' said the good abbot, while the boy went on abashed, and Hereward himself was startled at his own saying, and rode silent till they crossed the drawbridge of St. Bertin, and entered that ancient fortress, so strong that it was the hiding-place in war time for all the treasures of the country, and so sacred withal that no woman, dead or alive, was allowed to defile it by her presence, so that the wife of Baldwin the Bold, ancestor of Arnoul, wishing to be buried by the side of her husband, had to remove his corpse from St. Bertin to the abbey of Blandigny, where the Counts of Flanders lay in glory for many a generation.

The pirates entered, not without gloomy distrust, the gates of that consecrated fortress, while the monks in their turn were (and with some reason) considerably frightened when they were asked to entertain as guests forty Norse rovers. Loudly did the elder among them bewail (in Latin, lest their guests should understand too much) the present weakness of their monastery, where St. Bertin and St. Omer were left to defend themselves and their monks against the wicked world outside. Far different had been their case some hundred and seventy years before. Then St. Valeri and St. Riquier of Pontlieu, transported thither from their own resting-places in France for fear of the invading Northmen, had joined their suffrages and merits to those of St. Bertin and his winelove servants, with such success that the abbey had never been defiled by the foot of the heathen. But alas! the saints (that is, their bodies) after a while became home-sick, and St. Valeri, appearing in a dream to Hugh Capet, bade him bring them back to France in spite of Arnulf, count of those parts, who wished much to retain so valuable an addition to his household gods.

But in vain. Hugh Capet was a man who took few denials. With knights and men-at-arms he came, and Count Arnulf had to send home the holy corpses with all humility, and leave St. Bertin and St. Omer to themselves.

Whereon St. Valeri appeared in a dream to Hugh Capet, and said unto him, 'Because thou hast zealously done what I commanded, thou and thy successors shall reign in the kingdom of France to everlasting generations.'

However, there was no refusing the grandson and heir of Count Baldwin, and the hearts of the monks were comforted by hearing that Hereward was a good Christian, and that most of his crew had been at least baptized. The abbot therefore took courage, and admitted them into the hospice, with solemn warnings as to the doom which they might expect if they took the value of a horse-nail from the patrimony of the blessed saint. Was he less powerful or less careful of his own honour than St. Lioven of Holthem, who, not more than fifty years before, had struck stone-blind four soldiers of the Emperor Henry's, who had dared, after warning, to plunder the altar?¹ Let them remember, too, the fate of their own forefathers, the heathens of the North, and the check which, one hundred and seventy years before, they had received under those very walls. They had exterminated the people of Walcheren, they had taken prisoner Count Regnier, they had burnt Ghent, Bruges, and St. Omer itself, close by; they had left nought between the Scheldt and the Somme save stark corpses and blackened ruins. What could withstand them till they dared to lift audacious hands against the heavenly lord who sleeps there in Sithu? Then they poured down in vain over the Heilig-Veld, unnumbered as the locusts. Poor monks, strong in the protection of the holy Bertin, sallied out and smote them hip and thigh, singing their psalms the while. The ditches of the fortress were filled with unbaptized corpses, the piles of vine-twigs which they lighted to burn down the gates, turned their flames into the Norsemen's faces at the bidding of St. Bertin, and they fled from that temporal fire to descend into that which is eternal, while the gates of the pit were too narrow for the multitude of their miscreant souls.²

So the Norsemen heard, and feared, and only cast longing eyes at the gold and tapestries of the altars, when they went in to mass.

For the good abbot, gaining courage still further, had pointed out to Hereward and his men that it had been surely by the merits and suffrages of the blessed St. Bertin that they had escaped a watery grave.

Hereward and his men, for their part, were not inclined to deny the theory. That they had miraculously escaped, from the accident of the tide being high, they knew full well, and that St. Bertin should have done them the service was probable enough. He, of course, was lord and master in his own country, and very probably a few miles out to sea likewise.

So Hereward assured the abbot that he had no mind to eat St. Bertin's bread, or accept his favours, without paying honestly for them, and after mass he took from his shoulders a handsome silk cloak (the only one he had), with a great Scotch Cairngorm brooch, and bade them buckle it on the shoulders of the great image of St. Bertin.

At which St. Bertin was so pleased (being, like many saints, male and female, somewhat proud after their death of the finery which they despised during life), that he appeared that night to a certain monk, and told him that if Hereward would continue duly to honour him, the blessed St. Bertin, and his monks of that place, he would, in his turn, ensure him victory in all his battles by land and sea.

After which Hereward stayed quietly in the abbey certain days, and young Arnoul, in spite of all remonstrances from the abbot, would never leave his side till he had heard from him and from his men as much of their adventures as they thought it prudent to relate.

CHAPTER VII

HOW HERWARD WENT TO THE WAR AT GUINNES

THE dominion of Baldwin of Lille—Baldwin the Debonair—Marquis of Flanders, and just then the greatest potentate in Europe after the Kaiser of Germany and the Kaiser of Constantinople, extended from the Somme to the Scheldt, including thus much territory which now belongs to France. His forefathers had ruled there ever since the days of the 'Foresters' of Charlemagne, who held the vast forests against the heathens of the fens, and of that famous Baldwin Bras-de-fer, who, when the foul fiend rose out of the Scheldt, and tried to drag him down, tried cold steel upon him (being a practical man), and made his ghostly adversary feel so sorely the weight of the 'iron arm,' that he retired into his native mud—or even lower still.

He, like a daring knight as he was, ran off with his (so some say) early love, Judith, daughter of Charles the Bald of France, a descendant of Charlemagne himself. Married up to Ethelwulf of England, and thus stepmother of Alfred the Great—after her husband's death behaving, alas for her! not over wisely or well, she had verified the saying, and ran away with Baldwin.

'Nous revenons toujours

Charles, very wroth that one of his earls, a mere lieutenant and creature, should dare to marry a daughter of Charlemagne's house, would have attacked him with horse and foot, fire and sword, had not Baldwin been the only man who could defend his northern frontier against the heathen Norsemen.

The Pope, as Charles was his good friend, fulminated against Baldwin the excommunication destined for him who stole a widow for his wife, and all his accomplices.

Baldwin and Judith went straight to Rome, and told their story to the Pope.

He, honest man, wrote to Charles the Bald a letter which still remains,—alike merciful, sentimental, and politic, with its usual ingrained element of what we now call (from the old monastic word 'cantare') cant. Of Baldwin's horrible wickedness there is no doubt. Of his repentance (in all matters short of amendment of life, by giving up the fair Judith), still less. But the Pope has 'another motive for so acting. He fears lest Baldwin, under the weight of Charles's wrath and indignation, should make alliance with the Normans, enemies of God and the holy Church, and thus an occasion arise of peril and scandal for the people of God, whom Charles ought to rule,' etc etc, which if it happened, it would be worse for them and for Charles's own soul.

To which very sensible and humanemissive (times and erecks being considered), Charles answered, after pouting and sulking, by making Baldwin bond fide king of all between Somme and Scheldt, and leaving him in peace with Judith, the wicked and the fair.

Thus all happened about A.D. 863. Two hundred years after, there ruled over that same land Baldwin the Debonair, as 'Marquis of the Flamands.'

Baldwin had had his troubles. He had fought the Count of Holland. He had fought the Emperor of Germany, during which war he had burnt the cathedral of Nimeguen, and did other unrighteous and unwise things, and had been beaten after all.

Baldwin had had his troubles, and had deserved them. But he had had his glories, and had deserved them likewise. He had cut the Fosse Neuf, or new dyke, which parted Artois from Flanders. He had so beautified the cathedral of Lille, that he was called Baldwin of Lille to his dying day. He had married Adela, the queen countess, daughter of the king of France. He had become tutor of Philip, the young king, and more or less thereby regent of the north of France, and had fulfilled his office wisely and well. He had married his eldest son, Baldwin the Good, to the terrible sorceress Riobulda, heiress of Hainault, wherefore the bridegroom was named Baldwin of Mons. He had married one of his daughters, Matilda, to William of Normandy, afterwards the Conqueror, and another, Judith, to Toesi Godwinsson, the son of the great Earl Godwin of England. She afterwards married Wolf, Duke of Bavaria, whereby, it may be, the blood of Baldwin of Flanders runs in the veins of Queen Victoria.

And thus there were few potentates of the north more feared and respected than Baldwin, the good-natured Earl of Flanders.

But one sore thorn in the side he had, which other despots after him shared with him, and had even worse success in extracting,—namely, the valiant men of Scaldmarland, which we now call Holland. Of them hereafter. At the moment of Hereward's arrival he was troubled with a lesser thorn, the Count of Guisnes (seemingly that Manasse whom Richard of Ely confounds with the chatelain, or other lawful commander, of St. Omer), who would not pay him up certain dues, and otherwise acknowledge his sovereignty.

Therefore when the chatelain of St. Omer sent him word to Bruges that a strange Viking had landed with his crew, calling himself Harold Naeniansson, and offering to take service with him, he returned for answer that the said Harold might make proof of his faith and prowess upon the said count, in which, if he acquitted himself like a good knight, Baldwin would have further dealings with him.

So the chatelain of St. Omer, with all his knights and men-at-arms, and Hereward with his sea-cocks, marched north-west up to Guisnes, with little Arnoul cantering alongside in high glee, for it was the first war he had ever seen.

And they came to the castle of Guisnes, and summoned the count, by trumpet and herald, to pay or fight.

Whereon, the count preferring the latter, certain knights of his came forth and challenged the knights of St. Omer to fight them man to man. Whereon there was the usual splintering of lances and slipping up of horses, and hewing at heads and shoulders so well defenced in mail that no one was much hurt. The archers and arbalesters, meanwhile, amused themselves by shooting at the castle walls, out of which they clipped several small pieces of stone. And when they were all tired they drew off on both sides, and went in to dinner.

At which Hereward's men, who were accustomed to a more serious fashion of fighting, stood by, mightily amused, and vowing it was as pretty a play as ever they saw in their lives.

The next day the same comedy was repeated. 'Let me go in against those knights, sir chatelain,' asked Hereward, who felt the lust of battle tingling in him from head to heel, 'and try if I cannot do somewhat towards deciding all this. If we fight no faster than we did yesterday our beards will be grown down to our knees before we take Guisnes.'

'Let my Viking go!' cried Arnoul. 'Let me see him fight!' as if he had been a pet gamecock or bull dog.

'You can break a lance, fine sir, if it please you,' said the chatelain.

'I break more than lances,' quoth Hereward, as he cantered off.

'You,' said he to his men, 'draw round hither to the left, and when I drive the Frenchmen to the right, make a run for it, and get between them and the castle gate, and we will try the Danish axe against their horses' legs.'

Then Hereward spurred his horse, shouting 'A Wake! A Wake!' and dashed into the press, and therein did mightily, like any Turpin or Roland, till he saw lie on the ground, close to the castle gate, one of the chatelain's knights with four Guisnes knights around him. At them he rode, and slew them every one; and mounted the wounded Fleming on his own horse and led him across the field, though the archers shot sore at him from the wall. And when the press rode at him, his Danish men got between them and the castle, and made a stand to cover him. Then the Guisnes knights rode at them scornfully, crying—

'What footpad-ohurls have we here, who fancy they can face horsed knights!'

But they did not know the stuff of the Danish men, who all shouted 'A Wake! A Wake!' and turned the lances' points with their targets, and hewed off the horses' heads, and would have hewed off the riders' likewise, had not Hereward bidden them give quarter, according to the civilized fashion of France and Flanders. Whereon all the knights who were not taken rode right and left, and let them pass through in peace, with several prisoners, and him whom Hereward had rescued.

At which little Arnoul was as proud as if he had done it himself, and the chatelain sent word to Baldwin that the newcomer was a prudhomme of no common merit, while the heart of the Count of Guisnes became as water, and his knights, both those who were captives and those who were not, complained indignantly of the unchivalrous trick of the Danes. How villainous for 'men on foot, not only to face knights, but to bring them down to their own standing ground by basely outting off their horses' heads!

To which Hereward answered, that he knew the rules of chivalry as well as any of them, but he was lured, not to joust at a tournament, but to make the Count of Guisnes pay his lord Baldwin, and make him pay he would.

The next day he bade his men sit still and look on, and leave him to himself. And when the usual 'monomachy' began, he singled out the burliest and boldest knight whom he saw, rode up to him lance point in air, and courteously asked him to come and be killed in fair fight. The knight being, says the chronicler, 'magnificent in valour of soul and council of war, and held to be as a lion in fortitude throughout the army,' and seeing that Hereward was by no means a large or a heavy man, replied as courteously, that he should have great pleasure in trying to kill Hereward. On which they rode some hundred yards out of the press, calling out that they were to be left alone by both sides, for it was an honourable duel, and turning their horses, charged.

After which act they found themselves and their horses all four in a row, sitting on their hind-quarters on the ground, amid the fragments of their lances.

'Well ridden!' shouted they both at once, as they leaped up laughing, and drew their swords.

After which they hammered away at each other merrily in the devil's smithy. The sparks flew, the iron rang; and all men stood still to see that gallant fight.

So they watched and cheered, till Hereward struck his man such a blow under the ear, that he dropped, and lay like a log.

'I think I can carry you,' quoth Hereward, and picking him up, he threw him over his shoulder, and walked towards his men.

'Bear and bullock!' shouted they in de'light, laughing at the likeness between Hereward's attitude and that of a bear waddling off on his hind legs with his prey in his arms.

'He should have killed his bullock outright before he went to carry him. Look there!'

And the knight, awakening from his swoon, struggled violently (says the chronicler) to escape.

But Hereward, though the smaller, was the stronger man, and crushing him in his arms, walked on steadily.

'Knights to the rescue! Hoibricht is taken!' shouted they of Guisnes, galloping towards him.

'A Wake! a Wake! To me Vikings all!' shouted Hereward. And the Danes leapt up, and ran towards him, axe in hand.

The chatelain's knights rode up likewise, and so it befell that Hereward carried his prisoner safe into camp.

'And who are you, gallant knight?' asked he of his prisoner.

'Hoibricht, nephew of Eustace, Count of Guisnes.'

'So I suppose you will be ransomed. Till then—Armourer!'

And the hapless Hoibricht found himself chained and fettered, and sent off to Hereward's tent, under the custody of Martin Lightfoot.

'The next day,' says the chronicler, 'the Count of Guisnes, stupefied with grief at the loss of his nephew, sent the due honour and service to his prince, besides gifts and hostages.'

And so ended the troubles of Baldwin and Eustace of Guisnes.

CHAPTER VIII

HOW A FAIR LADY EXERCISED THE MECHANICAL ART TO WIN HEReward's LOVE

In an upper room of her mother's house in St. Omer sat the fair Torfrida, alternately looking out of the window and at a book of mechanics. In the garden outside, the wryneck (as it is his fashion in May) was calling Pi-pi-pi among the gooseberry bushes, till the cob-walls rang again. In the book was a Latin recipe for drying the poor wryneck, and using him as a philtre which should compel the love of any person desired. Mechanics, it must be understood, in those days were considered as identical with mathematics, and those again with astrology and magic; so that the old chronicler, who says that Torfrida was skilled in the 'mechanic art,' uses the word in the same sense as does the author of the History of Ramsey, who tells us how a certain holy bishop of St. Dunstan's party, riding down to Corfe through the forest, saw the wicked queen-mother Elfrida (her who had St. Edward stabbed at Corfe Gate) exercising her 'mechanic art' under a great tree, in plain English, performing heathen incantations, and how, when she saw that she was discovered, she tempted him to deadly sin, but when she found him proof against allurements, she had him into her bower; and there the enchantress and her ladies slew him by thrusting red-hot bodkins under his arms, so that the blessed man was martyred without any sign of wound. Of all which let every man believe as much as he list.

Torfrida had had peculiar opportunities of learning mechanics. The fairest and richest damsel in St. Omer, she had been left early by her father an orphan, to the care of a superstitious mother, and of a learned uncle, the Abbot of St. Bertin. Her mother was a Provençale, one of those Arlescunes whose dark Greek beauty still shines, like diamonds set in jet, in the doorways of the quaint old city. Gay enough in her youth, she had, like a true southern woman, taken to superstition in her old age, and spent her days in the churches, leaving her daughter to do and learn what she would. Torfrida's nurse, moreover, was a Lapp woman, carried off in some jangling foray, and skilled in all the sorceries for which the Lapps were famed throughout the North. Her uncle, partly from good-nature, partly from a pious hope that she might enter religion, and leave her wealth to the Church, had made her his pupil, and taught her the mysteries of books, and she had proved to be a strangely apt scholar. Grammar, rhetoric, Latin prose and poetry, such as were taught in those days, she mastered ere she was grown up. Then she fell upon romance, and Charlemagne and his Paladins, the heroes of Troy, Alexander and his generals, peopled her imagination. She had heard, too, of the great necromancer Virgilius (for into such the middle age transformed the poet), and, her fancy already excited by her Lapp nurse's occult science, she began eagerly to court forbidden lore.

Forbidden, indeed, was magic by the Church, but as a reality, not as an imposture. Those whose consciences were tough and their faith weak, had little scruple in applying to a witch, and asking help from the powers below, when the saints above were slack to hear them. Churchmen, even, were bold enough to learn the mysteries of nature, algebra, judicial astrology, and the occult powers of herbs, stones, and animals, from the Mussulman doctors of Cordova and Seville; and, like Pope Gerbert, mingle science and magic, in a fashion excusable enough in days when true inductive science did not exist.

Nature had her marvellous powers—how far good, how far evil, who could tell? The belief that God was the sole maker and ruler of the universe was confused and darkened by the cross-belief that the material world had fallen under the dominion of Satan and his demons, that millions of spirits, good and evil in every degree, exercised continually powers over crops and cattle, mines and wells, storms and lightning, health and disease. Riches, honours, and royalties, too, were under the command of the powers of darkness. For that generation, which was but too apt to take its Bible in hand upside down, had somehow a firm faith in the word of the devil, and believed devoutly his somewhat startling assertion, that the kingdoms of the world were his, and the glory of them, for to him they were delivered, and to whomsoever he would he gave them while it had a proportionally weak faith in our Lord's answer, that they were to worship and serve the Lord God alone. How far these powers extended, how far they might be counteracted, how far lawfully employed, were questions which exercised the minds of men, and produced a voluminous literature for several centuries, till the search died out, for very weariness of failure, at the end of the seventeenth century.

The Abbot of St. Bertin, therefore, did not hesitate to keep in his private library more than one volume which he would not have willingly lent to the simple monks under his charge, nor to Torfrida either, had she not acquired so complete a command over the good old man, that he could deny her nothing.

So she read of Gerbert, Pope Sylvester II., who had died only a generation back, how (to quote William of Malmesbury) 'he learned at Seville till he surpassed Ptolemy with the astrolabe, Alcaudrus in astronomy, and Julius Firmicus in judicial astrology; how he learned what the singing and flight of birds portended, and acquired the art of calling up spirits from hell, and, in short, whatever—hurtful or healthful—human curiosity had discovered, besides the lawful sciences of arithmetic and astronomy, music and geometry,' how he acquired from the Saracens the abacus (a counting table), how he escaped from the Moslem magician, his tutor, by making a compact with the foul fiend, and putting himself beyond the power of magic, by hanging himself under a wooden bridge, so as to touch neither earth nor water, how he taught Robert King of France, and Kaiser Otto III., surnamed 'The wonder of the world', how he made an hydraulic organ which played tunes by steam, standing even then in the cathedral of Rheims, how he discovered in the Campus Martius at Rome wondrous treasures, and a golden king and queen, golden courtiers and guards, all lighted by a single carbuncle, and guarded by a boy with a bent bow, who, when Gerbert's servant stole a golden knife, shot an arrow at that carbuncle, and all was darkness, and yells of demons.

All this Torfrida had read, and read, too, how Gerbert's brazen head had told him that he should be pope, and not die till he had sung mass at Jerusalem, and how both had come true—the latter in mockery, for he was stricken with deadly sickness in Rome, as he sang mass at the church called Jerusalem, and died horribly, tearing himself in pieces.

Which terrible warning had as little effect on Torfrida as other terrible warnings have on young folk, who are minded to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil.

So Torfrida beguiled her lonely life in that dull town, looking out over dreary flats and muddy dykes, by a whole dream-world of fantastic imaginations, and was ripe and ready for any wild deed which her wild brain might suggest.

Pure she was all the while, generous and noble-hearted, with a deep and sincere longing—as one soul in ten thousand has—after knowledge for its own sake, but ambitious exceedingly, and that not of monastic sanctity. She laughed to scorn the notion of a nunery, and laughed to scorn equally the notion of marrying any knight, however much of a prudhomme, whom she had yet seen. Her uncle and Marquis Baldwin could have between them compelled her, as an orphan heiress, to marry whom they liked. But Torfrida had as yet managed both the abbot and the marquis successfully. Lances had been splintered, helmets split, and more than one life lost in her honour, but she had only, as the best safeguard she could devise, given some hint of encouragement to one Ascelin, a tall knight of St. Valeri, the most renowned and courtly bully of those parts, by bestowing on him a scrap of ribbon, and bidding him keep it against all comers. By this means she ensured the personal chastisement of all other youths who dared to lift their eyes to her, while she by no means bound herself to her spadassin of St. Valeri. The method was rough, but so was the time, and what better could a poor lady do in days when no man's life, or woman's honour, was safe, unless (as too many were forced to do) she retired into a cloister, and got from the Church that peace which this world certainly could not give, and, happily, dared not take away!

The arrival of Hereward and his men had, of course, stirred the great current of her life, and, indeed, that of St. Omer, usually as stagnant as the dykes round its wall. Who the unknown champion was (for his name of Naemans-son showed that he was concealing something at least)—whence he had come, and what had been his previous exploits, bustled all the gossips of the town. Would he and his men rise and plunder the abbey? Was not the chatelain mad in leaving young Arnoul with him all day? Maddier still, in taking him out to battle against the Count of Guines? He might be a spy, the avant-courier of some great invading force. He was come to spy out the nakedness of the land, and would shortly vanish, to return with Harold Hardrade of Norway, or Sweyn of Denmark, and all their hosts. Nay, was he not Harold Hardrade himself in disguise? And so forth. All which Torfrida heard, and thought within herself that, be he who he might, she should like to look on him again.

Then came the news how, the very first day that he had gone out against the Count of Guines, he had gallantly rescued a wounded man. A day or two after came fresh news of some doughty deed, and then another and another. And when Hereward returned, after a week's victorious fighting, all St. Omer was in the street to stare at him.

Then Torfrida heard enough, and, had it been possible, more than enough, of Hereward and his prowess.

And when they came riding in, the great marquis at the head of them all, with Robert le Frison on one side of him, and on the other Hereward, as fresh as flowers in May, Torfrida looked down on him out of her little lattice in the gable, and loved him, once and for all, with all her heart and soul.

And Hereward looked up at her and her dark blue eyes and dark raven locks; and thought her the fairest thing that he had ever seen, and asked who she might be, and heard, and as he heard, he forgot all about the Sultan's daughter, and the princess of Constantinople, and the fairy of Brochehaunde, and all the other pretty birds which were still in the bush about the wide world, and thought for many a day of nought but the pretty bird which he held (so concerted was he of his own powers of winning her) there safe in hand in St. Omer.

So he cast about to see her, and to win her love. And she cast about to see him, and to win his love. But neither saw the other for a while, and it might have been better for one of them had they never seen each other again.

If Torfrida could have foreseen, and foreseen, and foreseen—why, if she were true woman, she would have done exactly what she did, and taken the bitter with the sweet, the unknown with the known, as we all must do in life, unless we wish to live and die alone.

CHAPTER IX

HOW HERWARD WENT TO THE WAR IN SCALDMARILAND

It has been shown how the Count of Guines had been a thorn in the side of Baldwin of Lille, and how that thorn was drawn out by Hereward. But far sharper thorns in his side, which had troubled many a count before, and were destined to trouble others afterwards, were those unruly Zealanders, or Frisians, who dwelt in Scaldmariland, 'the land of the meres of the Scheldt.' Beyond the vast forests of Flanders, in morasses and alluvial islands whose names it is impossible now to verify, so much has the land changed, both by inundations and by embankments, by the brute forces of nature and the noble triumphs of art, dwelt a folk, poor and savage; living mostly, as in Cesar's time, in huts raised above the sea, on piles or mounds of earth; often without cattle or seed-field; half savage, half heathen but free. Free, with the divine instinct of freedom, and all the self-help and energy which spring thereout.

They were a mongrel race; and, as most mongrel races are (when sprung from parents not too far apart in blood), a strong race, the remnant of those old Frisians and Batavians, who had defied, and all but successfully resisted, the power of Rome, mingled with fresh crosses of Teutonic blood from Frank, Sueve, Saxon, and the other German tribes, who, after the fall of the Roman Empire, had swept across the land.

Their able modern historian has well likened their first struggle—that between Civilis and the Romans, to their last—that between William the Silent and the Spaniard. It was, without doubt, the foreshadow of their whole history. They were distinguished, above most European races, for sturdy independence, and for what generally accompanies it—sturdy common sense. They could not understand why they should obey foreign Frank rulers, whether set over them by Dagobert or by Charlemagne. They could not understand why they were to pay tithes to foreign Frank priests, who had forced on them, at the sword's point, a religion which they only half believed and only half understood. Many a truly holy man preached to them to the best of his powers, but the cross of St. Boniface had too often to follow the sword of Charles Martel, and for every Frisian who was converted another was killed.

'Frog Frisians,' nevertheless, they remained, at least in name and in their statute book, 'as long as the wind blows out of the clouds and the world stands.' The feudal system never took root in their soil. If a Frank count was to govern them, he must govern according to their own laws. Again and again they rebelled, even against that seemingly light rule. Again and again they brought down on themselves the wrath of their nominal sovereigns, the counts of Flanders, then of the kaisers of Germany, and, in the thirteenth century, of the Inquisition itself. Then a crusade was preached against them as 'Stadings,' heretics who paid no tithes, ill used monks and nuns, and worshipped (or were said to worship) a black cat and the foul hound among the meres and fens. Conrad of Marburg, the brutal Director of St. Elizabeth of Hungary, burnt them at his wicked will, extirpating, it may be, heresy, but not the spirit of the race. That spirit, crushed down and seemingly enslaved during the middle age, under Count Dirk and his descendants, still lived, destined at last to conquer. They were a people who had determined to see for themselves and act for themselves in the universe in which they found themselves, and, moreover (a necessary corollary of such a resolution), to fight to the death against any one who interfered with them in so doing.

Again and again, therefore, the indomitable spirit rose, founding free towns with charters and guilds; embanking the streams, draining the meres; fighting each other and the neighbouring princes; till, in their last great struggle against the Pope and Spain, they rose once and for all,

'Heated hot with burning fears,
And bathed in baths of hissing tears,
And battered with the strokes of doom
To shape and use,'

as the great Protestant Dutch Republic.

A noble errand it had been for such a man as Hereward to help those men toward freedom, instead of helping Frank counts to enslave them,—men of his own blood, with laws and customs like those of his own Anglo-Danes, living in a land so exactly like his own that every mere and fen and wood reminded him of the scenes of his boyhood. The very names of the two lands were alike—'Holland,' the hollow land—the one of England, the other of Flanders.

But all this was hidden from Hereward. To do as he would be done by was a lesson which he had never been taught. If men had invaded his land, he would have cried, like the Frisians whom he was going to enslave, 'I am free as long as the wind blows out of the clouds!' and died where he stood. But that was not the least reason why he should not invade any other man's land, and try whether or not he, too, would die where he stood. To him these Frislanders were simply savages, probably heathens, who would not obey their lawful lord, a gentleman and a Christian, besides, renowned, and possibly a little plunder, might be got by beating them into obedience. He knew not what he did, and knew not, likewise, that as he had done to others, so would it be done to him.

Baldwin had at that time made over his troublesome Hollanders* to his younger son Robert, the Viking whom little Arnoul longed to imitate.

Florent, Count of Holland, and vassal of the great marquis, had just died, leaving a pretty young widow, to whom the Hollanders had no mind to pay one stiver more than they were forced. All the isles of Zeeland, and the counties of Eonham and Alost, were doing that which was right in the sight of their own eyes, and finding themselves none the worse therefor, though the Countess Gertrude, doubtless, could buy fewer silks of Greece or gems of Italy. But to such a distressed lady a champion could not long be wanting. Robert had been driven out of Spain by the Moors with fearful loss, and, in a second attempt, wrecked with all his fleet as soon as he got out of port. He then, it would seem, started in palmer's guise, nominally for Jerusalem, but really for Byzant. For, according to Lambert of Aschaffenburg, certain Norman Vikings had offered to make him Kaiser of Greece, and more than rival of Robert Guiscard in his new Italian kingdom. But the existing Greek kaiser, hearing of the plot, commanded him to be slain as soon as he set foot on shore. To avoid which end the disappointed palmer wended homeward once more, and resolved to change thenceforth the salt water for the fresh, and leave the swan's path for that of the humble ducks and geese of Holland.

So he rushed to avenge the wrongs of the Countess Gertrude, and his father, whose good sense foresaw that the fiery Robert would raise storms upon his path—happily for his old age he did not foresee the worst—let him go, with his blessing.

Then Robert gathered to him valiant ruffians, as many as he could find, and when he heard of the Viking who had brought Eustace of Guisnes to reason, it seemed to him that he was a man who would do his work. And when the great marquis came down to St. Omer to receive the homage of Count Eustace of Guisnes, Robert came thither too, and saw Hereward.

'You have done us good service, Harold Naemansson, as it pleases you to be called,' said Baldwin, smiling. 'But some man's son you are, if ever I saw a gallant knight, earl-born by his looks as well as his deeds.'

Hereward bowed.

'And for me,' said Robert, 'Naemansson or earl's son, here is my Viking's welcome to all Vikings like myself.' And he held out his hand.

Hereward took it.

'You failed in Galicia, beansire, only because your foes were a hundred to one. You will not fail here where you are going, if (as I hear) they are but ten to one.'

Robert laughed, vain and gratified.

'Then you know where I have been, and where I am going!'

'Why not? As you know well, we Vikings are all brothers, and all know each other's counsel, from ship to ship, and port to port.'

Then the two young men looked each other in the face, and each saw that the other was a man who would suit him.

'Skall to the Viking!' cried Robert, spring, as was his fancy, the Norse rovers' slang. 'Will you come with me to Holland?'

'You must ask my young lord there,' and he pointed to Arnoul. 'I am his man now, by all laws of honour.'

A flush of jealousy passed over Robert's face. He, haplessly for himself, thought that he had a grievance.

The rights of primogeniture—droits d'aînesse—were not respected in the family of the Baldwins as they should have been, had prudence and common sense had their way.

No sacred or divine right was held to be conferred by the fact of a man's being the first-born son. As among the Jews of old, the 'Lord's anointed' was usually rather a younger son of talent and virtue; one born, not according to the flesh, but according to the spirit, like David and Solomon. And so it was in other realms besides Flanders during the middle age. The father handed on the work—for ruling was hard work in those days—to the son most able to do it. Therefore we can believe Lambert of Aschaffenburg when he says that in Count Baldwin's family for many ages the son who pleased his father most took his father's name, and was hereditary prince of all Flanders; while the other brothers led an inglorious life of vassalage to him.

But we can conceive, likewise, that such a method would give rise to intrigues, envyings, calumnies, murders, fratricidal civil wars, and all the train of miseries which for some years after this history made infamous the house of Baldwin; as they did many another royal house, till they were stopped by the gradual adoption of the rational rule of primogeniture.

So Robert, who might have been a daring and useful friend to his brother, had he been forced to take for granted from birth that he was nothing, and his brother all in all—as do all younger sons of English noblemen, to their infinite benefit—held himself to be an injured man for life, because his father called his first-born Baldwin, and promised him the succession—which indeed he had worthily deserved, according to the laws of Mammon and this world, by bringing into the family such an heiress as Richilda, and such a dowry as Mona.

But Robert, who thought himself as good as his brother (though he was not such, save in valour), nursed black envy in his heart. Hard it was to him to hear his elder brother called Baldwin of Mona, when he himself had not a foot of land of his own. Harder still to hear him called Baldwin the Good, when he felt in himself no title whatsoever to that epithet. Hardest of all to see a beautiful boy grow up as heir both of Flanders and of Hainault.

Had he foreseen whither that envy would have led him, had he foreseen the hideous and fratricidal day of February 22, 1071, and that fair boy's golden locks rolling in dust and blood—the wild Viking would have crushed the growing snake within his bosom, for he was a knight and a gentleman. But it was hidden from his eyes. He had to 'dree his weird', to commit great sins, do great deeds, and die in his bed, mighty and honoured, having children to his heart's desire, and leaving the rest of his substance to his babes. Heaven help him and the like of him!

He turned to young Arnoul—

'Give me your man, boy!'

Arnoul pouted. He wanted to keep his Viking for himself, and said so.

'He is to teach me to go leding, as the Norsemen call it, like you.'

Robert laughed. A hint at his puratorial attempts pleased his vanity, all the more because they had been signal failures.

'Lend him me, then, my pretty nephew, for a month or two, till he has conquered these Zealand frogs for me, and then, if you will go leding with him—'

'I hope you may never come back,' thought Robert to himself; but he did not say it.

'Let the knight go,' quoth Baldwin.

'Let me go with him, then.'

'No, by all saints!' quoth the marquis, 'I cannot have you poked through with a Zealand pike, or rotted with a Zealand ague.'

Arnoul pouted still.

'Abbot, what hast thou been at with the boy? He thinks of nought but blood and wounds, instead of books and prayers. He is gone mad after this—this knight.'

'The abbot,' said Hereward, 'knows by hearing of his ears, that I bid him bide at home, and try to govern lands in peace, like his father and you, lord marquis.'

'Eh!'

The abbot told honestly what had passed between Hereward and the lad, as they rode to St. Bertin.

Baldwin was silent, thinking, and smiling jollyly, as was the wont of the Debonair.

'You are a man of sense, because Como with me,' said he at last.

And Baldwin, Hereward, and Robert went into an inner room.

'Sit down on the settle by me.'

'It is too great an honour.'

'Nonsense, man! If I be who I am, I know enough of men to know that I need not be ashamed of having you as bench-fellow. Sit down.'

Hereward obeyed, of course.

'Tell me who you are.'

Hereward looked out of the corners of his eyes, smiling and perplexed.

'Tell me and Robert who you are, man, and be done with it. I believe I know already. I have asked far and wide of chapmen, and merchants, and wandering knights, and pirate rascals—like yourself.'

'And you found that I was a pirate rascal?'

'I found a pirate rascal who met you in Ireland, three years since, and will swear that if you have one gray eye and one blue—'

'As he has,' quoth Robert.

'That I am a wolf's head, and a robber of priests, and an Esau on the face of the earth, every man's hand against me and mine—for I never take but what I give—against every man.'

'That you are the son of my old friend Leofric of Chester, and the hottest-hearted, shrewdest-headed, hardest-handed Berserker in the North Seas. You killed Gilbert of Ghent's bear, Siward Dugre's cousin. Don't deny it.'

'Don't hang me, or send me to the Westminster miracle-worker to be hanged, and I will confess.'

'I! Every man is welcome who comes hither with a bold hand and a strong heart. "The Refuge of Outlaws" they call Flanders, I suppose because I am too good-natured to turn rogues out. So do no harm to mine, and mine shall do no harm to you.'

Baldwin's words were true. He found house-room for everybody, helped everybody against everybody else (as will be seen), and yet quarrelled with nobody—at least in his old age—by the mere virtue of good-nature.

So Hereward went off to exterminate the wicked Hollanders, and revenge the wrongs of the Countess Gertrude.

CHAPTER X

HOW HEReward WON THE MAGIC ARMOUR

TORFRIDA had special opportunities of hearing about Hereward, for young Arnoul was to her a pet and almost a foster-brother, and gladly escaped from the convent to tell her the news.

He had now had his first taste of the royal game of war. He had seen Hereward fight by day, and heard him tell stories over the camp fire by night. Hereward's beauty, Hereward's prowess, Hereward's songs, Hereward's strange adventures and wanderings, were for ever in the young boy's mouth, and he spent hours in helping Torfrida to guess who the great unknown might be, and then went back to Hereward, and artlessly told him of his beautiful friend, and how they had talked of him, and of nothing else, and in a week or two Hereward knew all about Torfrida, and Torfrida knew—what filled her heart with joy—that Hereward was bound to no lady-love, and owned (so he had told Arnoul) no mistress save the sword on his thigh.

Whereby there had grown up in the hearts of both of them a mutual interest, which easily became the parent of love.

When Baldwin the great marquis came to St. Omer, to receive the homage of Eustace of Guisnes, young Arnoul ran into Torfrida's chamber in great anxiety. Would his grandfather approve of what he had done? Would he allow his new friendship with the unknown?

'What care I!' said Torfrida. 'But if your friend wishes to have the marquis's favour he would be wise to trust him, at least so far as to tell his name.'

'I have told him so. I have told him that you would tell him so.'

'I! Have you been talking to him about me?'

'Why not?'

'That is not well done, Arnoul, to talk of ladies to men whom they do not know.'

Arnoul looked up, puzzled and pained, for she spoke haughtily.

'I know nought of your new friend. He may be a low-born man, for anything that I can tell.'

'He is not! He is as noble as I am. Everything he says and does—every look—shows his birth.'

'You are young—as you have shown by talking of me to him. But I have given you my advice;' and she moved listlessly away. 'Let him tell your grandfather who he is, or remain suspected.'

The boy went away sadly.

Early the next morning he burst into Torfrida's room as she was dressing her hair.

'How now! Are those manners for the heir of Flanders!'

'He has told all!'

'He has!' and she started and dropt her comb.

'Pick up that comb, girl. You need not go away. I have no secrets with young gentlemen.'

'I thought you would be glad to hear,' said Arnoul.

'I? What can I want in the matter, save that your grandfather should be satisfied that you are entertaining a man worthy to be your guest?'

'And he is worthy. He has told my grandfather who he is.'

'But not you?'

'No. They say I must not know yet. But thus I know, that they welcomed him, when he told them, as if he had been an earl's son, and that he is going with my uncle Robert against the Zealanders.'

'And if he be an earl's son, how comes he here, wandering with rough seamen, and hiding his honest name? He must have done something of which he is ashamed.'

'I shall tell you nothing more.'

'What care I? I can find out by art magic if I like.'

'I don't believe all that. Can you find out, for instance, what he has on his throat?'

'A beard.'

'But what is under that beard?'

'A goitre.'

'You are laughing at me.'

'I shall laugh at any one who challenges me to find out anything so silly, and so unfit.'

'I shall go.'

'Go then.' For she knew very well that he would come back again.

'Nurse,' said Torfrida to the old Lapp woman, when they were alone, 'find out for me what is the name of this strange champion, and what he has beneath his beard.'

'Beneath his beard?'

'Some scar, I suppose, or secret mark. I must know. You will find out for your Torfrida, will you not, nurse?'

'I will make a charm that will bring him to you, were all the icebergs of Greenland between you and him, and then you can see for yourself.'

'No, no, no! not yet, nurse!' and Torfrida smiled. 'Only find me out that one thing that I must know.'

And yet why she wanted to know she could not tell herself.

The old woman came back to her ere she went to bed.

'I have found it out, all and more. I know where to get scarlet toadstools, and I put the juice in his men's ale, they are laughing and roaring now, merry-mad every one of them.'

'But not he?'

'No, no. He is with the marquis. But in madness comes out truth, and that long hook-nosed body-varlet of his has told us all.'

And she told Torfrida who Hereward was, and the secret mark.

'There is a cross upon his throat, beneath his chin, pricked in after their English fashion.'

Torfrida started.

'Then—then the spell will not work upon him, the Holy Cross will turn it off.'

'It must be a great cross and a holy one that will turn off my charms,' said the old hag, with a sneer, 'whatever it may do against yours. But on the back of his hand—that will be a mark to know him by—there is pricked a bear—a white bear that he slew.' And she told the story of the fairy beast, which Torfrida duly stored up in her heart.

'So he has the cross on his throat,' thought Torfrida to herself. 'Well, if it keep off my charm, it will keep off others—that is one comfort, and one knows not what fairies, or witches, or evil creatures, he may meet with in the forests and the fens.'

The discovery of Hereward's rank did not, doubtless, lessen Torfrida's fancy for him. She was ambitious enough, and proud enough of her own lineage, to be full glad that her heart had strayed away—as it must needs stray somewhere—to the son of the third greatest man in England. As for his being an outlaw, that mattered little. He might be outlawed, and rich and powerful, any day in those uncertain topsy-turvy times, and for the present, his being a wolf's head only made him the more interesting to her. Women like to pity their lovers. Sometimes—may all good beings reward them for it—they love merely because they pity. And Torfrida found it pleasant to pity the insolent young coxcomb, who certainly never dreamed of pitying himself.

When Hereward went home that night, he found the abbey of St Bertin in horrible confusion. His men were grouped outside the gate, chattering like monkeys, the porter and the monks from inside entreating them vainly to come in and go to bed quietly.

But they would not. They vowed and swore that a great gulf had opened all down the road, and that one step more would tumble them in headlong. They manifested the most affectionate solicitude for the monks, warning them, on their lives, not to step across the threshold, or they would be swallowed (as Martin, who was the maddest of the lot, phrased it) with Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. In vain Hereward stormed, assured them that the supposed abyss was nothing but the gutter, proved the fact by kicking Martin over it. The men determined to believe their own eyes, and after awhile fell asleep in heaps in the roadside, and lay there till morning, when they woke, declaring, as did the monks, that they had been all bewitched. They knew not—and happily the lower orders both in England and on the Continent do not yet know—the potent virtues of that strange fungus, with which Lapps and Samoides have, it is said, practised wonders for centuries past.

The worst of the matter was, that Martin Lightfoot, who had drunk most of the poison, and had always been dreamy and uncanny, in spite of his shrewdness and humour, had from that day forward something very like a bee in his bonnet.

But before Count Robert and Hereward could collect sufficient troops for the invasion of Holland, another chance of being slain in fight arose, too tempting to be overlooked, namely, the annual tournaments at Pons and Portiers,¹ where all the noblest knights of France would assemble, to win their honour and ladies' love by hewing at each other's sinful bodies. Thither, too, over three hundred and fifty miles of bad road, the best knights of Flanders must needs go, and with them Hereward. Though no knight, he was allowed in Flanders, as he had been in Scotland, to take his place among that honourable company. For though he still refused the honour of knighthood, on the ground that he had as yet done no deed deserving thereof, he was held to have deserved it again and again, and all the more from his modesty in declining it.

So away they all went to Portiers, a right gallant meue, while Torfrida watched them go from the lattice window.

And when they had passed down the street, tramping and gingham and caracoling, young Arnoul ran into the house with eyes full of tears, because he was not allowed to go likewise, and with a message for Torfrida from no other than Hereward.

'I was to tell you this and no more that if he meets your favour in the field, he that wears it will have hard work to keep it.'

Torfrida turned pale as ashes, first with wild delight, and then with wild fear.

'He—does he know who—Sir Ascelin?'

'He knows well enough. Why not? Every one knows. Are you afraid that he is not a match for that great ox?'

'Afraid? Who said I was afraid? Sir Ascelin is no ox either, but a courteous and gallant knight.'

'You are as pale as death, and Sir—'

'Never mind what I am,' said she, putting her hands over the boy's eyes, and kissing him again and again, as a vent for her joy.

The next few days seemed years for length, but she could wait. She was sure of him now. She needed no charms. 'Perhaps,' thought she, as she looked in the glass, 'I was my own charm.' And indeed she had a fair right to say so.

At last news came.

Torfrida was sitting over her books, her mother, as usual, was praying in the church, when the old Lepp nurse came in. A knight was at the door. He said his name was Siward the White, and he came from Hereward.

From Hereward! He was at least alive, he might be wounded, though; and she rushed out of the chamber into the hall, looking more beautiful than ever, her colour heightened by the quick beating of her heart, her dark hair, worn loose and long, after the fashion of those days, streaming around her and behind her.

A handsome young man stood in the doorway, armed from head to foot.

'You are Siward, Hereward's nephew?'

He bowed assent. She took him by the hands, and, after the fashion of those days, kissed him on the small space on either cheek which was left bare between the nose-piece and the chain-mail.

'You are welcome. Hereward is—alive?'

'Alive and gay, and all the more gay at being able to send to the Lady Torfrida by me something which was once hers, and now is hers once more.'

And he drew from his bosom the ribbon of the knight of St. Valeri.

She almost snatched it from his hand, in her delight at recovering her favour.

'How—where—did he get this?'

'He saw it, in the thick of the tournament, on the helm of a knight who, he knew, had vowed to gain him or take his life, and, wishing to give him a chance of fulfilling his vow, rode him down, horse and man. The knight's French friends attacked us in force, and we Flemings, with Hereward at our head, beat them off, and overthrew so many, that we are almost all horsed at the Frenchman's expense. Three more knights, with their horses, fell before Hereward's lance.'

'And what of this favour?'

'He sends it to his owner. Let her say what shall be done with it.'

Torfrida was on the point of saying, 'He has won it, let him wear it for my sake.' But she paused. She longed to see Hereward face to face, to speak to him, if but one word. If she allowed him to wear the favour, she must at least have the pleasure of giving it with her own hands. And she paused.

'And he is killed?'

'Who? Hereward?'

'Sir Ascelin.'

'Only bruised, but he shall be killed, if you will.'

'God forbid!'

'Then,' said the knight, mistaking her meaning, 'all I have to tell Hereward is, it seems, that he has wasted his blow. He will return, therefore, to the knight of St. Valeri his horse, and, if the Lady Torfrida chooses, the favour which he has taken by mistake from its rightful owner.' And he set his teeth, and could not prevent stamping on the ground, in evident passion. There was a tone, too, of deep disappointment in his voice, which made Torfrida look keenly at him. Why should Hereward's nephew feel so deeply about that favour? And as she looked—could that man be the youth Siward? Young he was, but surely thirty years old at least. His face could hardly be seen, hidden by helmet and nose-piece above, and mailed up to the mouth below. But his long moustache was that of a grown man, his vast breadth of shoulder, his hard hand, his sturdy limbs—these surely belonged not to the slim youth whom she had seen from her lattice riding at Hereward's side. And as she looked, she saw upon his hand the bear of which her nurse had told her.

'You are deceiving me!' and she turned first deadly pale, and then crimson. 'You—you are Hereward himself!'

'I! Pardon me, my lady. Ten minutes ago I should have been glad enough to have been Hereward. Now I am thankful enough that I am only Siward, and not Hereward, who wins for himself contempt by overthrowing a knight more fortunate than he.' And he bowed, and turned away to go.

'Hereward! Hereward!' and in her passion she seized him by both his hands. 'I knew you! I know that device upon your hand. At last! at last! My hero, my Paladin! How I have longed for this moment! How I have toiled for it, and not in vain! Alas, alas!—what am I saying!' And she tried, in her turn, to escape from Hereward's mailed arm.

'Then you do not care for that man!'

'For him? Here, take my favour, wear it before all the world, and guard it as you only can, and let all know that Torfrida is your love.'

And with hands trembling with passion she bound the ribbon round his helm.

'Yes! I am Hereward,' he almost shouted, 'the Berserker, the brain-bewer, the land-thief, the sea-thief, the feeder of wolf and raven—Aoi! Ere my beard was grown, I was a match for giants. How much more now that I am a man whom ladies love! Many a champion has quailed before my very glance. How much more now that I wear Torfrida's gift! Aoi!'

Torfrida had often heard that wild battle-cry of Aoi! of which the early minstrels were so fond—with which the great poet who wrote the Song of Roland ends every paragraph, which has now fallen (displaced by our modern Hurrah) to be merely a sailor's call or hunter's cry. But she shuddered as she heard it close to her ears, and saw, from the flashing eye and dilated nostril, the temper of the man on whom she had thrown herself so utterly. She laid her hand upon his lip.

'Silence! silence for pity's sake. Remember that you are in a maiden's house, and think of her good fame.'

Hereward collected himself instantly, and then, holding her at arm's length, gazed upon her. 'I was mad a moment. But is it not enough to make me mad to look at you?'

'Do not look at me so, I cannot bear it,' said she, hanging down her head. 'You forget that I am a poor weak girl.'

'Ah! we are rough wooers, we sea-rovers. We cannot pay glowing French compliments like your knights here, who fawn on a damsel with soft words in the hall, and will kiss the dust off their queen's feet, and die for a hair of their goddess's eyebrow, and then if they find her alone in the forest, show themselves as very ruffians as if they were Paynim Moors. We are rough, lady, we English, but those who trust us find us true.'

'And I can trust you?' she asked, still trembling.

'On God's cross there round your neck,' and he took her crucifix and kissed it. 'You only I love, you only I will love, and you will I love in all honesty, before the angels of heaven, till we be wedded man and wife. Who but a fool would soil the flower which he means to wear before all the world!'

'I knew Hereward was noble! I knew I had not trusted him in vain!'

'I kept faith and honour with the princess of Cornwall, when I had her at my will, and shall I not keep faith and honour with you?'

'The princess of Cornwall?' asked Torfrida.

'Do not be jealous, fair queen. I brought her safe to her betrothed, and wedded she is, long ago. I will tell you that story some day. And now—I must go.'

'Not yet! not yet! I have something to—show you.'

She motioned him to go up the narrow stairs, or rather ladder, which led to the upper floor, and then led him into her chamber.

A lady's chamber was then, in days when privacy was little cared for, her usual reception-room, and the bed, which stood in an alcove, served as a common seat for her and her guests. But Torfrida did not ask him to sit down. She led the way onward towards a door beyond.

Hereward followed, glancing with awe at the books, parchments, and strange instruments which lay on the table and the floor.

The old Lapp nurse sat in the window, sewing busily. She looked up, and smiled meaningly. But as she saw Torfrida unlock the farther door with one of the keys which hung at her girdle, she croaked out:

'Too fast! Too fast! Trust lightly, and repent heavily.'

'Trust at once, or trust never,' said Torfrida, as she opened the door.

Hereward saw within rich dresses hung on perches round the wall, and chests barred and padlocked.

'These are treasures,' said she, 'which many a knight and nobleman has coveted. By cunning, by flattery, by threats of force even, have they tried to win what lies here—and Torfrida herself, too, for the sake of her wealth. But thanks to the abbot, my uncle, Torfrida is still her own mistress, and mistress of the wealth which her forefathers won by sea and land far away in the East. All here is mine—and if you be but true to me, all mine is yours. Lift the lid for me, it is too heavy for my arms.'

Hereward did so, and saw within golden cups and bracelets, horns of ivory and silver, bags of coin, and among them a mail shirt and helmet, on which he fixed at once silent and greedy eyes.

She looked at his face askance, and smiled. 'Yes, these are more to Hereward's taste than gold and jewels. And he shall have them. He shall have them as a proof that if Torfrida has set her love upon a worthy knight, she is at least worthy of him, and does not demand without being able to give in return.'

And she took out the armour and held it up to him.

'This is the work of dwarfs or enchanters! This was not forged by mortal man! It must have come out of some old cavern, or dragon's hoard!' said Hereward, in astonishment at the extreme delicacy and slightness of the mail-rings, and the richness of the gold and silver with which both hauberk and helm were inlaid.

'Enchanted it is, they say, but its maker, who can tell? My ancestor won it, and by the side of Charles Martel. Listen, and I will tell you how.

'You have heard of fair Provence, where I spent my youth, the land of the sunny south, the land of the fig and the olive, the mulberry and the rose, the tulip and the anemone, and all rich fruits and fair flowers,—the land where every city is piled with temples, and theatres, and towers as high as heaven, which the old Romans built with their enchantments, and tormented the blessed martyrs therein.'

'Sun in heaven! How beautiful you are!' cried Hereward, as her voice shaped itself into a song, and her eyes flashed, at the remembrance of her southern home.

Torfrida was not altogether angry at finding that he was thinking of her, and not of her words.

'Peace, and listen. You know how the Paynim held that land—the Saracens, to whom Mahound taught all the wisdom of Solomon—as they teach us in turn,' she added in a lower voice.

'And how Charles and his Paladins' [Charles Martel and Charlemagne were perpetually confounded in the legends of the time] 'drove them out, and conquered the country again for God and His Mother.'

'I have heard——' but he did not take his eyes off her face.

'They were in the amphitheatre at Arles, the Saracens, where the blessed martyr St. Trophimus had died in torments, they had set up their idol of Mahound, and turned the place into a fortress. Charles burned it over their heads: you see—I have seen—the blackened walls, the bloodstained marbles, to this day. Then they fled into the plain, and there they turned and fought. Under Montmajour, by the hermit's cell, they fought a summer's day, till they were all slain.' There was an Emir among them, black as a raven, clad in magic armour. All lances turned from it, all swords shivered on it. He rode through the press without a wound, while every stroke of his scimitar shore off a head of horse or man. Charles himself rode at him, and smote him with his hammer. They heard the blow in Avignon, full thirty miles away. The flame flashed out from the magic armour a fathom's length, blinding all around, and when they recovered their sight, the enchanter was far away in the battle, killing as he went.

'Then Charles cried, "Who will stop that devil, whom no steel can wound? Help us, O blessed martyr St. Trophimus, and save the soldiers of the cross from shame!"'

'Then cried Torfrid my forefather—"What use in crying to St. Trophimus? He could not help himself when the Paynim burnt him and how can he help us? A tough arm is worth a score of martyrs here."

'And he rode at that Emir, and gript him in his arms. They both fell, and rolled together on the ground—but Torfrid never loosed his hold till he had crushed out his unbaptized soul, and sent it to join Mahound in hell.

'Then he took his armour, and brought it home in triumph. But after a while he fell sick of a fever, and the blessed St. Trophimus appeared to him, and told him that it was a punishment for his blasphemy in the battle. So he repented, and vowed to serve the saint all his life. On which he was healed instantly, and fell to religion, and went back to Montmajour, and there he was a hermit in the cave under the rock, and tended the graves hewn in the living stone, where his old comrades, the Paladins who were slain, sleep side by side round the Church of the Holy Cross. But the armour he left here, and he laid a curse upon it, that whosoever of his descendants should lose that armour in fight, should die childless, without a son to wield a sword. And therefore it is that none of my ancestors, valiant as they have been, have dared to put this harness on their backs.'

And so ended a story, which Torfrida believed utterly, and Hereward likewise.

'And now, Hereward mine, dare you wear that magic armour, and face old Torfrid's curse?'

'What dare I not?'

'Think. If you lose it, in your race must end.'

'Let it end. I accept the curse.'

And he put the armour on.

But he trembled as he did it. Atheism and superstition go too often hand-in-hand; and 'primitive Christians'—indicate a religio loci, which must have been the cause, not the consequence, of the church. Probably an older building had existed on the site. And certainly if the monks of Montmajour had invented both legend and place, they would have rather chosen for the latter St. Trophimus's cave in the hill above, which is surely, deducting the Romanesque additions, one of the earliest of Christian monuments. Moreover, the very name Montmajour, the 'Mayor's Mount,' points to Charles Martel as the hero of the isolated hill forming so strong a military position in the wide plain.

godless as he was, sceptical of Providence itself, and much more of the help of saint or angel, still the curse of the old warrior, like the malice of a witch or a demon, was to him a thing possible, probable, and formidable.

Torfrida looked at him in pride and exultation.

'It is yours—the invulnerable harness! Wear it in the forefront of the battle! And if weapon wound you through it, may I, as punishment for my lie, suffer the same upon my tender body—a wound for every wound of yours, my knight!'¹

And after that they sat side by side, and talked of love with all honour and honesty, never heeding the old hag, who crooned to herself in her barbarian tongue—

Quick thaw, long frost,
Quick joy, long pain,
Moon found, soon lost,
You will take your gift again.

CHAPTER XI

HOW THE HOLLANDERS TOOK HERWARD FOR A MAGICIAN

OF this weary Holland war which dragged itself on, campaign after campaign, for several years, what need to tell? There was, doubtless, the due amount of murder, plunder, burning, and worse and the final event was certain from the beginning. It was a struggle between civilised and disciplined men, armed to the teeth, and well furnished with ships and military engines, against poor simple folk in 'coat' stiffened with tar and rosin, or in very short jackets of ludo' (says the chronicle), 'who fought by threes, two with a hooked lance and three darts each, and between them a man with a sword or an axe, who held his shield before those two—a very great multitude, but in composition utterly undisciplined,' who came down to the sea-coast, with carts and waggons, to carry off the spoils of the Flemings, and bade them all surrender at discretion, and go home again after giving up Count Robert and Hereward, with the 'tribunes of the brigades,' to be put to death—as valiant South Sea islanders might have done—and then found themselves as sheep to the slaughter before the cunning Hereward, whom they esteemed a magician on account of his craft and his invulnerable armour.

So at least says Richard of Ely, who tells long confused stories of battles and campaigns, some of them without due regard to chronology, for it is certain that the brave Zealanders could not on Robert's first landing have 'feared lest they should be conquered by foreigners, as they had heard the English were by the French,' inasmuch as that event had not then happened.

And this much of the war among the meres of Scheldt.

HOW HERWARD TURNED BERSERKER

TORFRIDA'S heart misgave her that first night as to the effects of her exceeding frankness. Her pride in the first place was somewhat wounded, she had dreamed of a knight who would worship her as his queen, hang on her smile, die at her frown, and she had meant to bring Hereward to her feet as such a slave, in boundless gratitude, but had he not rather held his own, and brought her to his feet, by assuming her devotion as his right? And if he assumed that, how far could she trust him not to abuse his claim? Was he quite as perfect, seen close, as seen afar off? And now that the intoxication of that meeting had passed off she began to remember more than one little fault which she would have gladly seen mended—Certain roughnesses of manner which contrasted unfavourably with the polish (morely external though it was) of the Flemish and Norman knights, a boastful self-sufficiency, too, which bordered on the ludicrous at times even in her partial eyes, which would be a matter of open laughter to the knights of the court. Besides, if they laughed at him they would laugh at her for choosing him. And then wounded vanity came in to help wounded pride, and she sat over the cold embers till almost dawn of day, her head between her hands, musing sadly, and half wishing that the irrevocable yesterday had never come.

But when, after a few months, Hereward returned from his first campaign in Holland, covered with glory and renown, all smiles, and beauty, and health, and good-humour, and gratitude for the magic armour which had preserved him unhurt, then Torfrida forgot all her fears, and thought herself the happiest maid alive for four and twenty hours at least.

And then came back, and after that again and again, the old fears. Gradually she found out that the sneers which she had heard at English barbarians were not altogether without ground.

Not only had her lover's life been passed among half-brutal and wild adventurers, but, like the rest of his nation, he had never felt the influence of that classic civilisation without which good manners seem, even to this day, almost beyond the reach of the Western races. Those among whom she had been brought up, whether soldiers or clerks, were probably no nobler or purer at heart—she would gladly have believed them far less so—than Hereward; but the inmost varnish of Roman culture had given a charm to their manners, a wideness of range to their thoughts, which Hereward had not.

Especially when he had taken too much to drink—which he did, after the Danish fashion, far oftener than the rest of Robert's men—he grew rude, boastful, quarrelsome. He would obant his own doughty deeds; and gab (as the Norman word was) in painful earnest, while they gabbed only in sport, and outvied each other in impossible fanfarronades, simply to laugh down a fashion which was held inconsistent with the modesty of a true knight. Bitter it was to her to hear him announce to the company, not for the first or second time, how he had slain the Cornish giant, whose height increased by a foot at least every time he was mentioned, and then to hear him answered by some smart, smooth-shaven youth, who, with as much mimicry of his manner as he dared to assume, boasted of having slain in Araby a giant with two heads, and taken out of his two mouths the two halves of the princess whom he was devouring, which being joined together afterwards by the prayers of a holy hermit, were delivered back safe and sound to her father the King of Antioch. And more bitter still was it to hear Hereward angrily dispute the story, unaware (it least at first) that he was being laughed at.

Then she grew sometimes cold, sometimes contemptuous, sometimes altogether fierce, and shed bitter tears in secret, when she was complimented on the modesty of her young savage.

But Torfrida was a brave maiden and what was more, she loved him with all her heart. Else why endure bitter words for his sake? And she set herself to teach and train the wild outlaw into her ideal of a very perfect knight.

She talked to him of modesty and humility, the root of all virtues, of chivalry and self-sacrifice, of respect to the weak, and mercy to the fallen, of devotion to God, and awe of His commandments. She set before him the example of ancient heroes and philosophers, of saints and martyrs, and as much awed him by her learning as by the new world of higher and purer morality which was opened for the first time to the wandering Viking.

He, for his part, drank it all in. Taught by a woman who loved him, he could listen to humiliating truths, which he would have sneered at, had they come from the lips of a hermit or a priest. Often he rebelled, often he broke loose, and made her angry, and himself whined, but the spell was on him—a far surer, as well as purer spell than any love-potion of which foolish Torfrida had ever dreamed—the only spell which can really civilise man—that of woman's tact and woman's purity.

Nevertheless there were relapses, as was natural. The wine at Robert the Frison's table was often too good, and then Hereward's tongue was loosed, and Torfrida justly indignant. And one evening there came a very serious relapse out of which arose a strange adventure.

It befell that the great marquis sent for his son to Bruges, ere he set out for another campaign in Holland, and made him a great feast, to which he invited Torfrida and her mother. For Adela of France, the queen countess, had heard so much of Torfrida's beauty, that she must needs have her as one of her bower-maidens, and her mother, who was an old friend of Adela's, of course was highly honoured by such a promotion for her daughter.

So they went to Bruges, and Hereward and his men went with them, and they feasted, and harped, and sang, and the saying was fulfilled—

'Tis merry in the hall
When beards wag all.'

But the only beard which wagged in that hall was Hereward's, for the Flemings, like the Normans, prided themselves on their civilised and smooth-shaven chins, and laughed (behind his back) at Hereward, who prided himself on keeping his beautiful English beard, with locks of gold which, like his long golden hair, were combed and curled daily, after the fashion of the Anglo Danes.

After a while Hereward's beard began to wag somewhat too fast, as he sat by Torfrida's side. For some knight near began to tell of a wonderful mare called Swallow, which was to be found in one of the islands of the Scheldt, and was famous through all the country round, and unsaddled, moreover, that Hereward might as well have brought that mare home with him as a trophy.

To which Hereward answered, in his boasting vein, that he would bring home that mare, or aught else that he had a liking to.

'You will find it not so easy. Her owner, they say, is a mighty strong churl of a horse-breeder, Dirk Hammerhand by name, and as for cutting his throat, that you must not do, for he has been loyal to Countess Gertrude, and sent her horses whenever she needed.'

'One may pick a fair quarrel with him nevertheless.'

'Then you must bide such a buffet as you never abode before. They say his arm has seven men's strength, and whosoever visits him, he challenges to give and take a blow, but no man that has taken a blow as yet, has ever needed another.'

'Hereward will have need of his magic head-piece, if he tries that adventure,' quoth another.

'Ay,' retorted the first speaker, 'but the helmet may stand the rap well enough, and yet the brains inside be the worse.'

'Not a doubt. I knew a man once, who was so strong that he would shake a nut till the kernel went to powder, and yet never break the shell.'

'That is a lie!' quoth Hereward. And so it was, and told purposely to make him expose himself.

Whereon high words followed, which Torfrida tried in vain to stop. Hereward was flushed with ire and scorn.

'Magic armour, forsooth?' cried he at last. 'What care I for armour or for magic? I will wager to you—'my armour,' he was on the point of saying, but he checked himself in time—'any horse in my stable, that I go in my shirt to Scaldmarland, and bring back that mare single-handed.'

'Hark to the Englishman! He has turned x

Berserker at last, like his forefathers. You will surely start in a pair of hose as well, or the ladies will be shamed!

And so forth, till Torfrida was purple with shame, and wished herself fathoms deep, and Ailela of France called sternly from the head of the table to ask what the wrangling meant.

'It is only the English Berserker, the Lady Torfrida's champion,' said some one in his most courteous tone, 'who is not yet as well acquainted with the customs of knighthood as that fair Lady hopes to make him hereafter.'

'Torfrida's champion?' asked Ailela, in a tone of surprise, if not scorn.

'If any knight quarrels with my Hereward, he quarrels with Robert himself!' thundered Count Robert. 'Silence!'

And so the matter was hushed up.

The banquet ended, and they walked out into the garden to cool their heads, and play at games, and dance.

Torfrida avoided Hereward, but he, with the foolish pertinacity of a man who knows he has had too much wine, and yet pretends to himself that he has not, would follow her, and speak to her.

She turned away more than once. At last she was forced to speak to him.

'So! You have made me a laughing-stock to these knights. You have scorned at my gifts. You have said—and before these men, too—that you need neither helm nor hauberk. Give me them back, then, Berserker as you are, and go sleep off your wine.'

'That will I,' laughed Hereward boisterously.

'You are tipsy,' said she, 'and do not know what you say.'

'You are angry, and do not know what you say. Harken, proud lass. I will take care of one thing, and that is, that you shall speak the truth.'

'Did I not say that you were tipsy?'

'Pish! You say that I was a Berserker. And truth you shall speak, for to-morrow to the war, and hark I will thither, or die.'

'That will be very fit for you.'

And the two turned brightly from each other.

Ere Torfrida went to bed that night, there was a violent knocking. Angry as she was, she was yet anxious enough to hurry out of her chamber, and open the door herself.

Martin Lightfoot stood there with a large leather mail, which he hung at her feet somewhat unceremoniously.

'There is some gear of yours,' said he, as it clanged and rattled on the floor.

'What do you mean, man?'

'Only that my master bid me say that he cares as little for his own life as you do.' And he turned away.

She caught him by the arm—

'What is the meaning of this? What is in this mail?'

'You should know best. If young folks cannot be content when they are well off, they will go farther and far worse,' says Martin Lightfoot. And he slipped from her grasp and fled into the night.

She took the mail to her room and opened it. It contained the magic armour.

All her anger was melted away. She cried, she blamed herself. He would be killed, his blood would be on her head. She would have carried it back to him with her own hands, she would have entreated him on her knees to take it back. But how face the courtiers? and how find him? Very probably, too, he was by that time hopelessly drunk. And at that thought she drew herself into herself, tried to harden her heart again, and went to bed, but not to sleep. Bitterly she cried as she thought over the old hag's croon—

'Quick joy, long pain,
You will take your gift again.'

It might have been five o'clock the next morning when the claron rang down the street. She sprang up and dressed herself quickly, but never more carefully or truly. She heard the tramp of horse-hoofs. He was moving a-field early, indeed. Should she go to the window to bid him farewell? Should she hide herself in just anger?

She looked out steadily through the blind of the little window in the gable. There rode down the street Robert le Frison in full armour, and behind him, knight after knight, a wall of shining steel. But by his side rode one bare-headed, his long yellow curls floating over his shoulders. His boots had golden spurs, a gilt belt held up his sword, but his only dress was a silk shirt and silk hose. He laughed and sang, and made his horse carrol, and tossed his lance in the air, and caught it by the point, like Taillefer at Hastings, as he passed under the window.

She threw open the blind, careless of all appearances. She would have called to him, but the words choked her, and what should she say?

He looked up boldly, and smiled.

'Farewell, fair lady mine. Drunk I was last night, but not so drunk as to forget a promise.'

And he rode on, while Torfrida rushed away and broke into wild weeping.

CHAPTER XIII

HOW HEREWARD WON MARE SWALLOW

ON a bench at the door of his highroofed wooden house sat Dirk Hammerhand, the richest man in Walcheren. From within the house sounded the pleasant noise of slave-women, grinding and chattering at the handquern, from without, the pleasant noise of geese and swans without number. And as he sat and drank his ale, and watched the herd of horses in the fen, he thought himself a happy man, and thanked his Odin and Thor that, owing to his princely supplies of horses to Countess Gertrude, Robert the Frisian and his Christian Franks had not yet harried him to the bare walls, as they would probably do ere all was over.

As he looked at the horses, some half mile off, he saw a strange stir among them. They began whinnying and pawing round a four-footed thing in the midst, which might be a bulger, or a wolf—though both were very uncommon in that pleasant isle of Walcheren, but which plainly had no business there. Whereon he took up a mighty staff, and strode over the fen to see.

He found neither wolf nor bulger, but to his exceeding surprise a long lean man, clothed in ragged horse skins, whinnying and neighing exactly like a horse, and then stooping to eat grass like one. He advanced to do the first thing that came into his head, namely, to break the man's back with his staff, and ask him afterwards who he might be. But ere he could strike, the man or horse kicked up with its hind legs in his face, and then springing on to the said hind legs ran away with extraordinary swiftness some fifty yards, after which it went down on all fours and began grazing again.

'Beest thou man or Neval?' cried Dirk, somewhat frightened.

The thing looked up. The face at least was human.

'Art thou a Christian man?' asked it in bad Frisian, intermixed with suorts and neighs.

'What's that to thee?' growled Dirk, and began to wish a little that he was one, having heard that the sign of the cross was of great virtue in driving away devils.

'Thou art not Christian. Thou believest in Thor and Odin? Then there is hope.'

'Hope of what?' Dirk was growing more and more frightened.

'Of her, my sister! Ah, my sister, can it be that I shall find thee at last, after ten thousand miles, and seven years of woful wandering?'

'I have no man's sister here. At least, my wife's brother was killed—'

'I speak not of a sister in woman's shape. Mine, alas!—O woful prince, O more woful princess—eats the herb of the field somewhere in the shape of a mare, as ugly as she was once beautiful, but swifter than the swallow on the wing.'

'I've none such here,' quoth Dirk, thoroughly frightened, and glancing uneasily at mare Swallow.

'You have not? Alas, wretched me! It was prophesied to me by the witch that I should find her in the field of one who worshipped the old gods, for had she come across a holy priest, she had been a woman again, long ago. Whether must I wander abroad!' And the thing began weeping bitterly, and then ate more grass.

'I—that is—thou poor miserable creature,' said Dirk, half pitying, half wishing to turn the subject, 'leave off making a beast of thyself awhile, and tell me who thou art.'

'I have made no beast of myself, most noble earl of the Frisians, for so you doubtless are. I was made a beast of—a horse of, by an enchantment of a certain land, and my sister a mare.'

'Thou dost not say so!' quoth Dirk, who considered such an event quite possible.

'I was a prince of the county of Althorona, which lies between Cathay and the Mountains of the Moon, as far once as I am laid now, and only less far than my lost sister, and by the enchantments of a cruel magician we became what we are.'

'But thou art not a horse, at all events?'

'Am I not? Thou knowest, then, more of me than I do of myself,' and it ate more grass. 'But hear the rest of my story. My hapless sister was sold away with me to a merchant, but I, breaking loose from him, fled until I lathered in a magic fountain. At once I recovered my man's shape, and was rejoicing therein, when out of the fountain rose a lady more beautiful than an elf, and smiled upon me with love.'

'She asked me my story, and I told it. And when it was told—"Wretch!" she cried, "and coward, who hast deserted thy sister in her need. I would have loved thee, and made thee immortal as myself, but now thou shalt wander ugly and eating grass, clothed in the horse hide which has just dropped from thy limbs, till thou shalt find thy sister, and bring her to bathe, like thee, in this magic well."

'All good spirits help us! And you are really a jamp?'

'As surely,' and the thing with a voice of sudden rapture, 'as that mare is my sister,' and he rushed at mare Swallow. 'I see, I see, my mother's eyes, my father's nose.'

'He must have been a chuckle-headed knave that, then,' grinned Dirk to himself. 'The mare's nose is as big as a buck-basket. But how can she be a princess, man—prince, I mean, she has a foal running by her side.'

'A foal?' said the thing solemnly. 'I, me behold it! Alas, alas, my sister! The tyrant's threat has come true, that thou shouldst be his bride whether thou wouldst or not. I see I see in the features of thy son his hated humiments.'

'Why he must be as like a horse, then, as your father. But this will not do, Master Horse-man, I know that foal's pedigree better than I do my own.'

'Man, man, simple though honest!—Hast thou never heard of the skill of the enchanters of the East? How they transform their victims at night back again into human shape, and by day into the shape of beasts again?'

'Yes—well—I know that—'

'And do you not see how you are deluded? Every night, doubt not, that mare and foal take their human shape again, and every night, perhaps, that foal enchanter visits in your pen, perhaps in your very stable, his wretched bride restored (alas, only for an hour!) into her human shape.

'An enchanter in my stable! That is an ugly guest. But no, I've been into the stables fifty times, to see if that mare was safe. Mare was mare, and colt was colt, Mr. Prince, if I have eyes to see.'

'And what are eyes against enchantments? The moment you opened the door the spell was cast over them again. You ought to thank your stars that no worse has happened yet, that the enchanter, in fleeing, has not wrung your neck as he went out, or cast a spell on you, which will fire your barns, lame your geese, give your fowls the pnp, your horses the glanders, your cattle the murrain, your children St. Vitus's dance, your wife the creeping palsy, and yourself the chalkstones in all your fingers.'

'All saints have mercy on me! If the half of this be true, I will turn Christian. I will send for a priest, and be baptized to-morrow.'

'O my sister, my sister! Dost thou not know me! Dost thou answer my caresses with kicks? Or is thy heart, as well as thy body, so enchained by that cruel necromancer, that thou preferrest to be his, and scornest thine own salvation, leaving me to eat grass till I die!'

'I say, prince—I say—what would you have a man to do? I bought the mare honestly, and I have kept her well. She can't say aught against me on that score. And whether she be princess or not, I'm loth to part with her.'

'Keep her then, and keep with her the curse of all the saints and angels. Look down, ye holy saints' (and the thing poured out a long string of saints' names) 'and avenge this catholic princess, kept in vile durance by an unbaptized heathen! May his—'

'Don't, don't!', roared Dirk. 'And don't look at me like that' (for he feared the evil eye), 'or I'll brain you with my staff!'

'Fool! If I have lost a horse's figure I have not lost his swiftness. Ere thou couldst strike, I should have run a mile and back, to curse thee afresh.' And the thing ran round him, and fell on all fours again, and ate grass.

'Mercy, mercy! And that is more than I over asked yet of man. But it is hard,' growled he, 'that a man should lose his money, because a rogue sells him a princess in disguise.'

'Then sell her again, sell her, as thou valuest thy life, to the first Christian man thou meetest. And yet no. What matters! Ere a month be over, the seven years' enchantment will have passed, and she will return to her own shape, with her son, and vanish from thy farm, leaving thee to vain repentance, whereby thou wilt both lose thy money and get her curse. Farewell, and my malice abide with thee!'

And the thing, without another word, ran right away, neighing as it went, leaving Dirk in a state of abject terror.

He went home. He cursed the mare, he cursed the man who sold her, he cursed the day he saw her, he cursed the day he was born. He told his story with exaggerations and confusions in plenty to all in the house, and terror fell on them likewise. No one, that evening, dared go down into the fen to drive the horses up, while Dirk got very drunk, went to bed, and troubled there all night (as did the rest of the household), expecting the enchanter to enter on a flaming fire-diako at every howl of the wind.

The next morning, as Dirk was going about his business with a doleful face, casting stealthy glances at the fen, to see if the mysterious mare was still there, and a chance of his money still left, a man rode up to the door.

He was poorly clothed, with a long rusty sword by his side. A broad felt hat, long boots, and a haversack behind his saddle, showed him to be a traveller, seemingly a horse dealer, for there followed him, tied head and tail, a brace of sorry nags.

'Heaven save all here,' quoth he, making the sign of the cross. 'Can any good Christian give me a drink of milk?'

'Alo, if thou wilt,' said Dirk. 'But what art thou, and whence?'

On any other day he would have tried to coax his guest into trying a buffet with him for his horse and clothes. But this morning his heart was heavy with the thought of the enchanted mare, and he welcomed the chance of selling her to the stranger.

'We are not very fond of strangers about here, since these Flemings have been harrying our borders. If thou art a spy, it will be worse for thee.'

'I am neither spy nor Fleming, but a poor servant of the Lord Bishop of Utrecht's buying a garron or two for his lordship's priests. As for these Flemings, may St. John Baptist save from them both me and you. Do you know of any man who has horses to sell herabouts?'

'There are horses in the fen yonder,' quoth Dirk, who knew that churchmen were likely to give a liberal price, and pay in good silver.

'I saw them as I rode up. And a fine lot they are. But of too good a stamp for my short juries, or for my holy master's riding—a fat priest likes a quiet nag, my master.

'Humph. Well, if quietness is what you need, there is a mare down there, that a child might ride with a thread of wool. But as for price—And she has a colt, too, running by her.'

'Ah!' quoth the horseman. 'Well, your Walcheren folk make good milk, that's certain. A colt by her? That's awkward. My lord does not like young horses' and it would be troublesome, too, to take the thing along with me.'

The less anxious the dealer seemed to buy the more anxious grew Dirk to sell, but he concealed his anxiety, and let the stranger turn away thanking him for his drink.

'I say!' he called after him. 'You might look at her, as you ride past the herd.'

The stranger assented; and they went down into the fen, and looked over the precious mare, whose feats were afterwards sung by many an English fireside, or in the forest beneath the hollins green, by such as Robin Hood and his merry men. The ugliest as well as the swiftest of mares she was, say the old chroniclers, and it was not till the stranger had looked twice at her, that he forgot her great chuckle-head, greyhound flanks, and drooping hindquarters, and began to see the great length of those same quarters, the thighs let down into the hooks, the compact loins, the extraordinary girth through the saddle, the sloping shoulder, the long arms, the flat knees, the large well-set hoofs, and all the other points which showed her strength and speed, and justified her fame.

'She might carry a big man like you through the mud,' said he carelessly, 'but as for pace, one cannot expect that with such a chuckle-head. And if one rode her through a town, the boys would call after one, "All head and no tail." Why, I can't see her tail for her croup, it is so ill set on.'

'I'll set on, or none,' said Dirk testily, 'don't go to speak against her pace till you have seen it. Here, lass!'

Dirk was in his heart rather afraid of the princess, but he was comforted when she came up to him like a dog.

'She's as sensible as a woman,' said he, and then grumbled to himself, 'may be she knows I mean to part with her.'

'Lend me your saddle,' said he to the stranger.

The stranger did so, and Dirk, mounting, galloped her in a ring. There was no doubt of her powers as soon as she began to move.

'I hope you won't remember this against me, madam,' said Dirk, as soon as he got out of the stranger's hearing. 'I can't do less than sell you to a Christian. And certainly I have been as good a master to you as if I'd known who you were, but if you wish to stay with me, you've only to kick me off, and say so, and I'm yours to command.'

'Well, she can gallop a bit,' said the stranger, as Dirk pulled her up and dismounted, 'but, an ugly brute she is, nevertheless, and such an omelette as I should not care to ride, for I am a gay man among the ladies. However, what is your price?'

Dirk named twice as much as he would have taken.

'Half that, you mean.' And the usual haggle began.

'Tell thee what,' said Dirk at last. 'I am a man who has his fancies, and this shall be her price—half thy bid, and a box on the ear.'

The demon of covetousness had entered Dirk's heart. What if he got the money, branded, or at least disabled the stranger, and so had a chance of selling the mare a second time to some fresh comer?

'Thou art a strange fellow,' quoth the horse-dealer. 'But so be it.'

Dirk chuckled. 'He does not know,' thought he, 'that he has to do with Dirk Hammerhand,' and he clenched his fist in anticipation of his rough joke.

'There,' quoth the stranger, counting out the money carefully, 'is thy coin. And there—is thy box on the ear.'

And with a blow which rattled over the fen, he felled Dirk Hammerhand to the ground.

He lay senseless for a moment, and then looked wildly round.

'Villain!' groaned he. 'It was I who was to give the buffet, not thou!'

'Art mad?' asked the stranger, as he coolly picked up the coins, which Dirk had scattered in his fall. It is the seller's business to take, and the buyer's to give.'

And while Dirk roared in vain for help he leapt on Swallow, and rode off shouting—

'Aha! Dirk Hammerhand! So you thought to knock a hole in my skull, as you have done to many a better man than yourself! He must be a luckier man than you who catches The Wake asleep. I shall give your love to the enchanted prince, my faithful serving-man, whom they call Martin Lightfoot.'

Dirk cursed the day he was born. Instead of the mare and colt he had got the two wretched garçons which the stranger had left, and a face, which made him so tender of his own teeth, that he never again offered to try a buffet with a stranger.

CHAPTER XIV

HOW HEReward RODE INTO BRUGES LIKE A BEGGARMAN

THE spring and summer had passed, and the autumn was almost over, when great news came to the court of Bruges, where Torfrida was now a bower maiden.

The Zealanders had been beaten till they submitted, at least for the present. There was peace, at least for the present, through all the isles of Scheldt, and more than all, the lovely Countess Gertrude had resolved to reward her champion by giving him her hand, and the guardianship of her lands and her infant son.

And Hereward?

From him, or of him, there was no word. That he was alive and fighting was all the messenger could say.

Then Robert came back to Bruges, with a gallant retinue, leading home his bride. And there met him his father and mother, and his brother of Mons, and Richilda the beautiful and terrible sorceress—who had not yet stained her soul with those crimes which she expiated by fearful penances in after years, when young Arnoul, the son for whom she had sold her soul, lay dead upon the battlefield which was to have made him a mighty prince. And Torfrida went out with the nobles to meet Count Robert, and looked for Hereward, till her eyes were ready to fall out of her head. But Hereward was not with them.

'He must be left behind, commanding the army,' thought she. 'But he might have sent one word!'

There was a great feast that day, of course, and Torfrida sat thereat but she could not eat. Nevertheless she was too proud to let the knights know what was in her heart, so she chatted and laughed as gaily as the rest, watching always for any word of Hereward. But none mentioned his name.

The feast was long, the ladies did not rise till high bedtime, and then the men drank on.

They went up to the queen-countess's chamber, where a solemn undressing of that royal lady usually took place.

The etiquette was this. The queen-countess sat in her chair of state in the midst, till her shoes were taken off, and her hair dressed for the night. Right and left of her, according to their degrees, sat the other great ladies, and behind each of them, where they could find places, the maidens.

It was Torfrida's turn to take off the royal shoes, and she advanced into the middle of the semicircle, slippers in hand.

'Stop there!' said the countess-queen.

Whereat Torfrida stopped, very much frightened.

'Countesses and ladies,' said the mistress, 'there are in Provence and the South, what I wish there were here in Flanders—courts of love, at which all offenders against the sacred laws of Venus and Cupid are tried by an assembly of their peers, and punished according to their deserts.'

Torfrida turned scarlet.

'I know not why we, countesses and ladies, should have less knowledge of the laws of love than those gayer dames of the South, whose blood runs—to judge by her dark hair—in the veins of yon fair maid.'

There was a silence. Torfrida was the most beautiful woman in the room, more beautiful than even Richilda the terrible, and therefore there were few but were glad to see her—as it seemed—in trouble.

Torfrida's mother began whimpering, and praying to six or seven saints at once. But nobody marked her—possibly not even the saints, being preoccupied with Torfrida.

'I hear, fair maid—for that you are that I will do you the justice to confess—that you are old enough to be married this four years since.'

Torfrida stood like a stone, frightened out of her wits, plentiful as they were.

'Why are you not married?'

There was, of course, no answer.

'I hear that knights have fought for you, lost their lives for you.'

'I did not bid them,' gasped Torfrida, longing that the floor would open and swallow up the queen-countess and all her kin and followers, as it did for the enemies of the blessed Saint Dunstan while he was arguing with them in an upper room at Calne.

And that the knight of St. Valeri, to whom you gave your favour, now lies languishing of wounds got in your cause.'

'I—I did not bid him fight,' gasped Torfrida, wishing that the floor would open and swallow up herself.

'And that he who overthrew the knight of St. Valeri—to whom you gave that favour, and more—'

'I gave him nothing a maiden might not give,' cried Torfrida so fiercely that the queen-countess recoiled somewhat.

'I never said that you did, girl. Your love you gave him. Can you deny that?'

Torfrida laughed bitterly. Her Southern blood was rising.

'I put my love out to nurse, instead of wearing it, as many a maiden has done before me, and thought no harm. When my love cried for hunger and cold, I took it back again to my own bosom, and whether it has lived or died there is no one's matter but my own.'

'Hunger and cold? I hear that him to whom you gave your love, you drove out to the cold, bidding him go fight in his bare shirt if he wished to win your love.'

'I did not. He angered me—He —' and Torfrida found herself in the act of accusing Hereward.

She stopped instantly.

'What more, your highness? If this be true, what more may not be true of such an one as I? I submit myself to your royal grace.'

'She has confessed. What punishment, ladies, does she deserve? Or, rather, what punishment would her cousins of Provence inflict, did we send her southward, to be judged by their courts of love?'

One lady said one thing, one another. Some spoke cruelly, some worse than cruelly, for they were coarse ages, the ages of faith, and ladies said things then in open company which gentle men would be ashamed to say in private now.

'Marry her to a fool,' said Richilda at last, bitterly.

'That is too common a misfortune,' answered the lady of France. 'If we did no more to her, she might grow as proud as her betters.'

Adela knew that her daughter-in-law considered her husband a fool, and was somewhat of the same opinion, though she hated Richilda.

'No,' said she, 'we will do more. We will marry her to the first man who enters the castle.'

Torfrida looked at her mistress to see if she were mad. But the countess-queen was serene and sane. Then Torfrida's Southern heat and northern courage burst forth.

'You? marry? me? to? —' said she slowly, with eyes so fierce and lips so livid that Adela herself quailed.

There was a noise of shouting and laughing in the court below, which made all turn and listen.

The next moment a serving-man came in, puzzled, and inclined to laugh.

'May it please your highness, here is the strangest adventure. There is ridden into the castle-yard a beggarman with scarce a shirt to his back, on a great ugly mare with a foal running by her, and a fool behind him carrying lance and shield. And he says that he is come to fight any knight of the court, ragged as he stands, for the fairest lady in the court, be she who she may, if she have not a wedded husband already.

'And what says my lord margrave?'

'That it is a fair challenge and a good adventure, and that fight he shall, if any man will answer his defiance.'

'And I say, tell my lord margrave that fight he shall not, for he shall have the fairest maiden in this court for the trouble of carrying her away, and that I, Adela of France, will give her to him. So let that beggar dismount, and be brought up hither to me.'

There was silence again. Torfrida looked round her once more to see whether or not she was dreaming, and whether there was one human being to whom she could appeal. Her mother sat praying and weeping in a corner. Torfrida looked at her with one glance of scorn, which she confessed and repented, with bitter tears, many a year after, in a foreign land, and then turned to bay with the spirit of her old Philadri ancestor, who choked the Emir at Montmajour.

Mated to a beggar! It was a strange accident, and an ugly one, and a great cruelty and wrong. But it was not impossible, hardly improbable, in days when the caprice of the strong created accidents, and when cruelty and wrong went for nothing, even with very kindly honest folk. So Torfrida faced the danger, as she would have faced that of a kicking horse or a flooded ford, and, like the nut-brown bride,

'She pulled out a little penknife,
That was both keen and sharp, and considered that the beggarman could wear no armour, and that she wore none either. For if she succeeded in slaying that beggarman, she might need to slay herself after, to avoid being - according to the fashion of those days - burnt alive.

So when the arras was drawn back, and that beggarman came into the room, instead of shrieking, fainting, hiding, or turning, she made three steps straight toward him, looking him in the face like a wild cat at bay. Then she threw up her arms, and fell upon his neck.

It was Hereward himself. Filthy, ragged but Hereward.

His shirt was brown with gore, and torn with wounds, and through its rents showed more than one hardly healed scar. His hair and beard was all in elf-locks, and one heavy cut across the head had shown not only hair, but lun-pan very close.

But Hereward it was, and regardless of all beholders, she lay upon his neck, and never stirred nor spoke.

'I call you to witness, ladies,' cried the queen-countess, 'that I am guiltless. She has given herself to this beggarman of her own free will. What say you?' and she turned to Torfrida's mother.

Torfrida's mother only prayed and whimpered. 'Countesses and ladies,' said the queen-countess, 'there will be two weddings to-morrow. The first will be that of my son Robert and my pretty Lady Gertrude here. The second will be that of my pretty Torfrida and Hereward.'

'And the second bride,' said the Countess Gertrude, rising and taking Torfrida in her arms, 'will be ten times prettier than the first. There, sir, I have done all you asked of me. Now go and wash yourself.'

'Hereward,' said Torfrida, a week after, 'and did you never change your shirt all that time?'

'Never. I kept my promise.'

'But it must have been very rusty.'

'Well, I bathed now and then.'

'But it must have been very cold.'

'I am warm enough now.'

'But did you never comb your hair, either?'

'Well, I won't say that. Travellers find strange bedfellows. But I had half a mind never to do it at all, just to spite you.'

'And what matter would it have been to me?'

'Oh! none. It is only a Danish fashion we have of keeping clean.'

'Clean! You were dirty enough when you came home. How silly you were! If you had sent me but one word.'

'You would have fanned me, beaten, and scolded me all over again. I know your ways now, Torfrida.'

CHAPTER XV

HOW EARL TOSTI GODWINSSON CAME TO ST OMER

THE winter passed in sweet madness; and for the first time in her life Torfrida regretted the lengthening of the days, and the flowering of the primroses, and the return of the now needless wyneck, for they warned her that Hereward must forth to the wars in Skadduriland, which had broken out again, as was to be expected, as soon as Count Robert and his bride had tanned their backs.

And Hereward, likewise for the first time in his life, was loth to go to war. He was, doubtless, rich enough in this world's goods. Torfrida herself was rich, and seems to have had the disposal of her own property, for her mother is not mentioned in connection therewith. Hereward seems to have dwelt in her house at St Omer as long as he remained in Flanders. He had probably amassed some treasure of his own by the simple, but then most aristocratic, method of plunder. He had, too, probably, grants of land in Holland from the Frison, the rents whereof were not paid as regularly as might be. Moreover, as 'Magister Militum,' 'Master of the Knights,' he had, it is likely, pay as well as honour. And he approved himself worthy of his good fortune. He kept forty gallant housecarles in his hall all the winter, and Torfrida and her lasses made and mended their clothes. He gave large gifts to the Abbey of St. Bertin, and had masses sung for the souls of all whom he had slain, according to a rough list which he furnished—bidding the monks not to be chary of two or three masses extra at times, as his memory was short, and he might have sent more souls to purgatory than he had recollected. He gave great alms at his door to all the poor. He befriended, especially, all shipwrecked and needy mariners, feeding and clothing them, and begging their freedom as a gift from Baldwin. He feasted the knights of the neighbourhood, who since his Baresark campaign had all vowed him the most gallant of warriors, and since his accession of wealth, the most courteous of gentlemen, and all went merrily, as it is written, 'As long as thou dost well unto thyself, men will speak well of thee.'

So he would have fain stayed at home at St. Omer, but he was Robert's man, and his good friend likewise, and to the war he must go forth once more, and for eight or nine weary months Torfrida was alone, but very happy, for a certain reason of her own.

At last the short November days came round, and a joyful woman was fain Torfrida when Martin Lightfoot ran into the hall, and throwing himself down on the rushes like a dog, announced that Hereward and his men would be home before noon, and then fell fast asleep.

There was bustling to and fro of her and her maids, decking of the hall in its best hangings, strewing of fresh rushes, to the dislodgment of Martin, setting out of boards and trestles, and stools and mugs thereon, cooking of victuals, broaching of casks, and, above all, for Hereward's self, heating of much water, and setting out, in the inner chamber, of the great bath-tub and bath-sheet, which was the special delight of a hero fresh from war.

And by mid-day the streets of St. Omer rang with clank, and tramp, and trumpet-blare, and in marched Hereward and all his men, and swung round through the gateway into the court, where Torfrida stood to welcome them, as far as day, a silver stirrup cup in her hand. And while the men were taking off their harness and dressing their horses, she and Hereward went in together, and either took such joy of the other that a year's parting was forgot in a minute's meeting.

'Now!' cried she, in a tone half of triumph, half of tenderness, 'look there!'

'A cradle! And a baby!'

'Your baby!'

'Is it a boy?' asked Hereward, who saw in his mind's eye a thing which would grow and broaden at his knee year by year, and learn from him to ride, to shoot, to fight. 'Happy for him if he does not learn worse from me,' thought Hereward, with a sudden movement of humility and contrition, which was surely marked in heaven, for Torfrida marked it on earth.

But she mistook its meaning.

'Do not be vexed. It is a girl!'

'Never mind.' As if it was a calamity over which he was bound to comfort the mother. 'If she is half as beautiful as you look at this moment, what spitting of lances there will be about her! How jolly to see the lads howling at each other, while our daughter sits in the pavilion as Queen of Love!'

Torfrida laughed. 'You think of nothing but fighting, bear of the North Seas!'

'Every one to his trade. Well, yes, I am glad that it is a girl!'

'I thought you seemed vexed. Why did you cross yourself?'

'Because I thought to myself how unfit I was to bring up a boy to be such a knight as—as you would have him,—how likely I was, ere all was over, to make him as great a ruffian as myself!'

'Hereward! Hereward!' and she threw her arms round his neck for the tenth time. 'Blessed be you for those words! Those are the fears which never come true, for they bring down from heaven the grace of God, to guard the humble and contrite heart from that which it fears.'

'Ah, Torfrida, I wish I were as good as you!'

'Now—my joy and my life, my hero and my scold—I have great news for you, as well as a little baby. News from England!'

'You, and a baby over and above, are worth all England to me!'

'But listen. Edward the king is dead!'

'Then there is one fool less on earth, and one saint more, I suppose, in heaven!'

'And Harold Godwinson is king in his stead. And he has married your niece Aldyth, and sworn friendship with her brothers!'

'I expected no less. Well, every dog has his day!'

'And his will be a short one. William of Normandy has sworn to drive him out!'

'Then he will do it. And so the poor little Swan-neck is packed into a convent, that the houses of Godwin and Leofric may rush into each other's arms, and perish together! Fools, fools, fools! I will hear no more of such a mad world. My queen, tell me about your sweet self. What is all this to me? Am I not a wolf's head, and a landless man?'

'O my king, have not the stars told me that you will be an earl and a ruler of men, when all your foes are wolves' heads as you are now? And the word is coming true already. Tost Godwinson is in the town at this moment, an outlaw and a wolf's head himself!'

Hereward laughed a great laugh.

'Alas! Every man to his right place at last. Tell me about that, for it will amuse me. I have heard naught of him since he sent the king his Hereford thralls' arms and legs in the pickle-barrels, to show him, he said, that there was plenty of cold meat on his royal demeanour.

'You have not heard, then, how he murdered, in his own chamber at York, Ganel Ormsson and Ulf Dolfinsson!'

'That poor little lad?' Well, a gracious youth was Tosti, ever since he went to kill his brother Harold with teeth and claws, like a wolf, and as he grows 12 years, he grows in grace. But what said Ulf's father and the Gospatrics!'

'They were I know not where. But old Gospatric came down to Westminster, to demand law for his grand-nephew's blood.'

'A silly thing of the oldthane, to walk into the wolf's den.'

'And so he found. He was stabbed there, three days after Christmas-tide, and men say that Queen Edith did it for love of Tosti, her brother. Then Dolfin and the Gospatrics took to sea, and away to Scotland, and so Tosti rid himself of all the good blood in the north, except young Walthoof Swardsson, whose mind, I fear, will come next.'

'How comes he here, then?'

'The northern men rose at that, killed his servant at York, took all his treasures, and marched down to Northampton, plundering and burning. They would have marched on London town, if Harold had not met them there from the king. There they cried out against Tosti, and all his taxes, and his murders, and his changing Canute's laws, and would have you nephew Morcar for their earl. A tyrant they would not endure. Free they were born and bred, they said, and free they would live and die. Harold must needs do justice, even on his own brother.'

'Especially when he knows that that brother is his worst foe.'

'Harold is a better man than you take him for, my Hereward. But be that as it may, Morcar is earl, and Tosti outlawed, and here is St. Omer, with wife and child.'

'My nephew Earl of Northumbria! As I might have been, if I had been a wiser man.'

'If you had, you would never have found me.'

'True, my queen! They say heaven tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, but it tempers it too, sometimes, to the hobbled ass, and so it has done by me. And so the rogues have fallen out, and honest men may come by their own. For as the northern men have done by one brother, so will the eastern men do by the other. Let Harold see how many of those fat Lincolnshire manors, which he has seized into his own hands, he holds by this day twelve months. But what is all this to me, my queen, while you and I can kiss, and laugh the world to scorn!'

'This to you, beloved, that, great as you are, Torfrida must have you greater still, and out of all this coil and confusion you may win something, if you be wise.'

'Sweet lips, be still, and let us play instead of plotting.'

'And thus, too—you shall not stop my mouth—that Harold Godwinsson has sent a letter to you.'

'Harold Godwinsson is my very good lord,' sneered Hereward.

'And thus it said, with such praises and courtesies concerning you as made my wife's heart beat high with pride—"If Hereward Leofricsson will come home to England, he shall have his rights in law again, and his manors in Lincolnshire, and a thaneship in East Anglia, and manors for his men-at-arms, and if that be not enough, he shall have an earldom, as soon as there is one to give."

'And what says to that Torfrida, Hereward's queen?'

'You will not be angry if I answered the letter for you?'

'If you answered it in one way—no. If another—yes.'

Torfrida trembled. Then she looked Hereward full in the face with her keen clear eyes.

'Now shall I see whether I have given myself to Hereward in vain, body and soul, or whether I have trained him to be my true and perfect knight.'

'You answered, then,' said Hereward, 'thus—'

'Say on,' said she, turning her face away again.

Hereward Leofricsson tells Harold Godwinsson that he is his equal, and not his man, and that he will never put his hands between the hands of a son of Godwin. An Etheling born, a king of the house of Cerdic, outlawed him from his right, and none but an Etheling born shall give him his right again.'

'I said it, I said it. Those were my very words!' and Torfrida burst into tears, while Hereward kissed her, almost fawned upon her, calling her his queen, his saga-wife, his guardian angel.

'I was sorely tempted,' sobbed she. 'Sorely. To see you rich and proud upon your own lands, an earl, may be—may be, I thought at times, a king. But it could not be. It did not stand with honour, my hero—not with honour.'

'Not with honour. Get me gay garments out of the chest, and let us go royally, and royally feast my jolly riders.'

'Stay awhile,' said she, kissing his head as she combed and curled his long golden locks, and her own raven ones, hardly more beautiful, fell over them and mingled with them. 'Stay awhile, my pride. There is another spell in the wind, stirred up by devil or witch-wife, and it comes from Tosti Godwinsson.'

'Tosti, the cold-meat butcher! What has he to say to me?'

'This—"If Hereward will come with me to William of Normandy, and help us against Harold the perjured, then will William do for him all that Harold would have done, and more beside."

'And what answered Torfrida?'

'It was not so said to me that I could answer.'

I had it by a side wind through the Countess Judith."

"And she had it from her sister Matilda."

"And she, of course, from Duke William himself."

"And what would you have answered, if you had answered, pretty one?"

"Nay, I know not. I cannot be always queen. You must be king sometimes."

Torfrida did not say that this latter offer had been a much sorer temptation than the former.

"And has not the base-born Frenchman enough knights of his own, that he needs the help of an outlaw like me?"

"He asks for help from all the ends of the earth. He has sent that Lanfranc to the Pope, and there is talk of a sacred banner, and a crusade against England."

"The monks are with him, then?" said Hereward. "That is one more count in their score. But I am no monk. I have shorn many a crown, but I have kept my own hair as yet, you see."

"I do see," said she, playing with his locks. "But—but he wants you. He has sent for Angevins, Portevins, Bretons, Flemings—purchasing lands, rank, money, what not. Tostig is recruiting for him here in Flanders now. He will soon be off to the Orkneys, I suspect, or to Sweyn in Denmark, after Vikings."

"Here? Has Baldwin promised him men?"

"What could the good old man do? He could not refuse his own son-in-law. Thus, at least, I know, that a messenger has gone off to Scotland, to Gilbert of Ghent, to bring or send any bold Flemings who may prefer let England to lean Scotland."

"Lands, rank, money, eh? So he intends that the war should pay itself—out of English purses. What answer would you have me make to that, wife mine?"

"The duke is a terrible man. What if he conquers? And conquer he will."

"Is that written in your stars?"

"It is, I fear. And if we have the Pope's blessing, and the Pope's banner—Dare we resist the Holy Father?"

"Holy stepfather, you mean, for a stepfather he seems to prove to merry England. But do you really believe that an old man down in Italy can make a bit of rag conquer by saying a few prayers at it? If I am to believe in a magic flag, give me Harold Hardrada's Landeycle, at least, with Harold and his Norwegians behind it."

"William's French are as good as those Norse men, man for man, and how'd withal, Hereward?"

"That may be," said he, half testily, with a curse on the tanner's grandson and his French popinjays, "and our Englishmen are as good as any two Norwegians, as the Norse themselves say." He could not divine, and Torfrida hardly liked to explain to him, the glamour which the Duke of Normandy had cast over her, as the representative of chivalry, learning, civilization, a new and nobler life for men than the world had yet seen, one which seemed to connect the young races of Europe with the wisdom of the ancients and the magic glories of old Imperial Rome.

"You are not fair to that man," said she, after a while. "Hereward, Hereward, have I not told you how, though body be strong, mind is stronger? That is what that man knows, and therefore he has prospered. Therefore his realms are full of wise scholars, and thriving schools, and his ministers, and his men are sober, and wise, and learned like clerks—"

"And false like clerks, as he is himself. Skillcraft and honesty never went yet together, Torfrida."

"Not in me?"

"You are not a clerk—you are a woman, and more than woman, you are an elf, a godless, there is none like you. But hearken to me. This man is false. All the world knows it."

"He promises, they say, to govern England justly as King Edward's law, according to the old laws and liberties of this realm."

"Of course. If he does not come as the old monk's lien, how does he come at all? If he does not promise our—they, I mean, for I am no Englishman—law and liberties, who will join him? But his riders and hurlings will not fight for nothing. They must be paid with English land, and English land they will have, for they will be his men, whoever else are not. They will be his darlings, his householders, his hawks to sit on his fist and fly at his gains, and English bones will be packed clean to feed them. And you would have me help to do that, Torfrida? Is that the honour of which you spoke so loudly to Harold Godwinsson?"

Torfrida was silent. To have brought Hereward under the influence of William was an old dream of hers. And yet she was proud at the dream being broken thus. And so she said—

"You are right! It is better for you—it is better than to be William's darling, and the greatest evil in his court—to feel that you are still an Englishman. Promise me but one thing, that you will make no heroes or desperado answer to the duke."

"And why not answer the tanner as he deserves?"

"Because my art, and my heart too, tells me that your fortunes and his are linked together. I have studied my tables, but they would not answer. Then I cast lots in Virgilus—"

"And what found you there?" asked he anxiously.

"I opened at the lines—"

"Pro in me exanilis et Martis sorte peremptis, Omitis? Equidem et vivis concedere villam."

"And what means that?"

"That you may have to pray him to pity the slain, and have for answer, that their lands may be yours if you will but make peace with him. At least, do not break hopelessly with that man. Above all, never use that word concerning him which you used just now, the word which he never forgives. Remember what he did to them of Alençon, when they hung new hides over the wall, and cried, "Plenty of work for the tanner!"

'Let him pick out the prisoners' eyes, and chop off their hands, and shoot them into the town from mangonels. I know him, but he must go far and thrive well ere I give him a chance of doing that by the Wake.'

'Hereward, Hereward, my own! Boast not, but fear God. Who knows, in such a world as this, to what end we may come? Night after night I am haunted with spectres, eyeless, handless—'

'This is cold comfort for a man just out of hard fighting in the agnons!'

She threw her arms round him, and held him as if she would never let him go.

'When you die, I die. And you will not die—you will be great and glorious, and your name will be sung by scab and unsabred through many a land, far and wide. Only, be not rash. Be not high-minded. Promise me to answer this man wisely. The more crafty he is, the more crafty must you be likewise.'

'Let us tell this mighty hero then,' said Hereward, trying to laugh away her fears—and perhaps his own, 'that while he has the Holy Father on his side he can need no help from a poor sinful woman like me.'

'Hereward, Hereward!'

'Why, is there aught about hides in that?'

'I want—I want an answer which may not cut off all hope in case of the worst.'

'Then let us say boldly, "On the day that William is king of all England, Hereward will come and put his hands between his, and be his man!"'

That message was sent to William at Rouen. He laughed.

'It is a fair challenge from a valiant man. The day shall come when I will claim it.'

Tosti and Hereward passed that winter in St Omer, living in the same street, passing each other day by day, and never spoke a word one to the other.

Robert the Friar heard of it, and tried to persuade Hereward.

'Let him purge himself of the murder of Ulf the boy, son of my friend Dolfin, and avenge that of Gamel, son of Orm, and after that again of Gospatric, my father's friend, whom his sister slew for his sake; and then an honest man may talk with him. Were he not my good lord's brother-in-law, as he is, more's the pity, I would challenge him to fight à l'outrance, with any weapons he might choose.'

'Heaven protect him in that case,' quoth Robert the Friar.

'As it is, I will keep the peace. And I will see that my men keep the peace, though there are Scarborough and Bamborough lais among them, who long to cut his throat upon the streets. But more I will not do.'

So Tosti sulked through the winter at St Omer. Suddenly he turned traitor (no man knows why) to his good brother-in-law and new ally, William of Normandy, and went off to get help from Sweyn of Denmark, and, failing that, from Harold Hardraade of Norway. But how he sped there must be read in the words of a cunninger saga-man than this chronicler, even in those of the Icelandic Homer, Snorrio Sturluson.

CHAPTER XVI

HOW HEReward WAS ASKED TO SLAY AN OLD COMRADE

IN those days Hereward went into Bruges, to Margus Baldwin, about his business. And as he walked in Bruges street he met an old friend, Gilbert of Ghent.

He had grown somewhat stouter, and somewhat grayer, in the last ten years; but he was as hearty as ever, and as honest, according to his own notions of honesty.

He shook Hereward by both hands, clapt him on the back, swore with many oaths that he had heard of his fame in all lands, that he always said that he would turn out a champion and a gallant knight, and had said it long before he killed the bear. As for killing it, it was no more than he expected, and nothing to what Hereward had done since, and would do yet.

When from Hereward asked that Gilbert had need of him.

They chatted on Hereward asking after old friends, and sometimes after old foes, whom he had long since forgiven, for though he always avenged an injury, he never bore malice for one. A distinction less common now than then, when a man's honour, as well as his safety, depended on his striking again when he was struck.

'And how is little Alfrinka?—Big she must be now?' asked he at last.

'The fiend fly away with her—or rather, would that he had flown away with her, before ever I saw the troublesome jade. Big! She is grown into the most beautiful lass that ever was seen—which is, what a young fellow, like you, cares for, and more trouble to me than all my money, which is what an old fellow, like me, cares for. It is partly about her that I am over here now. Fool that I was ever to let a princess into my house,' and Gilbert swore a great deal.

'How was she a princess? I forget,' said Hereward, who cared nothing about the matter. 'And how came she into your house? I never could understand that, any more than how the bear came there.'

'Ah? As to the bear, I have my secrets, which I tell no one. He is dead and buried, thanks to you.'

'And I sleep on his skin every night.'

'You do, my little champion? Well—warn is the bed that is well earned. But as for her, —see here, and I'll tell you. She was Gospatric's ward and kinswoman—how, I do not rightly know. But this I know, that she comes from Uoltred, the earl whom Canute slew, and that she is heir to great estates in Northumberland.

'Gospatric, that fought at Dunsinane!'

'Yes, not the oldthane, his uncle, whom Tosti has murdered, but Gospatric, King Malcolm's cousin, Dolfin's father. Well, she was his ward. He gave me her to keep, for he wanted her out of harm's way—the lass having a bouny dower, lands and money—till he could marry her up to one of his sons. I took her, but of course I was not going to do aith men's work for nought, so I would have married her up to my poor boy, if he had but lived. But he would not live, as you know. Then I would have married her to you, and made you my heir, I tell you honestly, if you had not flown off, like a hot-headed young springald as you were then.'

'You were very kind. But how is she a princess?'

'Princess! Twice over. Her father was of high blood among the Saxons, and if not, are not all the Gospatrics Ethelings? Their grandmother, Uoltred's wife, was Ethelred Evil-Connell's daughter, and I have heard that this girl's grandfather was his son—but died young—or was killed. Who cares?'

'Not I,' quoth Hereward.

'Well—Gospatric wants to marry her to Dolfin, his eldest son.'

'Why, Dolfin had a wife when I was at Dunsinane.'

'But she is dead since, and young Ulf, her son, was murdered by Tosti last winter.'

'I know.'

'Whereupon Gospatric sends to me for the girl and her dowry. What was I to do? Give her up? Little it is, lad, that I ever gave up, after I had it once in my grip, or I should be a poorer man than I am now. Have and hold, is my rule. What should I do? What I did. I was coming hither on business of my own, so I put her on board ship, and half her dower—where the other half is, I know, and man must draw me with wild horses before he finds out—and came here to my kinsman, Baldwin, to see if he had any proper young fellow to whom we might marry the lass, and so go shares in her money and the family connection. Could a man do more wisely?'

'Impossible,' quoth Hereward.

'But see how a wise man is lost by fortune. When I come here, whom should I find but Dolfin himself? The rogue had secret of my plan, all the way from Dolminton there, by Peebles. He hunts me out, the hungry Scotch wolf, rides for Lenth, takes ship, and is here to meet me, having accused me before Baldwin as a robber and a ravisher, and offered to prove his right to the jade on my body in single combat.'

'The villain!' quoth Hereward. 'There is no modesty left on earth, nor prudence either

To come here, where he might have stumbled on Tosti, who murdered his son, and who would surely do the like by him himself. Lucky for him that Tosti is off to Norway on his own errand.'

'Modesty and prudence! None nowadays, young sire, nor justice either, I think, for when Baldwin hears us both—and I told my story as calmly as I could—he tells me that he is very sorry for an old vassal and kinsman, and so farth,—but I must either disgorge or fight.'

'Then fight,' quoth Hereward.

'Per se aut per campionem,—that's the old law, you know.'

'Not a doubt of it.'

'Look you, Hereward. I am no coward, nor a chummy man of my kind.'

'He is either fool or liar who says so.'

'But see. I find it hard work to hold my own in Scotland now. Folks don't like me, or trust me, I can't say why.'

'How unreasonable!' quoth Hereward.

'And if I kill this youth, and so have a blood-feud with Gospatric, I have a hornet's nest about my ears. Not only he and his sons—who are masters of Scotch Northumberland—but all his cousins—King Malcolm, and Donaldbain, and, for aught I know, Harold and the Godwinsons, if he bid them take up the quarrel. And, besides, that Dolfin is a big man. If you cross Scot and Saxon you breed a very big man. If you cross again with a Dane or a Norseman, you breed a giant. His grandfather was a Scots prince, his grandmother an English princess, his mother a Norse princess, as you know—and how big he is, you should remember. He weighs half as much again as I, and twice as much as you.'

'Butchers count by weight, and knights by courage,' quoth Hereward.

'Very well for you, who are young and active, but I take him to be a better man than that ogre of Cornwall whom they say you killed.'

'What care I? Let him be twice as good, I'll try him.'

'Ah! I knew you were the old Hereward still. Now hearken to me. Be my champion. You owe me a service, lad. Fight that man. Challenge him in open field. Kill him, as you are sure to do. Claim the lass, and win her—and then we will part her dower. And (though it is little that I care for young lasses' fancies), to tell you truth she never favoured any man but you.'

Hereward started at the snare which had been laid for him, and then fell into a very great laughter.

'My most dear and generous host—you are the wiser, the older you grow. A plan worthy of Solomon! You are rid of Sieur Dolfin without any blame to yourself.'

'Just so.'

'While I win the lass, and, living here in Flanders, am tolerably safe from any blood-feud of the Gospatrics.'

'Perfect: but there is only one small hindrance to the plan; and that is—that I am married already.'

Gilbert stopped short, and swore a great oath.

'But,' he said after a while, 'does that matter so much after all?'

'Very little, indeed, as all the world knows, if one has money enough, and power enough.'

'And you have both, they say.'

'But, still more unhappily, my money is my wife's.'

'Pothe!'

'And, more unhappily still, I am so foolishly fond of her, that I would never have her in my snook, than any other woman with half England for a dowry.'

'Then I suppose I must look out for another champion.'

'Or save yourself the trouble, by being—just as a change—an honest man.'

'I believe you are right,' said Gilbert, laughing, 'but it is hard to begin so late in life.'

'And after one has had so little practice.'

'Alas! Thou art the same merry dog of a Hereward. Come along. But could we not poison this Dolfin after all?'

To which proposal Hereward gave no encouragement.

'And now, my friend-beanware, may I ask you, in return, what business brings you to Flanders?'

'Have I not told you?'

'No, but I have guessed. Gilbert of Ghent is on his way to William of Normandy.'

'Well. Why not?'

'Why not?—certainly. And has brought out of Scotland a few gallant gentlemen and stout housecarles of my acquaintance.'

Gilbert laughed.

'You may well say that. To tell you the truth, we have flitted, bag and baggage. I don't believe that we have left a dog behind.'

'So you intend to "colonise" in England, as the learned clerks would call it? To settle, to own land, and enter, like the Jews of old, into goodly houses which you builded not, fairs which you tilled not, wells which you digged not, and orchards which you planted not?'

'Why, what a lean neck clerk you are yourself! That sounds like Scripture.'

'And so it is. I heard it in a French priest's sermon which he preached here in St Omer a Sunday or two back, exhorting all good Catholics, in the Pope's name, to enter upon the barbarous land of England, tainted with the sin of Simon Magus, and expel thence the heretical priests, and so forth, promising them that they should have free leave to cut long thongs out of other men's hides.'

Gilbert chuckled.

'You laugh. The priest did not, for after sermon I went up to him, and told how I was an Englishman, and an outlaw, and a desperate man, who feared neither saint nor devil, and if I heard such talk as that again in St Omer, I would so shave the speaker's crown that he should never need razor to his dying day.'

'And what is that to me?' said Gilbert, in an uneasy, half-defiant tone; for Hereward's tone had been more than half-defiant.

'This. That there are certain broad lands in England, which were my father's, and are now my nephews' and my mother's, and some which should of right be mine. And I advise you, as a friend, not to make entry on those lands, lest Hereward in turn make entry on you. And who is he that will deliver you out of my hand?'

'God and His saints alone, thou bend out of the pit,' quoth Gilbert, laughing. But he was growing warm, and began to tutove Hereward.

'I am in earnest, Gilbert of Ghent, my good friend of old time.'

'I know thee well enough, man. Why, in the name of all glory and plunder, art thou not coming with us? They say William has offered thee the earldom of Northumberland.'

'He has not. And if he had, it is not his to give. And if it were, it is by right neither mine, nor my nephews', but Waltheof Swardson's. Now hearken unto me, and settle it in your minds, thou and William both, that your quarrel is against none but Harold and the Godwinsons, and their men of Wessex. But that if you go to cross the Watling Street, and meddle with the free Danes, who are none of Harold's men—'

'Stay. Harold has large manors in Lincolnshire, and so has Edith his sister, and what of them, Sieur Hereward?'

'That the man who touches them, even though the men on them may fight on Harold's side, had better have put his head into a hornet's nest. Unjustly were they seized from their true owners by Harold and his lathers, and the holders of them will owe no service to him a day longer than they can help. But will, if he fall, demand an eal of their own race, or fight to the death.'

'Best make young Waltheof eal, then.'

'Best keep thy foot out of them, and the foot of any man for whom thou carest. Now good-bye. Friends we are, and friends let us be.'

'Ah, that thou wert coming to England!'

'I bide my time. Come I may, when I see fit. But whether I come as friend or foe depends on that of which I have given thee tan warning.'

So they parted for the time.

It will be seen hereafter, how Gilbert took his own advice about young Waltheof: but did not take Hereward's advice about the Lincoln manors.

In Balwin's hall that day, Hereward met Dolfin, and when the magnificent young Scot sprang to him, embraced him, bewailed his murdered boy, talked over old passages, complimented him on his fame, lamented that he himself had won no such honours in the field, Hereward felt much more inclined to fight for him than against him.

Presently the ladies entered from the bower adjoining the hall. A buzz of expectation rose from all the knights, and Alfruda's name was whispered round.

She came in, and Hereward saw at the first glance that Gilbert had for once in his life spoken truth. So beautiful a damsel he had never beheld, and as she swept down toward him, he for one moment forgot Torfrida, and stood spell-bound like the rest.

Her eye caught his. If his face showed recognition, hers showed none. The remembrance of their early friendship, of her deliverance from the monster, had plainly passed away.

'Fickle, ingrateful things, these women,' thought Hereward.

She passed him close. As she did so, she turned her head, and looked him full in the face one moment, haughty and cold.

'So you could not wait for me?' said she, in a quiet whisper, and went on straight to Dolfin, who stood trembling with expectation and delight.

She put her hand into his.

'Here stands my champion,' said she.

'Say, here kneels your slave,' cried the Scot, dropping to the pavement a true Highland knee. Whereon faith twanged a harp, and Dolfin's minstrel sang, in most melodious Gaelic—

'Strong as a horse's hock, slinky as a stag's brisket, Is the knee of the young torrid-kapel, his pride of the house of Cithau.
It bent not to Macbeth the accursed, it bends not even to Malcolm the Anointed,
But it bends like a barebell— who shall blame it?— before the breath of beauty.'

Which magnificent effusion being interjected by Hereward for the instruction of the ladies, procured for the red-headed bard more than one handsome gift.

A sturdy voice arose out of the crowd.

'The lady, my lord marshal, and knights all, will need no champion as far as I am concerned. When one sees so fair a pair together, what can a knight say, in the name of all knighthood, but that the heavens have made them for each other, and that it were sin and shame to smiter them?'

The voice was that of Gilbert of Ghent, who, making a virtue of necessity, walked up to the pair, his weather-beaten countenance wreathed into what were meant for paternal smiles.

'Why did you not say as much in Scotland, and save me all this trouble?' pertinently asked the plain-spoken Scot.

'My lord prince, you owe me a debt for my caution. Without it, the fair lady had never known the whole fervency of your love, nor these noble knights and yourself the whole evenness of Count Belduin's justice.'

Alfrida turned her head away half contemptuously, and as she did so she let her hand drop listlessly from Dolfin's grasp, and drew back to the other ladies.

A suspicion crossed Hereward's mind. Did she really love the prince? Did those strange words of hers mean that she had not yet forgotten Hereward himself?

However, he said to himself that it was no concern of his, as it certainly was not. went home to Torfrida, told her everything that had happened, laughed over it with her, and then forgot Alfrida, Dolfin, and Gilbert in the prospect of a great campaign in Holland.

CHAPTER XVII

HOW HERWARD TOOK THE NEWS FROM STANFORD BRIDGE AND DABINOS

AFTER that, news came thick and fast.

News of all the fowl of heaven flocking to the feast of the great God, that they might eat the flesh of kings, and captains, and mighty men, and horses, and them that sit on them, and the flesh of all men, both bond and free.

News true, news half true, news false. News from Rome, how England, when conquered, was to be held as a fief of St. Peter, and spiritually, as well as temporally, enslaved. News how the confusion of St. Peter, and a ring with a bit of St. Peter himself enclosed therein, had come to Rouen, to go before the Norman host as the ark went before that of Israel.

Then news from the North. How Tosti had been to Sweyn, and bid him come back and win the country again, as Canute his uncle had done, and how the cautious Dane had answered that he was a much smaller man than Canute, that he had enough to hold his own against the Norsemen, and could not afford to throw his such high stakes as his mighty uncle.

Then news how Tosti had been to Norway, to Harold Hardhaade, and asked him why he had been fighting fifteen years for Denmark, when England lay open to him. And how Harold of Norway had agreed to come, and how he had levied nine-hall of the able-bodied men in Norway, and how he was gathering a mighty fleet at Solmund, in the month of the Sogrie flood. Of all this Hereward was well informed, for Tosti came back again to St. Omer and talked long. But Hereward and he had no dealings with each other. But at last, when Tosti tried to entice some of Hereward's men to sail with him, Hereward sent him word that if he met him he would kill him in the streets.

Then Tosti, who (though he wanted not for courage) knew that he was no match for Hereward, went off to Bruges, leaving his wife and family behind, gathered sixty ships at Ostend, went off to the Isle of Wight, and forced the landfolk to give him money and food. Then Harold of England's fleet, which was watching the coast against the Normans, drove him away, and he sailed off north, full of black rage against his brother Harold and all Englishmen, and burned, plundered, and murdered, along the coast of Lincolnshire, out of brute spite to the Danes who had expelled him.

Then came news how he had got into the Humber, how Morecar and Elwin with the Northumbrians had driven him out; and how he had gone off to Scotland to meet Harold of Norway, and how he had put his hands between Harold's, and become his man.

And all the while the Norman camp at St. Pierre-sur-Divo grew and grew, and all was ready, if the wind would but change.

And so Hereward looked on, helpless, and saw these two great storm-clouds growing one from north, and one from south—to burst upon his native land.

Two invasions at the same moment of time, and these no mere Viking raids for plunder, but deliberate attempts at conquest and colonisation, by the two most famous captains of the age. What if both succeeded? What if the two storm-clouds swept across England, each on its own path, and met in the midst, to hurl their lightnings into each other? A fight between William of Normandy and Harold of Norway, on some moorland in Mercia—that would be a battle of giants, a sight at which Odin and the gods of Valhalla would rise from their seats, and throw away the mead-horn, to stare down on the deeds of heroes scarcely less mighty than themselves. Would that neither might win! Would that they would destroy and devour, till there was none left of Frenchmen or of Norwegians!

So sang Hereward, after his heathen fashion, and his housecarls applauded the song. But Torfrida shuddered.

'And what will become of the poor English in the meantime?'

'They have brought it on themselves,' said Hereward bitterly. 'Instead of giving the crown to the man who should have had it—to Sweyn of Denmark—they let Godwin put it on the head of a drivelling monk, and as they sowed, so will they reap.'

But Hereward's own soul was black within him. To see these mighty events passing, as it were, within reach of his hand, and be unable to take his share in them—For what share could he take? That of Tosti Godwinsson against his own nephews? That of Harold Godwinsson, the usurper? That of the tanner's grandson against any man? Ah, that he had been in England! Ah, that he had been where he might have been, where he ought to have been, but for his own folly—high in power in his native land, perhaps a great earl, perhaps commander of all the armies of the Danelagh. And bitterly he cursed his youthful sins, as he rode to and fro almost daily to the port, asking for news, and getting often only too much.

For now came news that the Norsemen had landed in Humber; that Edwin and Morcar were beaten at York; that Hardraade and Tosti were masters of the North.

And with that, news that by the virtue of the relics of St. Valeri, which had been brought out of their shrine to frighten the demons of the storm, and by the intercession of the blessed St. Michael, patron of Normandy, the winds had changed, and William's whole armament had crossed the Channel, landed upon an undefended shore, and fortified themselves at Pevensey and Hastings.

And then followed a fortnight of silence and torturing suspense.

Hereward could hardly eat, drink, sleep, or speak. He answered Torfrida's consolations curtly and angrily, till she betook herself to silent caresses, as to a sick animal. But she loved him all the better for his sullenness, for it showed that his English heart was awakening again, sound and strong.

At last news came. He was down as usual at the port. A ship had just come up the estuary. A man just landed stood on the beach, gesticulating, and calling in an unknown tongue to the bystanders, who laughed at him, and seemed inclined to misuse him.

Hereward galloped down the beach.

'Out of the way, villains! Why, man, you are a Norseman!'

'Norseman am I, yea, Thorl Gumlaugsson is my name, and news I bring for the Countess Judith (as the French call her) that shall turn her golden hair to snow—yea, and all her ladies' hair from tenderness to tumbledown.'

'Is the earl dead?'

'And Harold Sigurdsson.'

Hereward sat silent, appalled. For Tosti he cared not. But Harold Sigurdsson, Harold Hardraade, Harold the Viking, Harold the Varanger, Harold the Lion-slayer, Harold of Constantinople, the bravest among champions, the wisest among kings, the cunningest among minstrels, the darling of the Vikings of the north, the one man whom Hereward had taken for his pattern and his ideal, the one man under whose banner he would have been proud to fight the earth seemed empty, if Harold Hardraade were gone.

'Thorl Gumlaugsson,' cried he at last, 'or whatever be thy name, if thou hast led to me, I will draw thee with wild horses.'

'Would God that I did he! I saw him fall with an arrow through his throat. Then Jarl Tosti took the Land-ravager and held it up till he died. Then Rystem Orre took it, coming up hot from the ships. And then he died likewise. Then they all died. We would take no quarter. We threw off our mail, and fought bareback, till all were dead together!'

'How camest thou, then, hither?'

'Styrkar the marshal escaped in the night, and I with him, and a few more. And Styrkar bade me bring the news to Flanders, to the countess, whither he took it to Olaf Haroldsson, who lay off in the ships.'

'And thou shalt take it, Martin! get this man a horse. A horse, ye villains, and a good one, on your lives!'

'And Tosti is dead?'

'Dead like a hero. Harold offered him quarter—offered him his earlship, they say—even in the midst of battle—but he would not take it.'

1 For the details of this battle, see Snorrio Sturluson; or the admirable description in Bulwer's Harold.

He said he was the Sigurdsson's man now, and true man he would be.

'Harold offeral him?—What art bahbling at? Who fought you?'

Harold Godwinsson, the king.

'Where?'

'At Stanford Brigg, by York town.'

'Harold Godwinsson slew Harold Sigurdsson? After this wolves may eat lions!'

'The Godwinsson is a gallant fighter and a wise general, or I had not been here now.'

'Get on thy horse, man!' said he, scornfully and impatiently, 'and gallop, if thou canst.'

'I have ridden many a mile in Ireland, earl, and have not forgotten my seat.'

'Thou hast, hast thou?' said Martin, 'thou art Thord Ginnlaugsson of Waterford.'

'That am I. How knowest thou me, man?'

'I am of Waterford. Thou hadst a slave lass, once, I think, Mew; they called her Mew, her skin it was so white.'

'What's that to thee?' asked Thord, turning on him savagely.

'I meant no harm. I saw her at Waterford when I was a boy, and thought her a fair lass enough, that is all.'

And Martin drooped into the rear.

As they rode side by side, Hereward got more details of the fight.

'I knew it would fall out so. I foretold it!' said Thord. 'I had a dream. I saw us come to English land, and fight, and I saw the banners floating. And before the English army was a great witchwife, and rode upon a wolf, and he had a corpse in his bloody jaws. And when he had eaten one up, he throw him another, till he had swallowed all.'

'Did she throw him thus?' asked Martin, who ran looking by the stirrup.

'That did she, and eaten I saw myself. Yet here I am alive.'

'Then thy dreams were naught.'

'I do not know that. The wolf may have me yet.'

'I fear thou art fry.'

'What the devil is that to thee if I be?'

'Naught. But be comforted. I am a necromancer, and thus I know by my art, that the weapon that will slay thee was never forged in Flanders here.'

'There was another man had a dream,' said Thord, turning from Martin angrily. 'He was standing in the king's ship, and he saw a great witchwife with a fork and a trough stand on the island. And he saw a fowl on every ship's stem, a raven, or else an eagle, and he heard the witchwife sing an evil song.'

By this time they were in St Omer.

Hereward rode straight to the Countess Judith's house. He never had entered it yet, and was likely to be attacked if he entered it now. But when the door was opened, he thrust in with so earnest and sad a face that the servants let him pass, though not without growling and motions as of getting their weapons.

'I come in peace, my men, I come in peace. This is no time for brawls. Where is the steward, or one of the countess' ladies?—Tell her, madam, that Hereward waits her commands, and entreats her, in the name of St Mary and all saints, to vouchsafe him one word in private.'

The lady hurried into the bower. The next moment Judith hurried out into the hall, her fair face blanched, her fair eyes wide with terror.

Hereward fell on his knee.

'What is this? It must be bad news if you bring it.'

'Madam, the grave covers all fends. Earl Tosti was a very valiant hero, and would to God that we had been friends!'

She did not hear the end of the sentence: but fell back with a shriek into the women's arms.

Hereward told them all that they needed to know of that fratricidal strife; and then to Thord Ginnlaugsson—

'Have you any token that this is true? Mind what I warned you, if you heed!'

'Thus have I, jarl and ladies,' and he drew from his bosom a reliquary. 'Ulf the marshal took this off the jarl's neck, and bade me give it to none but his lady. Therefore, with your pardon, sir jarl, I did not tell you that I had it, not knowing whether you were an honest man.'

'Thou hast done well; and an honest man thou shalt find me, though no jarl as yet. Come home, and I will feed thee at my own table, for I have been a sea-rover and a Viking myself.'

They left the reliquary with the ladies, and went.

'See to this good man, Martin.'

'That will I, as the apple of my eye.'

And Hereward went into Torfrida's room.

'I have news, news!'

'So have I!'

'Harold Hardrade is slain, and Tosti too!'

'Where? how?'

'Harold Godwinsson slew them by York.'

'Brother has slain brother? O God that died on cross!' murmured Torfrida, 'when will men look to Thee, and have mercy on their own souls? But Hereward—I have news—news more terrible by far. It came an hour ago. I have been dreading your coming back.'

'Say on. If Harold Hardrade is dead, no worse can happen.'

'But Harold Godwinsson is dead!'

'Dead! Who next? William of Normandy? The world seems coming to an end, as the monks say it will soon.'

'A great battle has been fought at a place they call Heathfield.'

'Close by Hastings? Close to the landing place? Harold must have flown thither back from York. What a captain the man is, after all!'

² For these two dreams, see Snorro Sturleson.

¹ There was a general rumour abroad that the end of the world was at hand, for the 'one thousand years' of prophecy had expired.

'Was. He is dead, and all the Godwinsons, and England lost.'

If Torfrida had feared the effect of her news, her heart was lightened at once as Hereward answered haughtily—

'England lost? Sussex is not England, nor Wessex either, any more than Harold was king thereof. England lost? Let the tanner try to cross the Watling Street, and he will find out that he has another stamp of Englishman to deal with.'

'Hereward, Hereward, do not be unjust to the dead. Men say—the Normans say—that they fought like heroes.'

'I never doubted that, but it makes me mad—as it does all eastern and northern men—to hear these Wessex churls and Godwinsons calling themselves all England.'

Torfrida shook her head. To her, as to most foreigners, Wessex and the south-east counties were England, the most civilised, the most French, the seat of royalty, having all the prestige of law, and order, and wealth. And she was shrewd enough to see that, as it was the part of England which had most sympathy with French civilisation, it was the very part where the Frenchman could most easily gain and keep his hold. The event proved that Torfrida was right, but all she said was, 'It is dangerously near to France, at least.'

'It is that. I would sooner see 100,000 French north of the Humber, than 10,000 in Kent and Sussex, where he can hurry over supplies and men every week. It is the starting point for him, if he means to conquer England piecemeal.'

'And he does.'

'And he shall not!' and Hereward started up, and walked to and fro. If all the Godwinsons be dead, there are Leofwinsons left, I trust, and Siward's kin, and the Gospatrics in Northumbria. Ah! Where were my nephews in the battle? Not killed too, I trust?

'They were not in the battle.'

'Not with their new brother-in-law? Much he has gained by throwing away the Swan-neck, like a base traitor as he was, and marrying my pretty niece. But where were they?'

'No man knows clearly. They followed him down as far as London, and then lingered about the city, meaning no man can tell what but we shall hear—and, I fear, hear too much—before a week is over.'

'Heavens! this is madness, indeed. This is the way to be eaten up one by one. Neither to do the thing, nor leave it alone. If I had been there! If I had been there—'

'You would have saved England, my hero!' and Torfrida believed her own words.

'I don't say that. Besides, I say that England is not lost. But there were but two things to do, either to have sent to William at once, and offered him the crown, if he would but guarantee the Danish laws and liberties to all north of the Watling Street, and if he would, fall on the Godwinsons themselves, by fair means or foul, and send their heads to William.'

'Or what?'

'Or have marched down after him, with every man they could muster, and thrown themselves on the Frenchman's flank in the battle—or between him and the sea, cutting him off from France or Oh, that I had but been there, what things could I have done!—And now these two wretched boys have fooled away their only chance.'

'Some say that they hoped for the crown themselves.'

'Which? Not both? Vain babies!' and Hereward laughed bitterly. 'I suppose one will murder the other next, in order to make himself the stronger by being the sole rival to the tanner. The milder, sleek sole rival to the eagle! Boy Walthof will set up his claim next, I presume, as Siward's son, and then Gospatric, as Ethelred Earl-Counsel's great grandson, and so forth, and so forth, till they all eat each other up, and the tanner's grandson calls the last. What care I? Tell me about the battle, my lady, if you know aught. That is more to my way than their statuta.'

And Torfrida told him all she knew of the great fight on Heathfield Down, which men call Senlat, and the battle of Hastings. And as she told it, in her wild eloquent fashion, Hereward's face reddened, and his eyes knitted. And when she told of the last struggle round the Dragon standard, of Harold's mighty figure in the front of all, hewing with his great double-headed axe, and then rolling in gore and agony an arrow in his eyeball, of the last rally of the men of Kent, of Guth, the last defender of the standard, falling by William's sword, of the standard hurled to the ground, and the popish Gonloman planted in its place. Then Hereward's eyes, for the first and last time for many a year, were flushed with noble tears, and springing up, he cried, 'Honour to the Godwinsons! Honour to the southern men! Honour to all true English hearts! Why was I not there, to go with them to Valhalla?'

Torfrida caught him round the neck. 'Be cause you are here, my hero, to free your country from her tyrants, and win yourself immortal fame.'

'Fool that I am, I verily believe I am crying.'

'These tears,' said she, as she kissed them away, 'are more precious to Torfrida than the spoils of a hundred fights, for they tell me that Hereward still loves his country, still honours virtue, even in a foe.'

And thus Torfrida—whether from a woman's

I have dared to differ from the excellent authorities who say that the standard was that of a Fighting Man, because the Bayeux Tapestry represents the last struggle as in front of a Dragon standard, which must be—as is to be expected—the old standard of Wessex, the standard of English royalty. That Harold had also a Fighting Man standard, and that it was sent by William to the Pope, there is no reason to doubt. But if the Bayeux Tapestry be correct, the fury of the fight for the standard would be explained. It would be a fight for the very symbol of King Edward's dynasty.

sentiment of pity, or from a woman's instinctive abhorrence of villainy and wrong, had become there and then an Englishwoman of the English, as she proved by strange deeds and sufferings for many a year.

'Where is that Norseman, Martin?' asked Hereward that night ere he went to bed. 'I want to hear more of poor Hardraade.'

'You can't speak to him now, master. He is sound asleep this two hours, and warm enough, I will warrant.'

'In the great green bed with blue curtains, just above the kitchen.'

'What nonsense is this?'

'The bed where you and I shall lie some day, and the kitchen to which we shall be sent down to turn our own spits, unless we mend our manners mightily.'

Hereward looked at the man. Madness glared unmistakably in his eyes.

'You have killed him!'

'And buried him, cheating the priests.'

'Traitor!' cried Hereward, seizing him.

'Take your hands off my throat, master. He was only my father.'

Hereward stood shocked and puzzled. After all, the man was No-man's-man, and would not be missed, and Martin Lightfoot, letting alone his madness, was as a third hand and foot to him all day long.

So all he said was, 'I hope you have buried him well and safely.'

'You may walk your bloodhound over his grave to-morrow without finding him.'

And where he lay, Hereward never knew. But from that night Martin got a tick of sticking and jutting his little axe, and talking to it as if it had been alive.

CHAPTER XVII

HOW EARL GODWIN'S WIDOW CAME TO ST OMER.

It would be vain to attempt even a sketch of the reports which came to Flanders from England during the next two years, or of the conversations which ensued thereon between Baldwin and his courtiers, and between Hereward and Torfrida. Two reports out of three were doubtless false, and two conversations out of three founded on those false reports.

It is best, therefore, to interrupt the thread of the story by some small sketch of the state of England after the battle of Hastings, that so we may at least guess at the tenor of Hereward and Torfrida's counsels.

William had, as yet, conquered little more than the south of England hardly, indeed, all that, for Herefordshire, Worcestershire, and the neighbouring parts, which had belonged to Sweyn, Harold's brother, were still insecure, and the noble old city of Exeter, confident in her Roman walls, did not yield till two years after, in A.D. 1068.

North of his conquered territory, Mercia stretched almost across England, from Chester to the Wash, governed by Edwin and Morcar. Kilwin called himself Earl of Mercia, and held the Danish burghs. On the extreme north-west, the Roman city of Chester was his, while on the extreme south-east (as Domesday-book testifies), Morcar still held large lands round Bourne and throughout the south of Lincolnshire, besides calling himself the Earl of Northumbria. The young men seemed the darlings of the half-Danish northmen. Chester, Coventry, Derby, Nottingham, Leicester, Stamford, a chain of fortified towns stretching across England, were at their command; Blethyn, prince of North Wales, was their nephew.

Northumbria, likewise, was not yet in William's hands. Indeed it was in no man's hands, since the free Danes north of the Humber had expelled Tosti, putting Morcar in his place. Morcar, instead of residing in his earldom of Northumbria, had made one Oswulf his deputy: but he had rivals enough. There was Gospatric, claiming through his grandfather Uchtred, and strong in the protection of his cousin Malcolm, King of Scotland, there was young Waltheof, 'the forest thief,'—or rather, perhaps, 'the thief of slaughter,' who had been born to Siward Thorn in his old age, just after the battle of Dunsmuir, a fine and gallant young man, destined to a swift and sad end.

William sent to the Northumbrians one Copsi, athane of mark and worth, as his procurator, to expel Oswulf. Oswulf and the land folk answered by killing Copsi, and doing every man that which was right in his own eyes.

William determined to propitiate the young earls. Perhaps he intended to govern the centre and north of England through them, as feudal vassals, and hoped meanwhile to pay his Norman conquerors sufficiently out of the forfeited lands of Harold, and those who had fought by his side at Hastings. It was not his policy to make himself, much less to call himself, the conqueror of England. He claimed to be its legitimate sovereign, deriving from his cousin Edward the Confessor, and whosoever would acknowledge him as such, had neither right nor cause to fear. Therefore he sent for the young earls. He counted Waltheof, and more, really loved him. He promised Edwin his daughter in marriage. Some say it was Constance, afterwards married to Alan Fergant, of Brittany, but it may also have been the beautiful Adelaide, who, none knew why, early gave up the world, and died in a convent. Be that as it may, the two young people saw each, and loved each other at Rouen, whither William took Waltheof, Edwin, and his brother, as honoured guests in name; in reality as hostages likewise.

With the same rational and prudent policy, William respected the fallen royal families, both of Harold and of Edward; at least, he warred not against women, and the wealth and influence of the great English ladies was enormous. Edith, sister of Harold, and widow of the Confessor, lived in wealth and honour at Winchester. Gyda, Harold's mother, retained Exeter and her land. Aldytha,¹ or Elfgiva, widow of Harold, lived rich and safe in Chester. Godiva the countess owned, so antiquarians say, manors from Cheshire to Lincolnshire, which would be now yearly worth the income of a great duke. Agatha the Hungarian, widow of Edmund the outlaw, dwelt at Romsey in Hampshire, under William's care. Her son Edgar Etheling, the rightful heir of England, was treated by William not only with courtesy, but with affection, and allowed to rebel, when he did rebel, with impunity. For the descendant of Rollo, the heathen Viking, had become a civilised chivalrous Christian knight. His mighty forefather would have split the Etheling's skull with his own axe. A Frank king would have shaved the young man's head, and nummed him in a monastery. An eastern sultan would have thrust out his eyes, or strangled him at once. But William, however cruel, however unscrupulous, had a knightly heart, and somewhat of a Christian conscience, and his conduct to his only lawful rival is a noble trait amid many sins.

So far all went well, till William went back to France, to be likened, not as his ancestors, to the gods of Valhalla, or the barbarous and destroying Vikings of mytime ages, but to Cæsar, Pompey, Vespasian, and civilised and civilising heroes of classic Rome.

But while he sat at the Easter Feast at Fécamp, displaying to Franks, Flemings, and Bretons, as well as to his own Normans, the treasures of Edward's palace at Westminster, and 'more English wealth than could be found in the whole estate of Gaul', while he sat there in his glory, with his young dupes, Edwin, Morcar, and Walthoot, by his side, having sent Harold's banner in triumph to the Pope, as a token that he had conquered the Church as well as the nation of England, and having founded abbeys as thank offerings to Him who had seemed to prosper him in his great crime, at that very hour the hand writing was on the wall, unseen by man, and he, and his policy, and his race, were weighed in the balance, and found wanting.

For now broke out in England that wrongdoing which endured as long as she was a mere appanage and foreign fief of Norman kings, whose hearts and homes were across the seas in France. Fitz Osbern, and Odo the warrior prelate, William's half-brother, had been left as his regents in England. Little do they seem to have cared for William's promise to the English people that they were to be ruled still by the laws of Edward the Confessor, and that where a grant of land was made to a Norman he was to hold it as the Englishman had done before him, with no heavier burdens on himself, but with no heavier burdens on the poor folk who tilled the land for him. Oppression began, lawlessness, and violence, men were ill-treated on the highways, and women—what was worse—in their own homes, and the regents abetted the ill-doers. 'It seems,' says a most impartial historian,¹ 'as if the Normans, released from all authority, all restraint, all fear of retaliation, determined to reduce the English nation to servitude, and drive them to despair.'

In the latter attempt they succeeded but too soon, in the former, they succeeded at last but they paid dearly for their success.

Hot young Englishmen began to emigrate. Some went to the court of Constantinople, to join the Varanger Guard, and have their chance of a Polotaswarf like Harold Hardrade. Some went to Scotland to Malcolm Canmore, and brooded over return and revenge. But Harold's sons went to their father's cousin, Ulfsson of Denmark, and called on him to come and reconquer England in the name of his uncle Canute the great, and many an Englishman went with them.

These things Gospatric watched, as earl (so far as he could make any one obey him in the utter subversion of all order), of the lands between Forth and Tyne. And he determined to flee, ere evil befell him, to his cousin Malcolm Canmore, taking with him Marlesweyn of Lincolnshire, who had fought, it is said, by Harold's side at Hastings, and young Walthoef of York. But, moreover, having a head, and being indeed, as his final success showed, a man of ability and courage, he determined on a stroke of policy which had incalculable after-effects on the history of Scotland. He persuaded Agatha the Hungarian, Margaret and Christina her daughters, and Edgar the Etheling himself, to flee with him to Scotland. 'How he contrived to send them messages to Romsey, far south in Hampshire, how they contrived to escape to the Humber, and thence up to the Forth, this is a romance in itself, of which the chroniclers have left hardly a hint. But the thing was done, and at St Margaret's Hope, as tradition tells, the Scottish king met, and claimed as his unwilling bride, that fair and holy maiden who was destined to soften his fierce passions, to civilise and purify his people, and to become—if all had then just died—the true patron saint of Scotland.

Malcolm Canmore promised a mighty army, Sweyn a mighty fleet. And meanwhile, Eustace of Boulogne, the Confessor's brother in law, himself a Norman, rebelled at the head of the down-trodden men of Kent, and the Welshmen were harrying Herefordshire with fire and sword, in revenge for Norman ravages.

But as yet the storm did not burst. William returned, and with him something like order. He conquered Exeter, he destroyed churches and towns to make his new forest. He brought over his Queen Matilda with pomp and great glory, and with her the Bayeux Tapestry which she had wrought with her own hands, and meanwhile Sweyn Ulfsson was too busy threatening Olaf Haraldsson, the new king of Norway, to sail for England, and the sons of King Harold of England had to seek help from the Irish Danes, and, ravaging the country round Bristol, be beaten off by the valiant burghers with heavy loss.

So the storm did not burst, and need not have burst, it may be, at all, had William kept his plighted word. But he would not give his fair daughter to Edwin. His Norman nobles, doubtless, looked upon such an alliance as debasing to a civilized lady. In their eyes, the Englishman was a barbarian, and though the Norman might well marry the Englishwoman, if she had beauty or wealth, it was a dangerous precedent to allow the Englishman to marry the Norman woman, and that woman a princess. Besides, there were those who coveted Edwin's broad lands, Roger de Montgomery who already (it is probable) held part of them as Earl of Shrewsbury, had no wish to see Edwin the son in law of his sovereign. Be the cause what it may, William faltered, and refused, and Edwin and Morcar left the court of Westminster in wrath. Waltheof followed them, having discovered—what he was weak enough continually to forget again—the treachery of the Norman. The young earls went off—one midlandward, one northward. The people saw their wrongs in those of their earls, and the rebellion burst forth at once, the Welsh under Blethyn, and the Cumbrians under Malcolm and Donaldbain, giving their help in the struggle.

It was the year 1069, a more evil year for England than even the year of Hastings.

The rebellion was crushed in a few months. The great general marched sturdily north, taking the boroughs one by one, storming, burning, sometimes, whole towns, massacring or mutilating young and old, and leaving, as he went on, a new portent, a Norman dungeon—till then all but unseen in England—as a place of safety for his garrisons. At Oxford (sacked horribly, and all but destroyed), at Warwick (destroyed utterly), at Nottingham, at Stafford, at Shrewsbury at Cambridge, on the huge barrow which overhangs the fen, and at York itself, which had opened its gates, trembling, to the great Norman strategist—at each doomed borough rose a castle, with its tall square tower within, its bailey around, and all the appliances of that ancient Roman science of fortification, of which the Danes, as well as the Saxons, knew nothing. Their struggle had only helped to tighten their bonds, and what wonder? There was among them neither unity, nor plan, nor governing mind and will. Hereward's words had come true. The only man, save Gospatric, who had a head in England, was Harold Godwinsson, and he lay in Waltham Abbey, while the monks ^{and masses} for his soul.

Edwin, Morcar, and Waltheof trembled before a genius superior to their own—a genius, indeed, which had not its equal in Christendom. They came in, and begged grace of the king. They got it. But Edwin's earldom was forfeited, and he and his brother became, from thenceforth, desperate men.

Malcolm of Scotland trembled likewise, and asked for peace. The clans, it is said, rejoiced thereat, having no wish for a war which could lay them neither spoil nor land. Malcolm sent ambassadors to William, and took (at least for his Cambrian lands on this side the border) that oath of fealty to the 'Basileus of Britain,' which more than one Scottish king and kinglet had taken before—with the secret proviso (which, during the middle ages, seems to have been thoroughly understood in such cases by both parties), that he should be William's man just as long as William could compel him to be so, and no longer.

Then came cruel and unjust confiscations. Edmuth the standard bearer had fallen at Bristol, fighting for William against the Haraldssons; yet all his lands were given away to Normans. Edwin and Morcar's lands were parted likewise, and—to specify cases which bear especially on the history of Hereward—Oger the Briton got many of Morcar's manors round Bomeie, and Gilbert of Ghent many belonging to Marlesweyn about Lincoln city. And so did that valiant and crafty knight find his legs once more on other men's ground, and reappears in monkish story as the most devout and pious earl, Gilbert of Ghent.

What followed, Hereward must have heard not from flying rumours, but from one who had seen and known, and judged of all.¹

For one day about this time Hereward was riding out of the gate of St. Omer, when the porter appealed to him. Beggings for admittance were some twenty women, and a clerk or two, and they must needs see the chatelain. The chatelain was away. What should he do?

Hereward looked at the party, and saw, to his surprise, that they were Englishwomen, and that two of them were women of rank, to judge from the rich materials of their travel-stained and tattered garments. The ladies rode on sorry country garrons, plainly hired from the peasants who drove them. The rest of the women had walked, and weary and footsore enough they were.

'You are surely Englishwomen?' asked he of the foremost as he lifted his cap.

The lady bowed assent, beneath a heavy veil. 'Then you are my guests. Let them pass in.' And Hereward threw himself off his horse, and took the lady's bridle.

'Stay,' she said, with an accent half Wessex half Danish. 'I seek the Countess Judith, if it will please you to tell me where she lives.'

'The Countess Judith, lady, is no longer in St. Omer. Since her husband's death she lives with her mother at Bruges.'

The lady made a gesture of disappointment.

'It were best for you, therefore, to accept my hospitality, till such time as I can send you and your ladies on to Bruges.'

¹ For Gyda's coming to St. Omer that year, see Ordericus Vitalis.

'I must first know who it is who offers me hospitality'

This was said so proudly, that Hereward answered proudly enough in return—

'I am Hereward Leofricsson, whom his foes call Hereward the outlaw, and his friends, Hereward the master of knights.'

She started, and throw her veil back, looking intently at him. He, for his part, gave but one glance and then cried—

'Mother of heaven! You are the great countess!'

'Yes, I was that woman once, if all be not a dream. I am now I know not what, seeking hospitality—If I can believe my eyes and ears—of Godiva's son.'

'And from Godiva's son you shall have it, as though you were Godiva's self. God so deal with my mother, madam, as I will deal with you.'

'His father's wit, and his mother's beauty' and the great countess, looking upon him 'Too, too like my own lost Harold!'

'Not so, my lady. I am a dwarf compared to him.' And Hereward led the garron on by the bridle, keeping his cap in hand, while all wondered who the dame could be, before whom Hereward the champion would so abase himself.

'Leofric's son does me too much honour. He is forgotten, in his chivalry that I am Godwin's widow.'

'I have not forgotten that you are Sprakaleg's daughter and niece of Canute, king of kings! Neither have I forgotten that you are an English lady, in times in which all English folk are one, and all old English feuds are wiped away.'

'In English blood. Ah! If these last words of yours were true, as you, perhaps, might make them true, England might be saved even yet.'

'Saved?'

'If there were one man in it who cared for aught but himself.'

Hereward was silent and thoughtful.

He had sent Martin back to his house to tell Torfrida to prepare bath and food, for the Countess Gyda, with all her train, was coming to be her guest. And when they entered the court, Torfrida stood ready.

'Is this your lady?' asked Gyda, as Hereward lifted her from her horse.

'I am his lady and your servant,' said Torfrida, bowing.

'Child! child! Bow not to me. Talk not of servants to a wretched slave, who only longs to crawl into some hole and die, forgetting all she was and all she had.'

And the great countess reeled with weariness and woe, and fell upon Torfrida's neck.

A tall veiled lady next her helped to support her, and between them they almost carried her through the hall, and into Torfrida's best guest-chamber.

And there they gave her wine, and comforted her, and let her weep awhile in peace.

The second lady had unveiled herself, display-

1 See note at end of this chapter

ing a beauty which was still brilliant, in spite of sorrow, hunger, the stains of travel, and more than forty years of life.

'She must be Gunhilda,' guessed Torfrida to herself, and not amiss.

She offered Gyda a bath, which she accepted eagerly, like a true Dane.

'I have not washed for weeks. Not since we sat starving on the Flat Holm there, in the Severn sea. I have become as foul as my own fortunes, and why not? It is all of a piece. Why should not beggars go unwashed?'

But when Torfrida offered Gunhilda the bath, she declined.

'I have done, lady, with such carnal vanities. What use in cleaning the body which is itself unclean, and whitening the outside of this sepulchre? If I can but cleanse my soul fit for my heavenly Bridegroom, the body may become—as it must at last—food for worms.'

She will needs enter religion, poor child,' said Gyda, 'and what wonder?'

'I have chosen the better part, and it shall not be taken from me.'

'Taken! Taken! Hark to her. She means to mock me, the proud nun, with that same "taken".'

'God forbid, mother!'

'Then why say taken, to me from whom all is taken?—Husband, sons, wealth, land, renown, power—power which I loved, wretch that I was, as well as husband and as sons. Ah! God! the girl is right. Better to rot in the convent than writhe in the world. Better never to have had, than to have had and lost.'

'Amen!' said Gunhilda. 'Blessed are the barren, and they that never gave suck,' saith the Lord.'

'No! Not so!' cried Torfrida. 'Better, countess, to have had and lost, than never to have had at all. The glutton was right, swine as he was, when he said that not even heaven could take from him the dinners he had eaten. How much more we, if we say, not even heaven can take from us the love wherewith we have loved? Will not our souls be richer thereby through all eternity?'

'In purgatory?' asked Gunhilda.

'In purgatory, or where else you will. I love my love, and though my love prove false, he has been true, though he trample me under foot, he has held me in his bosom, though he kill me, he has lived for me. Better to have been his but for one day than never to have been his at all. What I have had will still be mine, when that which I have shall fail me.'

'And you would buy short joy with lasting woe?'

'That would I, like a brave man's child. I say—the present is mine, and I will enjoy it as greedily as a child. Let the morrow take thought for the things of itself—Countess, your bath is ready.'

Nineteen years after, when the great conqueror lay, tossing with agony and remorse, upon his dying bed, haunted by the ghosts of his victims, the clerks of St. Saviour's in Bruges city were putting up a leaden tablet (which remains, they say, unto this very day) to the memory of one whose gentle soul had gently passed away 'Charitable to the poor, kind and agreeable to her attendants, courteous to strangers, and only severe to herself,' Gunhilda had lingered on in a world of war and crime, and had gone, it may be, to meet Torfrida beyond the grave, and there finish their doubtful argument.

The countess was served with food in Torfrida's chamber. Hereward and his wife refused to sit, and waited on her standing.

'I wish to show these saucy Flemings,' said he, 'that an English princess is a princess still in the eyes of one more nobly born than any of them.'

But after she had eaten, she made Torfrida sit before her on the bed, and Hereward likewise, and began to talk, eagerly, as one who had not unburdened her mind for many weeks, and eloquently too, as became Sprakalæg's daughter and Godwin's wife.

She told them how she had fled from the storm of Exeter, with a troop of women who dreaded the brutalities of the Normans.¹ How they had wandered up through Devon, found fishers' boats at Watchet in Somersetshire, and gone off to the little desert island of the Flat Holm, in hopes of there meeting with the Irish fleet which her sons Edmund and Godwin were bringing against the West of England. How the fleet had never come, and they had starved for many days, and how she had bribed a passing merchantman to take her and her wretched train to the land of Haldwin the Debonair, who might have pity on her for the sake of his daughter Judith, and Tosti her husband, who died in his sins.

And at his name her tears began to flow afresh fallen in his overweening pride—like Sweyn, like Harold, like herself—

'The time was, when I would not weep. If I could, I would not. For a year, lady, after Senlac, I sat like a stone. I hardened my heart like a wall of brass against God and man. Then, there upon the Flat Holm, feeding on shell fish, listening to the wail of the sea fowl, looking outside across the wan water for the sails which never came, my heart broke down a moment. And I heard a voice crying, "There is no help in man, go thou to God." And I answered—That were a beggar's trick, to go to God in need when I went not to Him in plenty. No. Without God I planned, and without Him I must fail. Without Him I went into the battle, and without Him I must hide the brunt. And at best—Can he give me back my sons? And I hardened my heart again like a stone, and shed no tear till I saw your fair face this day.'

¹ To do William justice, he would not allow his men to enter the city while they were bloodhot, and so prevented, as far as he could, the excesses which Gyda had feared.

'And now,' she said, turning sharply on Hereward, 'what do you do here? Do you not know that your nephews' lands are parted between grooms from Angers and scullions from Normandy?'

'So much the worse for both them and the grooms.'

'Sir?'

'You forget, lady, that I am an outlaw.'

'But do you not know that your mother's lands are seized likewise?'

'She will take refuge with her grandsons, who are, as I hear, again on good terms with their new master, showing thereby a most laudable and Christian spirit of forgiveness.'

'On good terms? Do you not know, then, that they are fighting again, outlaws, and desperate at the Frenchman's treachery? Do you not know that they have been driven out of York, after defending the city street by street, house by house? Do you not know that there is not an old man nor a child in arms left in York, and that your nephews, and the few fighting men who were left, went down the Humber in boats, and north to Scotland, to Gospatric and Waltheof? Do you not know that your mother is left alone—at Bourne, or God knows where—to endure at the hands of Norman ruffians what thousands more endure?'

Hereward made no answer, but played with his dagger.

'And do you know that England is ready to burst into a blaze if there be one man wise enough to put the live coal into the right place? That Sweyn Ulfson my nephew, or Asbiorn his brother, will surely land there within the year with a mighty host? And that if there be one man in England of wit enough, and knowledge enough of war, to lead the armies of England, the Frenchman may be driven into the sea—is there any here who understands English?'

None but ourselves.'

'And Canute's nephew sit on Canute's throne?'

Hereward still played with his dagger.

'Not the sons of Harold, then?' asked he after a while.

'Never! I promise you that—I, Countess Gyda, then grandmother.'

'Why promise me, of all men, O great lady?'

'Because—I will tell you after. But this I say, my curse on the grandson of mine who shall try to seize that fatal crown, which cost the life of my fairest, my noblest, my wisest, my bravest!'

Hereward bowed his head, as if consenting to the praise of Harold. But he knew who spoke, and he was thinking within himself 'Her curse may be on him who shall seize, and yet not on him to whom it is given.'

'All that they, young and unskilful lads, have a right to ask is, their father's earldoms and their father's lands. Edwin and Morcar would keep their earldoms as of right. It is a pity that there is no lady of the house of Godwin, whom we could honour by offering her to one of your nephews, in return for their nobleness in giving Aldytha to my Harold. But this foolish girl here refuses to wed—'

'And is past forty,' thought Hereward to himself.

'However, some plan to join the families more closely together might be thought on. One of the young earls might marry Judith here. Waltheof would have Northumbria, in right of his father, and ought to be well content—for although she is somewhat older than he, she is peerlessly beautiful—to marry your niece Aldytha.'

'And Gospatric?'

'Gospatric,' she said, with a half-smile, 'will be as sure, as he is able, to get something worth having for himself out of any medley. Let him have Scotch Northumbria, if he claim it. He is more English than Dane: he will keep those northern English more true to us.'

'But what of Sweyn's gallant holders and housecarles, who are to help to do this mighty deed?'

'Senlac left gaps enough among the noblemen of the South, which they can fill up, in the place of the French scum who now riot over Wessex. And if that should suffice, what higher honour for me, or for my daughter the Queen, than to devote our lands to the heroes who have won them back for us?'

Hereward hoped inwardly that Gyda would be as good as her word, for her greedy grasp had gathered to itself, before the battle of Hastings, no less than six-and-thirty thousand acres of good English soil.

'I have always heard,' said he, bowing, 'that if the Lady Gyda had been born a man, England would have had another all-seeing and all-daring statesman, and Earl Godwin a rival, instead of a helpmate. Now I believe what I have heard.'

But Torfrida looked sadly at the Countess. There was something pitiable in the sight of a woman ruined, bereaved, seemingly hopeless, partitioning out the very land from which she was a fugitive, unable to restrain the passion for intrigue which had been the toil and the bane of her sad and splendid life.

'And now,' she went on, 'surely some kind saint brought me, even on my first landing, to you of all living men.'

'Doubtless the blessed St. Bertin, beneath whose shadow we repose here in peace,' said Hereward somewhat dryly.

'I will go barefoot to his altar to-morrow, and offer my last jewel,' said Gunhilda.

'You,' said Gyda, without noticing her daughter, 'are above all men the man who is needed.' And she began praising Hereward's valetur, his fame, his eloquence, his skill as a general and engineer, and when he suggested, smiling, that he was an exile and an outlaw, she insisted that he was all the fitter from that very fact. He had no enemies among the nobles. He had been mixed up in none of the civil wars and blood feuds of the last fifteen years. He was known only as that which he was, the ablest English captain of his day—the only man who could cope with William, the only man whom all parties in England would alike obey.

And so with flattery as well as with truth, she persuaded, if not Hereward, at least Torfrida, that he was the man destined to free England once more, and that an earldom—or anything which he chose to ask—would be the sure reward of his assistance.

'Torfrida,' said Hereward that night, 'kiss me well, for you will not kiss me again for a while.'

'What?'

'I am going to England to-morrow.'

'Alone?'

'Alone. I and Martin to spy out the land, and a dozen or so of housecarles to take care of the ship in harbour.'

'But you have promised to fight the Viscount of Pinkney.'

'I will be back again in time for him. Not a word—I must go to England, or go mad.'

'But Countess Gyda? Who will squire her to Bruges?'

'You and the rest of my men. You must tell her all. She has a woman's heart, and will understand. And tell Baldwin I shall be back within the month, if I am alive on land or water.'

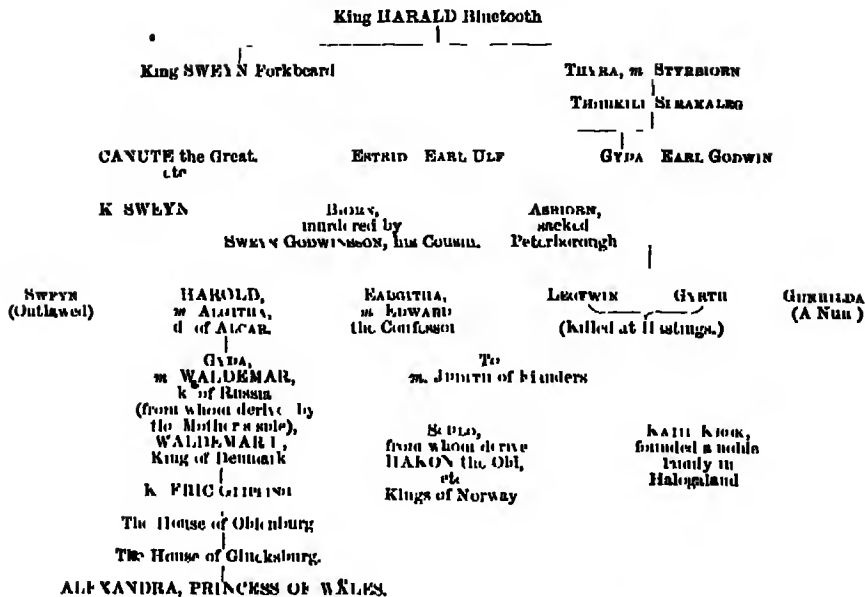

'Hereward, Hereward, the French will kill you!'

'Not while I have your armour on. Peace, little fool! Are you actually afraid for Hereward at last?'

'Oh, heaven's! when am I not afraid for you?' and she cried herself to sleep upon his bosom. But she knew that it was the right, and knightly, and Christian thing to do.

Two days after, a longship ran out of the Aa, and sailed away north.

NOTE.—I give so much of the pedigree of the Countess Gyda as may serve to explain her connection with the Royal House of Denmark.

Langsak (in his Scythianum Breve Danicum) tries ingeniously enough to rationalise the mythic pedigree of Earl Siward Dugre, by making the Fairy Bear identical with Steyrnorn, Spratling his son with Thorkil Sprakelag, and Bjorn Bearsson, father of Siward, a brother of Earl Ulf and Countess Gylfa. But if so, Ulf and Gylfa would have been notoriously of the House of the Bear, and famous, like Edward for their pointed ears. Besides, Siward would thus have been the nephew of Countess Gylfa and Earl Godwin, a fact which is mentioned by no chronicler, and which is inadmissible on account of Siward's age. His pedigree is altogether mythical, and best left in the fairyland whence it sprang.

CHAPTER XIX

NOW HERWARD CLARIFIED MIND OF FRANKLIN-MEN

It may have been well a week after that Hereward came from the direction of Boston, with Martin running at his heels.

As Hereward rode along the summer wold the summer sun sank low, till just before it went down he came to an island of small enclosed fields, high hanks, elm trees, and a farm inside, one of those most ancient holdings of the Southern and Eastern Counties, still to be distinguished, by their huge hanks and dykes full of hedgerow timber, from the more modern corn lands outside, which were in Hereward's time mostly common pasture-land or rough fen.

This should he Azerdun, said he, 'and there inside, as I live, stands Awer getting in his crops. But who has he with him?'

With the old man were some half-dozen men of his own rank, some helping the serfs with might and main, one or two standing on the top of the hanks, as if on the look-out, but all armed cap-a-pie.

'His friends are helping him to get them in,' quoth Martin, 'for fear of the rascally Frenchmen. A pleasant and peaceable country we have come back to.'

'And a very strong fortress are they holding,' said Hereward, 'against either French horsemen or French arrows. How to dislodge those six fellows without six times their number, I do not see. It is well to recollect that.'

And so he did, and turned to use again and again, in after years, the strategic capabilities of an old-fashioned English farm.

Hereward spurred his horse up to the nearest gate, and was instantly confronted by a little hair-haired man, as broad as he was tall, who heaved up a long twybill, or double axe, and bade him, across the gate, go to a certain place.

'Little Winter, little Winter, my chuck, my darling, my mad fellow, my brother-in-arms, my brother in robbery and murder, are you grown so honest in your old age that you will not know little Hereward the wolf's head?'

'Hereward!' shrieked the doughty little man. 'I took you for an accursed Norman in those onthuntish clothes,' and lifting up no little voice, he shouted—

'Hereward is back, and Martin Lightfoot at his heels!'

The gate was thrown open, and Hereward all but pulled off his horse. He was clapped on the back, turned round and round, admired from head to foot, shouted at by old companions of his boyhood, naughty young, hot-blooded of his old troop, now settled down into honest thriving yeomen, hard working and hard fighting, who had heard again and again, with pride, his doughty doings over sea. There was Winter, and Gwenoch, and Gery, Hereward's cousin—ancestor, it may be, of the ancient and honourable house of that name, and of those parts, and Dnti and Onti, the two valiant twins, and Ulfard the White, and others, some of whose names and those of their sons, still stand in Domesday-book.

'And what,' asked Hereward, after the first congratulations were over, 'of my mother? What of the folk at Bourne?'

All looked each at the other, and were silent.

'You are too late, young lord,' said Aze.

'Too late!'

'The Frenchman has given it to a man of Gilbert of Ghent's—his butler, groom, cook, for aught I know.'

'To Gilbert's man? And my mother?'

'God help your mother, and your young brother too! She fled to Bourne a while ago out of Shropshire. All her lands in those parts are given away to Frenchmen. Even Coventry minster was not safe for her, so hither she came; but even here the French villains have found her out. Three days ago some five-and-twenty French marched into the place.'

'And you did not stop them?'

'Young sir, who are we to stop an army? We have enough to keep our own. Gilbert, let alone the villain Ivo at Spalding, can send a hundred men down on us in four-and-twenty hours.'

'Then I,' said Hereward in a voice of thunder, 'will hnd the way to send two hundred down on him,' and turning his horse from the gate, he rode away furiously towards Bourne.

He turned back as suddenly, and galloped into the field.

'Lads! old comrades! will you stand by me if I need you? Will you follow Tho Wake, as hundreds have followed him already, if he will only go before?'

'We will, we will.'

'I shall be back ere morning. What you have to do, I will tell you then.'

'Stop and eat—but for a quarter of an hour.'

Then Hereward swore a great oath, by oak and ash and thorn, that he would neither eat bread nor drink water while there was a Norman left in Bourne.

'A little ale, then, if no water,' said Aze.

Hereward laughed, and rode away.

'You will not go single-handed against all those ruffians?' shouted the old man after him. 'Saddle, lads, and go with him, some of you, for very shame's sake.'

But when they galloped after Hereward, he sent them back. He did not know yet, he said, what he would do. Better that they should gather their forces, and see what men they could afford him, in case of open battle. And he rode swiftly on.

When he came within the lands of Bourne it was dark.

'So much the better,' thought Hereward. 'I have no wish to see the old place till I have somewhat cleaned it out.'

He rode slowly into the long street between the overhanging gables, past the crossways, and along the Water-gang and the high earth-banks of his ancient home. Above them he could see the great hall, its narrow windows all ablaze with light. With a bitter growl he turned back, trying to recollect a house where he could safely lodge. Martin pointed one out.

'Old Viking Surturbrand, the housecarle, did live there and maybe lives there still.'

'We will try,' and Martin knocked at the door.

The wicket was opened, but not the door, and through the wicket window a surly vinn asked who was there.

'Who lives here?'

'Pery, son of Surturbrand. Who art thou who askest?'

'An honest gentleman and his servant, looking for a night's lodging.'

'This is no place for honest folk.'

'As for that, we don't wish to be more honest than you would have us, but lodging we will pay for, freely and well.'

'We want none of thy money,' and the wicket was shut.

Martin pulled out his axe, and drove the panel in.

'What art doing? We shall rouse the town,' said Hereward.

'Let be, these are no French, but honest English, who like one all the better for a little horse-play.'

'What didst do that for?' asked the surly voice again. 'Were it not for those rascal Frenchmen up above, I would come out and spilt thy skull for thee.'

'If there be Frenchmen up above said Martin, in a voice of feigned terror, 'take us in for the love of the Virgin and all saints, or murdered we shall be ere morning light.'

'Thou hast no call to stay in the town, man, unless thou like.'

Hereward rode close to the wicket, and said in a low voice, 'I am a nobleman of Flanders, good sir, and a sworn foe to all French. My horse is weary, and cannot make a step forward, and if thou be a Christian man, thou wilt take me in and let me go off safe ere morning light.'

'From Flanders?' And the man turned and seemed to consult those within. At length the door was slowly opened, and Pery appeared, his double axe over his shoulder.

'If thou be from Flanders come in in God's name, but be quick, ere those Frenchmen get wind of thee.'

Hereward went in. Five or six men were standing round the long table, upon which they had just laid down their double axes and javelins. More than one countenance Hereward recognised at once. Over the peat fire sat a very old man, his hands upon his knees, as he warmed his bare feet at the embers. He started up at the noise, and Hereward saw at once that it was old Surturbrand, and that he was blind.

'Who is it? Is Hereward come?' asked he, with the dull dreamy voice of age.

'Not Hereward, father,' said some one, 'but a knight from Flanders.'

The old man dropped his head upon his breast again with a querulous whine, while Hereward's heart beat high at hearing his own name. At all events he was among friends, and approaching the table he unbuckled his sword and laid it down among the other weapons. 'At least,' said he, 'I shall have no need of thee as long as I am here among honest men.'

'What shall I do with my master's horse?' asked Martin. 'He can't stand in the street to be stolen by drunken French horseboys.'

'Bring him in at the front door, and out at the back,' said Pery. 'Fine tunes these when a man dare not open his own yard gate.'

'You seem to be all besieged here,' said Hereward. 'How is this?'

'Besieged we are,' said the man, and then, partly to turn the subject off, 'Will it please you to eat, noble sir?'

Hereward declined, he had a vow, he said, not to eat or drink but once a day, till he had fulfilled a quest whereon he was bound. His hosts eyed him, not without some lingering suspicion, but still with admiration and respect. His splendid armour and weapons, as well as the golden locks which fell far below his shoulders and conveniently hid a face which he did not wish yet to have recognised, showed him to be a man of the highest rank, while the palm of his small hand, as hard and bony as any woodman's, proclaimed him to be no novice of a fighting man. The strong Flemish accent which both he and Martin Lightfoot had assumed prevented the honest Englishmen from piercing his disguise. They watched him, while he in turn watched them, struck by their uneasy looks and eulenic silence.

'We are a dull company,' said he after a while, courteously enough. 'We used to be told in Flanders that there were none such stout drinkers and none such jolly singers as you gallant men of the Danelagh here.'

'Dull times make dull company,' said one, 'and no offence to you, sir knight.'

'Are you such a stranger,' asked Pery, 'that you do not know what has happened in this town during the last three days?'

'No good, I will warrant, if you have Frenchmen in it.'

'Why was not Hereward here?' wailed the old man in the corner. 'It never would have happened if he had been in the town.'

'What?' asked Hereward, trying to command himself.

'What has happened,' said Pery, 'makes a free Englishman's blood boil to tell of. Here, sir knight, three days ago, comes in this Frenchman with some twenty ruffians of his own, and more of one Taillebois, too, to see him safe; says that this new king, this base-born Frenchman, has given away all Earl Morcar's lands, and that Bourne is his, kills a man or two, upsets the women; gets drunk, ruffles and roysters, breaks into my lady's bower, calling her to give up her keys, and when she gives them, will have all her jewels too. She faces the rogues like a brave princess, and two of the hounds lay hold of her, and say that she shall ride through Bourne as she rode through Coventry. The boy Godwin—he that was the great earl's godson, our last hope, the last of our house—draws sword on them, and he, a boy of sixteen summers, kills them both out of hand. The rest set on him, cut his head off, and there it sticks on the gable spike of the hall to this hour. And do you ask, after that, why free Englishmen are dull company?'

'And our turn will come next,' growled some one. 'The turn will go all round, no man's life or land, wife or daughters, will be safe soon for these accursed Frenchmen, unless, as the old man says, Hereward comes back.'

Once again the old man wailed out of the chimney-corner. 'Why did they ever send Hereward away? I warned the good earl, I warned my good lady, many a time, to let him sow his wild oats and be done with them, or they might need him some day when they could not find him. He was a lad! He was a lad!' and again he winned, and sank into silence.

Hereward heard all this dry-eyed, hardening his heart into a great resolve.

'This is a dark story,' said he calmly, 'and it would behove me as a gentleman to succour this distressed lady, did I but know how. Tell me what I can do now, and I will do it.'

'Your health!' cried one. 'You speak like a true knight.'

'And he looks the man to keep his word, I'll warrant him,' spoke another.

'He does,' said Pery, shaking his head. 'Nevertheless, if anything could have been done, sir, be sure we would have done it. But all our armed men are scattered up and down the country, each taking care, as is natural, of his own cattle and his own women. There are not ten men-at-arms in Bourne this night, and what is worse, sir, as you may guess, who seem to have known war as well as I, there is no man to lead them.'

Here Hereward was on the point of saying, 'And what if I led you?'—on the point, too, of discovering himself, but he stopped short.

Was it fair to involve this little knot of gallant fellows in what might be a hopeless struggle, and to have all Bourne burned over their heads ere morning by the ruffian Frenchmen? No, his mother's quarrel was his own private quarrel. He would go alone and see the strength of the enemy; and after that, may be, he would raise the country on them or—and half a dozen plans suggested themselves to his crafty brain as he sat brooding and scheming, then, as always, utterly self-confident.

He was startled by a burst of noise outside—music, laughter, and shouts.

'There,' said Pery bitterly, 'are those Frenchmen, dancing and singing in the hall, with my Lord Godwin's head above them!' And curses bitter and deep went round the room. They sat sullen and silent it may be for an hour or more only moving when, at some fresh outbreak of revelry, the old man started from his doze and asked if that was Hereward coming.

'And who is this Hereward of whom you speak?' said Hereward at last.

'We thought you might know him, sir knight, if you come from Flanders, as you say you do,' said three or four voices in a surprised and sunny tone.

'Certainly I know such a man, if he be Hereward the wolf's head, Hereward the outlaw, Hereward the Wake, as they call him. And a good soldier he is, though he be not yet made a knight, and married, too, to a rich and fair lady. I served under this Hereward a few months ago in the Zealand war, and know no man whom I would sooner follow.'

'Nor I either,' chimed in Martin Iaghtfoot from the other end of the table.

'Nor we,' cried all the men-at-arms at once, each vying with the other in extravagant stories of their hero's prowess, and in asking the knight of Flanders whether they were true or not.

To avoid offending them, Hereward was forced to confess to a great many deeds which he had never done but he was right glad to find that his fame had reached his native place, and that he could count on the men if he needed them.

'But who is this Hereward,' said he, 'that he should have to do with your town here?'

Half a dozen voices at once told him his own story.

'I always heard,' said he drily, 'that that gentleman was of some very noble kin, and I will surely tell him all that has befallen here as soon as I return to Flanders.'

At last they grew sleepy. The men went out and brought in bundles of sweet sedge, spread them against the wall, and prepared to lie down, each with his weapon by his side. But when they were lain down, Hereward beckoned to him Pery and Martin Iaghtfoot, and went out into the back yard, under the pretence of seeing to his horse.

'Pery Surturbrandsson,' said he, 'thou seemest to be an honest man, as we in foreign parts hold all the Danelagh folk to be. Now it is fixed in my mind to go up, and my servant with me, to yon hall, and see what those French upstarts are about. Wilt thou trust me to go, without my fleeing back here if I am found out, or in any way bringing thee to harm by mixing thee up in my private matters? And wilt thou, if I do not come back, keep for thine own the horse which is in thy stable, and give moreover this purse and this ring to thy lady, if thou canst find means to see her face to face, and say thus to her—that he that sent that purse and ring may be found, if he be alive, at St. Omer, or with Baldwin, Marquis of Flanders, and that if he be dead (as he is like enough to be, his trade being nought but war) she will still find at St. Omer a home and wealth and friends, till these evil times be overpast?'

As Hereward had spoken with some slight emotion, he had dropped unawares his assumed Flemish accent, and had spoken in broad burly Lincolnshire, and therefore it was that Pery, who had been staring at him by the moonlight all the while, said, when he was done, tremblingly—

'Either you are Hereward, or you are his double-ganger. You speak like Hereward, you look like Hereward. Just what Hereward would be now, you are. You are my lord, whom men call Wake, and you cannot deny it.'

'Pery, if thou knowest me, speak of me to no living soul, save to thy lady my mother, and let me and my serving-man go free out of thy yard gate. If I ask thee before morning to open it again to me, thou wilt know that there is not a Frenchman left in the Hall of Bourne.'

Pery threw his arms round him, and embraced him silently.

'Get me only,' said Hereward, 'some long woman's gown and black mantle; if thou canst, to cover this bright armour of mine.'

Pery went off in silence as one stunned, brought the mantle, and let them out of the yard gate. In ten minutes more, the two had waded the Water-gang, scrambled the dyke and its palisade, and stood under the gable of the great hall. Not a soul was stirring outside. The serfs were all cowering in their huts like so many rabbits in their burrows, listening in fear to the revelry of their new tyrants. The night was dark but not so dark that Hereward could not see between him and the sky his brother's long locks floating in the breeze.

'That I must have down, at least,' said he, in a low voice.

'Then here is wherewithal,' said Martin Iaghtfoot, as he stumbled over something. 'The drunken villains have left the ladder in the yard.'

Hereward raised the ladder, took down the head, and wrapped it in the cloak, and ere he did so, he kissed the cold forehead. How he had hated that boy! Well, at least he had never wilfully harmed him—or the boy him either, for that matter. And now he had died like a man, killing his foe. He was of the true old blood after all. And Hereward felt that he would have given all that he had, save his wife or his sword-hand, to have that boy alive again, to pet him, and train him, and teach him to fight at his side.

Then he slipped round to one of the narrow unshuttered windows and looked in. The hall was in a wasteful blaze of light, a whole month's candles burning in one night. The table was covered with all his father's choicest plate, the wine was running waste upon the floor; the men were lolling at the table in every stage of drunkenness, the loose women, camp-followers, and suchlike, were almost as drunk as their masters and at the table-head, most drunk of all, sat, in Earl Leofric's seat, the new Lord of Bourne.

Hereward could scarce believe his eyes. He was none other than Gilbert of Ghout's stout Flemish cook, whom he had seen many a time in Scotland. Hereward turned from the window in disgust but looked again as he heard words which roused his wrath still more.

For in the open space nearest the door stood a gleeman, a dancing, harping, foul-mouthed fellow, who was showing off ape's tricks, jesting against the English short coats—a continual source of merriment among the long-robed French—and shuffling about in mockeries of English dancing. At some particularly coarse jest of his the new Lord of Bourne burst into a roar of admiration.

'Ask what thou wilt, fellow, and thou shalt have it. Thou wilt find me a better master to thee than ever was Morcar, the English barbarian.'

The scoundrel, say the old chronicles, made a request concerning Hereward's family which cannot be printed here.

Hereward ground his teeth. 'If thou livest till morning light,' said he, 'I will not.'

The last brutality awoke some better feeling in one of the girls—a large coarse Fleming, who sat by the new lord's side. 'Fino words,' said she, scornfully enough 'for the sweepings of Norman and Flemish kennels. You forget that you left one of this very Leofric's sons behind in Flanders, who would beason you all out if he was here before the morning's dawn.'

'Hereward!' cried the cook, striking her down with a drunken blow, 'the scoundrel who stole the money which the Frisians sent to Count Baldwin, and gave it to his own troops? We are safe enough from him at all events, he dare not show his face on this side the Alps for fear of the gallows.'

Hereward had heard enough. He slipped down from the window to Martin, and led him round the house.

'Now then, down with thy ladder quick, and dash in the door. I go in stay thou outside. If any man passes me, see that he pass not thee.'

Martin chuckled a ghostly laugh as he helped the ladder down. In another moment the door was burst in, and Hereward stood upon the threshold. He gave one war-shout of—A Wake! A Wake! and then rushed forward. As he passed the gleeman, he gave him one stroke across the loins, the wretch fell shrieking.

And then began a murder grim and great. They fought with ale cups, with knives, with benches but, drunken and unarmed, they were hewn down like sheep. Fifteen Normans, says the chronicle (who gives minute details of the whole scene), were in the hall when Hereward burst in. When the sun rose there were fifteen heads upon the gable. Escape had been impossible. Martin had laid the ladder across the door; and the few who escaped the master's terrible sword stumbled over it, to be brained by the man's not less terrible axe.

Then Hereward took up his brother's head, and went in to his mother.

The women in the bower opened to him. They had seen all that passed from the gallery above, which, as usual, hidden by a curtain, enabled the women to watch unseen what passed in the hall below.

The Lady Godiva sat crouched together, all but alone—for her bower-maidens had fled or been carried off long since—upon a low stool beside a long dark thing covered with a pall. So utterly crushed was she that she did not even lift her up head as Hereward entered.

He placed his ghastly burden reverently beneath the pall, and then went and knelt before his mother.

For a while neither spoke a word. Then the Lady Godiva suddenly drew back her hood, and dropping on her knees, threw her arms round Hereward's neck, and wept till she could weep no more.

'Blessed strong arms,' sobbed she at last, 'around me! To feel something left in the world to protect me, something left in the world which loves me.'

'You forgive me, mother?'

'You forgive me? It was I, I who was in fault—I, who should have cherished you, my strongest, my bravest, any noblest—now my all.'

'No, it was all my fault, and on my head is all this misery. If I had been here, as I ought to have been, all this might have never happened.'

'You would only have been murdered too. No thank God you were away, or God would have taken you with the rest. His arm is bared against me, and His face turned away from me. All in vain, in vain! Vain to have washed my hands in innocence, and worshipped Him night and day. Vain to have builded minsters to His honour, and heaped the shrines of His saints with gold. Vain to have fed the hungry, and clothed the naked, and washed the feet of His poor, that I might atone for my own sins and the sins of my house. This is His answer. He has taken me up, and dashed me down and nought is left, but, like Job, to abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes—of, I know not what—I know not what—I know not what—unless it be that poor Algar held some Church lands, I forget where they are, now, though I warned him often of them. My brains are broken, good saints. I forget—would that I could forget more—and poor Morcar held them till this ruin. Is it that, Hereward? The father takes God's lands; the son will not restore them—a dark crime—who shall atone for that?—though it is but a few acres—a few acres—after all—'

And so she sobbed on, like any child.

'We will make them up, mother, we will make them up twice over. But never say that God has deserted you. See, He has sent you me !' said Hereward, wondering to find himself, of all men on earth, preaching consolation.

'Yes, I have you ! Hold me Love me Let me feel that one thing loves me upon earth I want love, I must have it and if God and His mother, and all the saints refuse their love, I must turn to the creature, and ask it to love me, but for a day.'

'For ever, mother.'

'You will not leave me ?'

'If I do, I come back, to finish what I have begun.'

'More blood ? O God ! Hereward, not that ! Let us return good for evil Let us take up our crosses Let us bear our sin Let us humble ourselves under God's hand, and flee into some convent, and there die praying for our country and our kin.'

'Men must watch while women pray I will take you to a nunnery—to Peterborough.'

'No, not to Peterborough !—'

'But my uncle Brand is abbot there, they tell me, now this four years and that rogue Herlum prior in his place.'

'Brand is dying dying of a broken heart, like me The Frenchman has given his abbey to one Thorold, the tyrant of Malmsbury a Frenchman like himself No, take me where I shall never see a French face Take me to Crowland—and him with me—where I shall see nought but English faces, and hear English chants, and die a free Englishwoman under St. Guthlac's wings.'

'Ah !' said Hereward bitterly, 'St. Guthlac is a right Englishman, and will have some sort of fellow-feeling for us, while St. Peter, of course, is somewhat too fond of Rome and those Italian monks. Well—blood is thicker than water, so I hardly blame the blessed Apostle.'

'Do not talk so, Hereward.'

'Much the saints have done for us, mother, that we are to be so very respectful to their high mightinesses I fear that, if this French nun goes on with his plan of thrusting his monks into our abbey, I shall have to do more even for St. Guthlac than ever he did for me. Do not say more, mother This night has in Hereward a new man Now prepare' and she knew what he meant 'and gather all your treasures, and we will start for Crowland to-morrow afternoon.'

CHAPTER XX

HOW HERWARD WAS MADE A KNIGHT AFTER THE FASHION OF THE ENGLISH

A WILD night was that in Bourne All the folk, free and unfree, man and woman, were out on the streets, asking the meaning of those terrible shrieks, followed by a more terrible silence.

At last Hereward strode down from the hall, his drawn sword in his hand.

'Silence, good folks, and hearken to me, once and for all. There is not a Frenchman left alive in Bourne. If you be the men I take you for there shall not be one left alive between Warh and Humbe! Silence again !' as a fierce cry of rage and joy arose, and men rushed forward to take him by the hand, women to embrace him 'This is no time for compliments, good folks, but for quick wit and quick blows For the law we fight, if we do fight, and by the law we must work, fight or not Where is the lawman of the town ?'

'I was lawman last night, to see such law done as there is left,' said Pery 'But you are lawman now Do as you will. We will obey you.'

'You shall be our lawman,' shouted many voices.

'I ? Who am I ? Ory-of-law, and a wolf's head.'

'We will put you back into your law, we will give you your lands in full husting.'

'Never mind a husting on my behalf Let us have a husting, if we have one, for a better end and a bigger than that Now, men of Bourne, I have put the coal in the bush Dare you blow the fire till the forest is aflame from south to north ? I have fought a dozen of Frenchmen Dare you fight Taillebois and Gilbert of Ghent, with William Duke of Normandy at their back ? Or will you take me, here as I stand, and give me up to them as an outlaw and a robber, to feed the crows outside the gates of Lincoln ? Do it, if you will It will be the wisest plan, my friends Give me up to be judged and hanged, and so purge yourselves of the villainous murder of Gilbert's cook your late lord and master.'

'Lord and master ?' 'We are free men !' shouted the holders, or yeomen gentlemen 'We hold our lands from God and the sun.'

'You are our lord,' shouted the sermen or tenants 'Who but you ? We will follow, if you will lead.'

'Hereward is come home !' cried a feeble voice behind 'Let me come to him Let me feel him.'

And through the crowd, supported by two ladies, tottered the mighty form of Snoturbrand the blind Viking.

'Hereward is come,' cried he, as he told his master's son in his arms 'Ahoi ! he is wet with blood ! Ahoi ! he smells of blood ! Ahoi ! the ravens will grow fat now, for Hereward is come home !'

Some would have led the old man away but he thrust them off fiercely.

'Ahoi ! come well ! Ahoi ! come kites ! Ahoi ! come come from off the fen !' You followed us, and we feel you well, when Swend Forkbeard brought us over the sea Follow us now, and we will feel you better still, with the mongrel Frenchers who scoff at the tongue of their forefathers, and would rob their nearest kinsman of land and lass. Ahoi ! Swend's men ! Ahoi ! Canute's men ! Vikings' sons, sea-cocks' sons, Berserkers' sons all ! Split up the war-arrow, and send it round and the curse of Odin on every man that will not pass it on! A war-king to-morrow, and Hildar's game next day, that the old Surturbrand may fall like a free holder, axe in hand, and not die like a cow in the straw which the Frenchman has spared him!

All men were silent, as the old Viking's voice, cracked and feeble when he began, gathered strength from rage, till it rang through the still night air like a trumpet blast.

The silence was broken by a long wild cry from the forest, which made the women start, and catch their children closer to them. It was the howl of a wolf.

'Hark to the witch's horse! Hark to the son of Feura, how he calls for meat! Are ye your father's sons, ye men of Bourne! They never let the gray beast call in vain.'

Hereward saw his opportunity, and seized it. He well knew that there were those in the crowd, as there must needs be in all crowds, who wished themselves well out of the business, who shrank from the thought of facing the Norman barons, much more the Norman king, who were ready enough, had the tide of feeling begun to ebb, to blame Hereward for rashness, even though they might not have gone so far as to give him up to the Normans, who would have advised some sort of compromise, pacifying half-measure, or other weak plan for escaping present danger by future destruction. But three out of four there were good men and true. The savage chant of the old barbarian might have startled them somewhat, for they were tolerably orthodox Christian folk. But there was sense, as well as spirit, in his savagery, and they growled applause as he ceased. Hereward heard, and cried:

'The Viking is right! So speaks the spirit of our fathers, and we must show ourselves their true sons. Send round the war-arrow, and death to the man who does not pass it on! Better die bravely together than falter and part company, to be hunted down one by one by men who will never forgive us as long as we have an acre of land for them to seize. Pery, son of Surturbrand, you are the lawman. Put it to the vote!'

'Send round the war-arrow,' shouted Pery himself, and if there was a man or two who shrank from the proposal, they found it prudent to shout as loudly as did the rest.

Ere the morning light the war-arrow was split into four splinters, and carried out to the four airks, through all Kesteven. If the splinters were put into the house-father's hand he must send it on at once to the next freeman's house. If he were away, it was stuck into his house-door, or into his great chair by the fireside, and woe to him if, on his return, he sent it not on likewise. All through Kesteven went that night the arrow-splinters, and with them the whisper, 'The Wake is come again', till, before mid-day, there were fifty well-armed men in the old camping-field outside the town, and Hereward haranguing them in words of fire.

A chill came over them, nevertheless, when he told them that he must at once return to Flanders.

'But it must be,' he said. He had promised his good lord and sovereign, Baldwin of Flanders, and his word of honour he must keep. Two visits he must pay ere he went, and then to sea. 'But within the year, if he were alive on ground, he would return, and with him ships and men, it might be with Sweyn and all the power of Denmark. Only let them hold their own till the Dunes should come, and all would be well. So would they show that they were free Englishmen, able to hold England against Frenchmen and all strangers. And whenever he came back he would set a light to Tuft, Manthorpe, and Withan-on-the-hill. They were his own farms, or should have been, and better they should burn than Frenchmen hold them. They could be seen far and wide over the Bruneswold and over all the fen, and then all men might know for sure that the Wake was come again.'

'And nine-and-forty of them,' says the chronicler, 'he chose to guard Bourne' (securingly the lands which had been his nephew Morcar's) till he should come back and take them for himself. His own lands of Withan, Toft, and Manthorpe, Gely his cousin should hold till his return, and they should send what they could off them to Lady Godiva at Crowland.

Then they went down to the water and took burge, and laid the corpse therein, and Godiva and Hereward sat at the dead lad's head, and Winter steered the boat and Gwenoch took the stroke-oar.

And they rowed away for Crowland, by many a mere and many an ea, through narrow reaches of clear brown glassy water, between the dark-green alders, between the pale green reeds, where the coot clanked, and the bittern boomed, and the sedge-lark, not content with its own sweet song, mocked the notes of all the birds around, and then out into the broad lagoons, where hung motionless, high over head, hawk beyond hawk, buzzard beyond buzzard, kite beyond kite, as far as eye could see. Into the air, as they rowed on, whirled up great skeins of wild fowl innumerable, with a cry as of all the bells of Crowland, or all the hounds of the Bruneswold while clear above all then noise sounded the wild whistle of the curlew, and the trumpet note of the great white swan. Out of the reeds, like an arrow, shot the peregrine, singled one luckless mallard from the flock, caught him up, struck him stone dead with one blow of his terrible heel, and swept his prey with him into the reeds again.

'Death! death! death!' said Lady Godiva, as the feathers fluttered down into the boat and rested on the dead boy's pall. 'War among man and beast, war on earth, war in air, war in the water beneath,' as a great pike rolled at his bait, sending a shuddering white fish flying along the surface. 'And war, says holy writ, in heaven above. O Thou who didst die to destroy death, when will it all be over ?'

And thus they glided on from stream to stream, until they came to the sacred isle of 'the inheritance of the Lord, the soil of St Mary and St. Bartholomew, the most holy sanctuary of St. Guthlac and his monks, the minster most free from worldly servitude, the special almahouse of the most illustrious kings, the sole place of refuge for any one in all tribulations; the perpetual abode of the saints, the possession of religious men, especially set apart by the Common Council of the kingdom, by reason of the frequent miracles of the most holy Confessor, an ever-fructful mother of camphire in the vineyards of Engedi, and by reason of the privileges granted by the kings, a city of grace and safety to all who repent.'

As they drew near, they passed every minute some fisher's log canoe, in which worked with net or line the criminal who had saved his life by fleeing to St. Guthlac, and becoming his man northwith, the slave who had fled from his master's cruelty, and here and there in those evil days, the master who had fled from the cruelty of Frenchmen, who would have done to him as he had done to others. But there all old grudges were put away. They had sought the peace of St. Guthlac, and therefore they must keep his peace, and get their living from the fish of the five rivers, within the bounds whereof was peace, as of their own quiet streams, for the abbot and St. Guthlac were the only lords thereof, and neither summoner nor sheriff of the king, nor armed force of knight or earl, could enter there.

At last they came to Crowland minster—a vast range of high-peaked buildings, founded on piles of oak and alder driven into the fen—itself built almost entirely of timber from the Bruneswold, barns, granaries, stables, workshops, strangers' hall, fit for the boundless hospitality of Crowland, infirmary, refectory, dormitory, library, abbot's lodgings, cloisters, with the great minster towering up, a steep pile, half wood, half stone, with narrow round-headed windows, and leaden roofs, and, above all, the great wooden tower, from which on high days chimed out the melody of the seven famous bells, which had not their like in English land. Guthlac, Bartholomew, and Bettelm were the names of the biggest, Turketul and Tatwin of the middle, and Pega and Pega of the smallest. So says Ingulf, who saw them a few years after pouring down on his own head in streams of melted metal. Outside the minster walls were the cottages of the corrodiers, or folk who, for a corrody, or life pittance from the abbey, had given away their lands,¹ beyond them again the natural park of grass, dotted with mig oaks and ashes, and beyond all those, cornlands of inexhaustible fertility, broken up by the good abbot Egelric some hundred years before, from which, in times of dearth, the monks of Crowland fed the people of all the neighbouring fens.

They went into the great courtyard. All men were quiet, yet all men were busy, baking and brewing, carpentering and tailoring, in the workshops, reading and writing in the cloister, praying and singing in the church, and teaching the children in the schoolhouse. Only the ancient scempts—some near upon a hundred and fifty years old—wandered where they would, or basked against a sunny wall, like autumn flies, each with a young monk to guide him, and listen to his tattle of old days. For, said the laws of Turketul the good—'Nothing disagreeable about the affairs of the monastery shall be mentioned in their presence. No person shall presume in any way to offend them, but with the greatest peace and tranquillity they shall await their end.'

So while the world outside raged, and fought, and conquered, and plundered, they within the holy isle kept up some sort of order, and justice, and usefulness, and love to God and man. And about the yards, among the feet of the monks, hopped the sacred ravens, descendants of those who brought back the gloves at St. Guthlac's bidding, and overhead, under all the eaves, built the sacred swallows, the descendants of those who sat and sang upon St. Guthlac's shoulders, and when men marvelled thereof, he, the holy man replied, 'Know that they who live the holy life draw nearer to the birds of the air, even as they do to the angels in heaven.'

And Lady Godiva called for old Abbot Ulfketil, the good and brave, and fell upon his neck, and told him all her tale, and Ulfketil went upon her neck, for they were old and faithful friends.

And they passed into the dark cool church, where, in the crypt under the high altar, lay the thumb of St. Bartholomew, which old Abbot Turketul used to carry about, that he might cross himself with it in times of danger, tempest, and lightning, and some of the hair of St. Mary, queen of heaven, in a box of gold, and a bone of St. Leodegar of Aquitaine, and some few remains, too, of the holy bodies of St. Guthlac, and of St. Bettelm his servant, and St. Tatwin, who steered him to Crowland, and St. Egelric his confessor, and St. Cissa the halleright and lamb's skins, and that their food should be such as the monks had. Their two servants were to fare the same as those of the brotherhood. The opinion of Alan de Morton concerning such a bargain may be guessed, at least by those who are aware that it was made for the purpose of escaping certain years of purgatory, i.e. of burning alive in the next world.

When we talk of the piety of our ancestors in giving lands to the Church, we should always remember that this was what their piety too often signified. When we complain of the squires, in Edward the Sixth's time, for taking back the treasures and lands of the monasteries, we should remember that they had been got from those squires' forefathers on such grounds as these, and no other.

anchorite, and of the most holy virgin St. Etheldreda, and many more. But little of them remained since Sigtryg and Bagmac's heathen Danes had heaped them pell-mell on the floor, and burned the church over them and the bodies of the slaughtered monks.

The plunder which was taken from Crowland on that evil day lay, and lies still, with the plunder of Peterborough and many a minster more, at the bottom of the Ouse at Huntingdon Bridge. But it had been more than replaced by the piety of the Danish kings and nobles, and above the twelve white bearskins which lay at the twelve altars blazed, in the light of many a wax candle, gold and jewels inferior only to those of Peterborough and Coventry.

And there in the nave they buried the lad Godwin, with chant and dirge, and when the funeral was done, Hereward went up toward the high altar, and hadlo Winter and Gwenoeh come with him. And there he knelt, and vowed a vow to God and St. Guthlac and the Lady Torfrida, his true love, never to leave from slaying while there was a Frenchman left alive on English ground.

And Godiva and Ulfketyl heard his vow, and shuddered, but they dared not stop him, for they too had English hearts.

And Winter and Gwenoeh heard it, and repeated it word for word.

Then he kissed his mother, and called Winter and Gwenoeh, and went forth. If he would be luck again, he said, on the third day.

Then those three went to Peterborough, and asked for Abbot Brand. And the monks let them in, for the fame of their deed had passed through the forest, and all the French had fled.

And old Brand lay back in his great armchair, his legs all muffled up in furs, for he could get no heat; and by him stood Herlun the prior, and wondered when he would die, and Thorold take his place, and they should drive out the old Gregorian chants from the choir, and have the new Norman chants of Robert of Kécamp, and bring in French-Roman customs in all things, and rule the English hours with a rod of iron.

And old Brand knew all that was in his heart, and looked up like a patient ox beneath the butcher's axe, and said, 'I have patience with me, brother Herlun, and I will die as soon as I can, and go where there is neither French nor English, Jew nor Gentile, bond nor free, but all are alike in the eyes of Him who made them.'

But when he saw Hereward come in, he cast the mufflers off him, and sprang up from his chair, and was young and strong in a moment, and for a moment.

And he threw his arms round Hereward, and wept upon his neck, as his mother had done. And Hereward wept upon his neck, though he had not wept upon his mother's.

Then Brand held him at arms' length, or thought he held him, for he was leaning on Hereward, and tottering all the while, and extolled him as the champion, the warrior, the stay of his house, the avenger of his kin, the hero of whom he had always prophesied that his kin would need him, and that then he would not fail.

But Hereward answered him modestly and mildly.

'Speak not so to me and of me, uncle Brand. I am a very foolish, vain, sinful man, who have come through great adventures, I know not how, to great and strange happiness, and now again to great and strange sorrows, and to an adventure greater and stranger than all that has befallen me from my youth up until now. Therefore make me not proud, uncle Brand, but keep me modest and lowly, as befits all true knights and penitent sinners, for they tell me that God resists the proud, and giveth grace to the humble. And I have that to do which do I cannot, unless God and His saints give me grace from this day forth.'

Brand looked at him, astonished, and then turned to Herlun.

'Did I not tell thee, prior? This is the lad whom you called graceless and a savage, and see, since he has been in foreign lands, and seen the ways of knights he talks as eloquently as a Frenchman, and as piously as any monk.'

'The Lord Hereward,' said Herlun, 'has doubtless learned much from the manners of our nation which he would not have learned in England. I rejoice to see him returned so Christian and so courtly a knight.'

'The Lord Hereward, prior Herlun, has learnt one thing in his travels—to know somewhat of men, and the hearts of men, and to deal with them as they deserve of him. They tell me that one Thorold of Malmesbury—Thorold of Kécamp, the minstrel, he that made the song of Roland, that he desires this abbey.'

'I have so heard, my lord.'

'Then I command—I Hereward, Lord of Bourne—that this abbey be held against him and all Frenchmen, in the name of Sward Ulfsson, King of England, and of me. And he that admits a Frenchman therein, I will shave his crown for him so well that he shall never need razor more. Thus I tell thee, and this I shall tell thy monks before I go. And unless you obey the same, my dream will be fulfilled, and you will see Goldenborough in a light low, and yourselves burning in the midst thereof.'

'Sward Ulfsson? Sward of Denmark? What words are these?' cried Brand.

'You will know within six months, uncle.'

'I shall know better things, my boy, before six months are out.'

'Uncle, uncle, do not say that.'

'Why not? If this mortal life be at best a prison and a grave, what is it worth now to an Englishman?'

'More than ever, for never had an Englishman such a chance of showing English mettle, and winning renown for the English name. Uncle, you must do something for me and my comrades ere we go.'

'Well, boy?'

'Make us knights.'

'Knights, lad? I thought you had been a belted knight this dozen years!'

'I might have been made a knight by many, after the French fashion, many a year ago. I might have been knight when I slew the white bear. Ladies have prayed me to be knighted again and again since. Something kept me from it. Perhaps' (with a glance at Herluin) 'I wanted to show that an English squire could be the rival and the leader of French and Flemish knights.'

'And thou hast shown it, brave lad,' said Brand, clapping his great hands.

'Perhaps I longed to do some mighty deed at last, which would give me a right to go to the bravest knight in all Christendom, and say, Give me the accolade, then. Thou only art worthy to knight as good a man as thyself.'

'Pride and vainglory,' said Brand, shaking his head.

'But now I am of a sounder mind. I see now why I was kept from being knighted—till I had done a deed worthy of a true knight, till I had mightily avenged the wronged, and mightily succoured the oppressed, till I had purged my soul of my enmity against my own kin, and could go out into the world a new man, with my mother's blessing on my head.'

'But not of the robbery of St. Peter,' said Herluin. The French monk wanted not for moral courage, no French monk did in those days. And he proved it by those words.

'Do not anger the lad, prior, now, too, above all times, when his heart is softened towards the Lord.'

'He has not angered me. The man is right. Here, lord abbot and sir prior, is a chain of gold, won in the wars. It is worth fifty times the sixteen pence which I stole, and which I repaid double. Let St. Peter take it, for the sins of me and my two comrades, and forgive. And now, sir prior, I do to thee what I never did for mortal man. I kneel and ask thy forgiveness. Kneel, Winter! Kneel, Guenoch! And Hereward kneel.'

Herluin was of double mind. He longed to keep Hereward out of St. Peter's grace. He longed to see Hereward dead at his feet, not because of any personal hatred, but because he foresaw in him a terrible foe to the Norman cause. But he wished, too, to involve Abbot Brand as much as possible in Hereward's rebellions and misdeeds, and above all, in the master-offence of knighting him, for for that evil, he saw, Hereward was come. Moreover, he was touched with the sudden frankness and humility of the famous champion. So he answered mildly—

'Verily, thou hast a knightly soul. May God and St. Peter so forgive thee and thy companions as I forgive thee, freely and from my heart.'

'Now,' cried Hereward; 'a boon! A boon! Knight me and these my fellows, uncle Brand, this day.'

H. T. W.

Brand was old and weak, and looked at Herluin.

'I know,' said Hereward, 'that the French look on us English monk-made knights as squireous and scholterine, unworthy of the name of knight. But, I hold—and what churchman will gainsay me?—that it is nobler to receive sword and belt from a man of God than from a man of blood like one's self, for the fittest man to consecrate the soldier of an earthly king is the soldier of Christ the King of kings.'

'He speaks well,' said Herluin. 'Abbot, grant him his boon.'

'Who celebrates high mass to-morrow?'

'Wilton the priest, the monk of Ely,' said Herluin, aloud. 'And a very dangerous and stubborn Englishman,' added he to himself.

'Good! Then this night you shall watch in the church. To-morrow, after the Gospel, the thing shall be done as you will.'

That night two messengers, knights of the abbot, galloped from Peterborough. One rode to Ivo Taillebois at Spalding, to tell him that Hereward was at Peterborough, and that he must try to cut him off upon the Egelric's road, the causeway which one of the many abbots Egelric had made some thirty years before, through Deeping Fen to Spalding, at an enormous expense of labour and of timber. The other knight rode south, along the Roman road to London, to tell King William of the rising of Kesteven, and all the evil deeds of Hereward and of Brand.

And old Brand slept quietly in his bed, little thinking on what errands his prior had sent his knights.

Hereward and his comrades watched that night in St. Peter's church. Oppressed with weariness of body and awe of mind, they heard the monks drone out their chants through the misty gloom, they compassed the aisles—and they were many at their past wild lives. They had to summon up within themselves courage and strength henceforth to live, not for themselves, but for the fatherland which they hoped to save. They prayed to all the heavenly powers of that Pantheon which then stood between man and God, to help them in the coming struggle, but ere the morning dawned they were nodding, unused to any long strain of mind.

Suddenly Hereward started, and sprang up, with a cry of fire.

'What? Where?' cried his comrades, while the monks ran up.

'The minster is full of flame. No use, too late, you cannot put it out. It must burn.'

'You have been dreaming,' said one.

'I have not,' said Hereward. 'Is it Lammas night?'

'What a question! It is the vigil of the Nativity of St. Peter and St. Paul.'

'Thank heaven, I thought my old Lammas night's dream was coming true at last.'

Herluin heard, and knew what he meant.

After which Hereward was silent, filled with many thoughts.

The next morning, before the high mass, those three brave men walked up to the altar, laid thereon their belts and swords, and then knelt humbly at the foot of the steps till the Gospel was finished.

Then came down from the altar Wilton of Ely, and laid on each man's bare neck the hove blade, and bade him take back his sword in the name of God and of St. Peter and St. Paul, and use it like a true knight, for a terror and punishment to evil doers, and a defence for women and orphans, and the poor, and the oppressed, and the monks the servants of God.

And then the monks girded each man with his belt and sword once more. And after mass was sung, they rose, each feeling himself and surely not in vain—a better man.

At least this is certain, that Hereward would say to his dying day, how he had often prayed that none would fight so well as those who had received their sword from God's knights the monks. Therefore he would have in after years, almost all his companions knighted by the monks, and he brought into Ely with him that same good custom which he had learnt at Peterborough, and kept it up as long as he held the isle.

Then he said

'Have you monks a hammer here, who can paint for me?'

'That can I,' said Wilton of Ely.

'Then take my shield, and save from it this bear which I carry.'

Wilton brought pencil and paint, and did so.

'Now, paint me in a W, that shall stand for Wake, and make it—shake it out of the knots of a monk's grille, for a sign that I am a monk's knight, and not a king's, and that I am the champion of the monks of England against the monks of France, from this time forth for evermore.'

Wilton did it, and made out of two monks' grilles none other than the after famous Wake knot.

'Now do the same by Winter and Gwench's shields. Monks' knights are we, and monks' battles we will fight.'

'You must have a motto to match withal, my good lord,' said Wilton, throwing his English heart into the work.

'What better than my own name—Wake? These are times in which good Englishmen must not sleep and sleep I will not, first me, nor mine either.'

'Vigils, that will be in Latin.'

'Ay—let us have Latin, and show these Frenchmen that we are clerks and gentlemen, as well as they.'

'Vigils et Ora,' said the monk solemnly, 'Watch and pray, lest thou enter into temptation.'

'Watch—and pray. Thou speakest like a town of God,' said Hereward, half sadly. 'Thou hast said so be it. God knows, I have need of that, too, if only I knew how. But I will watch, and my wife shall pray, and so will the work be well parted between us.'

And so was born the Wake motto and the Wake knot.

It was late when they got back to Crowland. The good abbot received them with a troubled face.

'As I feared, my lord, you have been too hot and hasty. The French have raised the country against you.'

'I have raised it against them, my lord.'

'But we have news that Sir Frederick --'

'And who may he be?'

'A very terrible cloth of these French, old and crafty, a brother of old Earl Warrene of Norfolk, whom God confound. And he has sworn to have your life, and has gathered knights and men at arms at Lynn in Norfolk.'

'Very good, I will visit him as I go home, lord abbot. Not a word of this to any soul.'

'I trouble for thee, thou young Devil.'

'One cannot live for ever, my lord. Farewell.'

A week after a boatman brought news to Crowland how Sir Frederick was sitting in his man at Lynn, when there came in one with a sword, and said, 'I am Hereward the Wake. I was told that thou didst desire greatly to see me, therefore I am come, being a courteous knight,' and therewith smote off his head. And when the knights and others would have stopped him, he cut his way through them, killing some three or four at each stroke, himself unhurt, for he was clothed from head to foot in magic armour, and whosoever smote it, their swords melted in their hands. And so gaining the door, he vanished in a great cloud of sea fowl, that cried for ever 'The Wake is come again.'

And after that the ten men said to each other, that all the birds upon the mere could nothing save 'The Wake is come again.'

And so, already surrounded with myth and mystery, Hereward flashed into the tens and out again, like the lightning brand, destroying as he passed. And the hearts of all the French were turned to water, and the land had peace from its tyrants for many days.

CHAPTER XVI

HOW TWO LANCEBORN MARCHED OUT OF SPALDING TOWN

A PROUD man was Ivo Taillebois, as he rode next morning out of Spalding town, with hawk on fist, hound at heel, and a dozen men-at-arms at his back, who would, on dine or undue cause shown, hunt men while he hunted game.

An adventurer from Anjou, brutal, ignorant, and profligate—low-born, too (for his own men whispered, behind his back, that he was no more than his name hinted, a wood cutter's son), he still had his deserts. Valiant he was, cunning, and skilled in war. He and his troop of Angemuruthers had fought like tigers by William's side at Hastings, and he had been rewarded with many a manor which had been Earl Algar's, and should now have been Earl Edwin's, or Morcar's, or, if may be, Hereward's own.

'A fat land and fat,' said he to himself, 'and, after I have hanged a few more of these lawbreakers, a peaceable life enough to hand down to the lawful heirs of my body, if I had one. I must marry. Blessed Virgin! that it is to serve and honour your gracious glory, as I have always done according to my poor humility. Who would have thought that Ivo Taillebois would ever rise so high in life, as to be looking out for a wife—and that a lady, too!'

Then thought he over the peerless beauties of the Lady Lucia, Edwin and Morcar's sister, almost as fair as that hapless aunt of hers, Aldythia, King Harold's widow. Eddeva fana, Eddeva pulcra, stands her name in Domesday-book, known, even to her Norman conquerors, as the beauty of her time, as Godiva her mother had been before her. Scarcely less beautiful was Lucia, as Ivo had seen her at William's court, half-captives and half-guests, and he longed for her, love her he could not. 'I have her father's lands,' quoth he, 'what more reasonable than to have the daughter, too? And have her I will, unless the Minister, in his present morbid and political mood, makes a countess of her, and marries her up to some Norman coxcomb, with a long pedigree invented the year before last. If he does throw away his daughter on that Earl Edwin, in his fancy for petting and patting these savages into good humour, he is not likely to throw away Edwin's sister on a Taillebois. Well, I must put a spoke in Edwin's wheel. It will not be difficult to make him or Morcar, or both of them, traitors once more and for ever. We must have a rebellion in these parts. I will talk about it to Gilbert of Ghent. We must make these savages desperate, and William furious, or he will be soon giving them back their lands, besides asking them to court, and then how are valiant knights like us, who have won England for him, to be paid for their trouble? No, no. We must have a fresh rebellion, and a fresh confiscation, and then when English houses are going cheap, perhaps the Lady Lucia may fall to my share.'

And Ivo Taillebois kept his word, and without difficulty, for he had many to help him. To drive the English to desperation, and to get a pretext for seizing their lands, was the game which the Normans played, and but too well.

As he rode out of Spalding town, a man was being hanged on the gallows there permanently provided.

That was so common a sight, that Ivo would not have stopped, had not a priest, who was comforting the criminal, run forward and almost thrown himself under the horse's feet.

'Mercy, good my lord, in the name of God and all His saints.'

Ivo went to ride on.

'Mercy!' and he laid hands on Ivo's bridle. 'If he took a few pike out of your mere, remember that the mere was his, and his father's before him, and do not send a sorely tempted soul out of the world for a paltry fish.'

'And where am I to get fish for Lent, sir priest, if every tascal nets my waters, because his father did so before him?' 'Take your hand off my bridle, or, par le splendour Dex' (Ivo thought it fine to use King William's favourite oath), 'I will hew it off.'

The priest looked at him, with something of honest fierceness in his eyes, and dropping the bridle, muttered to himself in Latin: 'The bloodthirsty and deceitful man shall not live out half his days.' Nevertheless, my trust shall be in Thee, O Lord!

'What art muttering, beast? Go home to thy wife' (wife was by no means the word which Ivo used), 'and make the most of her, before I rout out thee and thy fellow canons, and put in good monks from Kornandy in the place of your drunken English swine. Hang him!' shouted he, as the bystanders fell on their knees before the tyrant, crouching in terror, every woman for her husband, every man for wife and daughter. 'And hearken, you fen-frogs all! Whoso touches pike or eel, swimming or wading fowl, within these miles of mine, without my leave, I will hang him as I hanged this man, as I hanged four brothers in a row on Wrokesham Bridge but last week.'

'Go to Wrokesham Bridge and see,' shouted a shrill cracked voice behind the crowd.

All looked round, and more than one of Ivo's men set up a yell, the hangman loudest of all.

'That's he, the heron again! Catch him! Stop him! Shoot him!'

But that was not so easy. As Ivo pushed his horse through the crowd, careless of whom he crushed, he saw a long lean figure flying through the air seven feet aloft, his heels higher than his head, on the further side of a deep broad ditch, and, on the nearer side of the same, one of his best men lying stark, with a cloven skull.

'Go to Wrokesham!' shrieked the lean man, as he rose, and showed a ridiculously long nose, neck, and legs (a type still not uncommon in the fens), a quilted leather coat, a double-bladed axe slung over his shoulder by a thong, a round shield at his back, and a pole three times as long as himself, which he dragged after him, like an unwieldy tail.

'The heron, the heron!' shouted the English. 'Follow him, men, heron or hawk!' shouted Ivo, galloping his horse up to the ditch, and stopping short at fifteen feet of water.

'Shoot, some one! Where are the bows gone?'

The heron was away two hundred yards, running, in spite of his pole, at a wonderful pace, before a bow could be brought to bear. He seemed to expect an arrow, for he stopped, glanced his eye round, threw himself flat on his face, with his shield, not over his body, but over his bare legs, sprang up as the shaft stuck in the ground beside him, ran on, planted his pole in the next dyke, and flew over it.

In a few minutes he was beyond pursuit, and Ivo turned, breathless with rage, to ask who he was.

'Alas, sir, he is the man who set free the four men at Wrokesham Bridge last week.'

'Set free? Are they not hanged and dead?'

'We—we dare not tell you. But he came upon us—'

'Single-handed, you cowards?'

'Sir, he is not a man, but a witch or a devil. He asked us what we did there. One of our men laughed at his long neck and legs, and called him Heron. "Heron I am," says he, "and strike like a heron, right at the eye," and with that he cuts the man over the face with his axe, and laid him dead, and then another and another.'

'Till you all ran away, villains.'

'We gave back a step—no more. And he freed one of those four, and he again the rest, and then they all set on us, and went to hang us in their own stead.'

'When there were ten of you, I thought.'

'Sir, as we told you, he is no mortal man, but a fiend.'

'Beasts, fools! Well, I have hanged this one, at least!' growled Ivo, and then rode sullenly on.

'Who is this fellow?' cried he, to the trembling English.

'Wulfrio Raier, Wulfrio the Heron, of Wrokesham in Norfolk.'

'Aha! And I hold a mirror of him,' said Ivo to himself. 'Look you, villains, this fellow is in league with you.'

A burst of abject denial followed. 'Since the French—since Sir Frederick, as they call him, drove him out of his Wrokesham lands, he wanders the country, as you see, to-day here, but heaven only knows where he will be to-morrow.'

'And finds, of course, a friend everywhere. Now march!' and a string of threats and curses followed.

It was hard to see why Wulfrio should not have found friends, as he was simply a small holder, or squire, driven out of house and land, and turned adrift on the wide world, for the offence of having fought in Harold's army at the battle of Hastings. But to give him food or shelter was, in Norman eyes, an act of rebellion against the rightful King William, and Ivo rode on, boiling over with righteous indignation, along the narrow drove which led towards Deeping.

A pretty lass came along the drove, driving a few sheep before her, and spinning as she walked.

'Whose lass are you?' shouted Ivo.

'The abbot's of Crowland, please your lordship,' said she, trembling.

'Much too pretty to belong to monks. Chuck her up behind you, one of you.'

The shrieking and struggling girl was mounted behind a horseman, and bound, and Ivo rode on.

A woman ran out of a turf-hut on the drove side, attracted by the girl's cries. It was her mother.

'My lass! Give me my lass, for the love of St. Mary and all saints!' And she clung to Ivo's bridle.

He struck her down, and rode on over her.

A man cutting sedges in a punt in the lode alongside looked up at the girl's shrieks, and leapt on shore, scythe in hand.

'Father! father!' cried she.

'I'll rid thee, lass, or die for it,' said he, as he sprang up the drove-dyke, and swept right and left at the horses' legs.

The men recoiled. One horse went down, limed for life, another staggered backwards into the father lode, and was drowned. But an arrow went through the brave serf's heart, and Ivo rode on, cursing more bitterly than ever, and comforted himself by flying his hawks at a covey of partridges.

Soon a group came along the drove which promised fresh sport to the man hunters. But as the foremost person came, Ivo stopped in wonder at the shout of—

'Ivo! Ivo Taillebois! Halt and have a care! The English are risen, and we are all dead men!'

The words were spoken in French, and in French Ivo answered, laughing.

'Thou art not a dead man yet, it seems, Sir Robert, art thou going on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, that thou comest in this fashion? Or dost thou mean to return to Anjou as bare as thou camest out of it?'

For Sir Robert had, like Edgar in Shakespeare's Lea, 'reserved himself a blanket, else had they all been shamed.'

But very little more did either he, his lady, and his three children wear, as they trudged along the drove, in even poorer case than that.

'Robert of Cunningsby,
Who came out of Normandy,
With his wife Tiffany,
And his man Maupas,
And his dog Hardgras.'

'For the love of heaven and all chivalry, joke me no jokes, Sir Ivo. But give me and mine clothes and food. The barbarians rose on us last night—with Azer, the rufian who owned my lands, at their head, and drove us out into the night as we are, bidding us carry the news to you, for your turn would come next. There are forty or more of them in West Deeping now, and coming eastward, they say, to visit you, and what is more than all, Hereward is come again.'

Hereward? cried Ivo, who knew that name full well.

Whereon Sir Robert told him the terrible tragedy of Bourne.

'Mount the lady on a horse, and wrap her in my cloak. Get that dead villain's clothes for Sir Robert as we go back. Put your horses' heads about and ride for Spalding.'

'What shall we do with the lass?'

'We cannot be burdened with the jade. She has cost us two good horses already. Leave her in the road, bound as she is, and let us see if St. Guthlac her master will come and untie her.'

So they rode back. Coming from Deeping two hours after, Aser and his men found the girl on the road, dead.

'Another count in the long score,' quoth Aser. But when, in two hours more, they came to Spalding town, they found all the folk upon the street, shouting and praising the host of heaven. There was not a Frenchman left in the town.

For when Ivo returned home, ere yet Sir Robert and his family were well clothed and fed, there galloped into Spalding from the north Sir Ascelin, whilome of St. Valeri, nephew and man of Thorhold, would be abbot of Peterborough.

'Not bad news, I hope!' cried Ivo, as Ascelin clanked into the hall. 'We have enough of our own. Here is all Kesteven, as the barbarians call it, risen, and they are murdering us right and left.'

'Worse news than that, Ivo Taillebois'—'sir,' or 'mieur,' Ascelin was loth to call him, being himself a man of family and fashion, and holding the nouveaux venus in deep contempt. 'Worse news than that. The North has risen again, and proclaimed Prince Edgar king.'

'A king of words! What care I, or you, as long as the Mamer, God bless him, is a king of deeds!'

'They have done them deeds, though, too. Gospatrick and Maelswynn are back out of Scotland. They attacked Robert de Comines¹ at Durham, and burnt him in his own house. There was but one of his men got out of Durham to tell the news. And now they have marched on York, and all the chiefs, they say, have joined them. Archill thethane, and Edwin and Morcar, and Waltheof too, the young traitors.'

'Blessed virgin!' cried Ivo, 'thou art indeed gracious to thy most unworthy knight!'

'What do you mean?'

'You will see some day. Now, I will tell you but one word. When fools make lay, wise men build ricks. This rebellion—if it had not come of itself, I would have roused it. We wanted it, to cure William of this just and benevolent policy of his, which would have ended in sending us back to France, as poor as we left it. Now, what am I expected to do? What says Gilbert of Ghent, the wise man of Lie-nie—what the pest do you call that outlandish place, which no civilised lips can pronounce?'

'Lie-me-cole?' replied Ascelin, who, like the rest of the French, never could manage to say Lincoln. 'He says, "March to me, and with me to join the king at York!"'

'Then he says well. These fat acres will be none the leaner, if I leave the English slaves to crop them for six months. Men! arm and horse! Sir Robert of Deeping. Then arm and horse yourselves. We march north in half an hour, bag and baggage, scrip and scrippage. You are all bachelors, like me, and travel light. So off with you! Sir Ascelin, you will eat and drink?'

'That will I.'

'Quick, then, knight, and after that pack up the Englishman's plate-chest, which we inherited by right of list—the only plate, and the only title deeds I ever possessed.'

'Now, Sir Ascelin'—as the three knights, the lady, and the poor children ate then fastest—'listen to me. The art of war lies in this one nutshell—to put the greatest number of men into one place at one time, and let all other places shunt, so striking swiftly, and striking heavily. That is the rule of our huge lord king William, and by it he will conquer England, or the world, if he will, and while he does that, he shall never say that Ivo Taillebois stayed at home to guard his own manors, while he could join his king, and win all the honors of England once and for all.'

'Tailor! whatever men may say of thy lineage or thy virtues, they cannot deny this, that thou art a most wise and valiant captain.'

'That am I,' quoth Taillebois, too much pleased with the praise to care about being tutored by a younger man. 'As for my lineage, my lord the king has a fellow feeling for upstarts, and the woodman's grandson may very well serve the tanner's. Now, men! is the litter ready for the lady and children? I am sorry to rattle you about this, madam, but war has no courtesies, and march I must.'

And so the French went out of Spalding town.

'Don't be in a hurry to thank your saints!' shouted Ivo to his victims. 'I shall be back this day three months, and then you shall see a row of gibbets all the way from here to Deeping, and an Englishman hanging on every one.'

CHAPTER XXII

HOW HERWARD SAILED FOR ENGLAND ONCE AND FOR ALL

So Herward fought the Viscount of Pinkney, who had the usual luck which befell those who crossed swords with him, and plotted meanwhile with Gyda and the Countess Judith. Abbot Egoleson sent them news from King Sweyn in Denmark, soon Judith and Tosti's two sons went themselves to Sweyn, and helped the pilot and the fitting out of the armament. News they had from England in plenty, by messengers from Queen Matilda to the sister who was intriguing to dethrone her husband, and by private messengers from Durham and from York.

Baldwin, the debonair marquis, had not lived to see this fruit of his long efforts to please everybody. He had gone to his rest the year before, and now there ruled in Bruges his son, Bahlwin the Good, 'Count Palatine,' as he styled himself, and his wife Reginida, the Lady of Hainault.

They probably cared as little for the success of their sister Matilda as they did for that of their sister Judith, and followed out—Baldwin at least—the great marquis's plan of making Flanders a retreat for the fugitives of all the countries round.

At least, if (as seems) Sweyn's fleet made the coast of Flanders its rendezvous and base of operations against King William, Baldwin offered no resistance.

So the messengers came, and the plots went on. Great was the delight of Hereward and the ladies when they heard of the taking of Durham and York, but bitter their surprise and rage when they heard that Gospatric and the confederates had proclaimed Edgar Atheling king.

'Fools! they will run all!' cried Gyda. 'Do they expect Sweyn Ulfsson, who never moved a finger yet unless he saw that it would pay him within the hour, to spend blood and treasure in putting that puppet boy upon the throne instead of himself?'

'Calm yourself, great countess,' said Hereward, with a smile. 'The man who puts him on the throne will find it very easy to take him off again when he needs.'

'Push!' said Gyda. 'He must put him on the throne first. And how will he do that? Will the men of the Danolagh, much less the Northumbrians south of Tyne, ever rally round an Atheling of Cerdic's house?'

'Those between Tyne and Forth will join him,' said Hereward. 'They are Saxons like himself.'

'And who are they, that three-fourths of England should be scorned for their sake? If their cousins of Wessex, with my boys at their head, could not face this Frenchman, how will they? It is in my blood and my kin, in the Danolagh and the Dunes, that the strength of England lies, and not in a landlul of Scotch earls, backed by a barbarian like Malcolm. If the boy Edgar be Gospatric's cousin, or Malcolm's brother-in-law, what is that to England, or indeed to them? The boy is a mere stalking-horse, behind which each of these greedy chiefs expects to get back his own lands in the north, and if they can get them back by any other means, well and good. Mark my words, Sir Hereward, that cunning Frenchman will treat with them one by one, and betray them one by one, till there is none left.'

How far Gyda was right will be seen hereafter. But a less practised diplomat than the great countess might have speculated reasonably on such an event. The connection between Scotch and English royalty was, at the moment, most harmful to England. But more harmful far would it have been, had the Danish invasion succeeded, had England been parted, perhaps for ever, from the ruling houses of Scotland, and become a mere appanage of the Scandinavian kings.

Then came darker news. As Ivo had foreseen, and as Ivo had done his best to bring about, William dashed on York, and drove out the confederates with terrible slaughter, profaned the churches, plundered the town. Gospatric and the earls retreated to Durham, the Atheling, more cautious, to Scotland.

Then came a strange story, worthy of the grown children who, in those old times, bore the hearts of boys with the ferocity and intellect of men.

A great fog fell on the Frenchmen as they struggled over the Durham moors. The doomed city was close beneath them, they heard Wear roaring in his wooded gorge. But a darkness, as of Egypt, lay upon them, 'neither rose any from his place.'

Then the Frenchmen cried, 'This darkness is from St. Cuthbert himself! We have invaded his holy soil. Who has not heard how none who offend St. Cuthbert ever went unpunished? How palsy, blindness, madness fall on those who dare to violate his sanctuary?''

And the French turned and fled before the face of St. Cuthbert, and William went down to Winchester angry and sad, and then went off to Gloucestershire, and hunted—for whatever betell, he still would hunt—in the forest of Dean.

And still Sweyn and his Danes had not sailed, and Hereward walked to and fro in his house impatiently, and lided his time.

In July Baldwin died. Arnoul, the boy, was Count of Flanders, and Reginida, his sorceress-mother, ruled the land in his name. She began to oppress the Flemings—not those of French Flanders, round St. Omer, but those of Flemish Flanders, toward the north. They threatened to send for Robert the Frisian to right them.

Hereward was perplexed. He was Robert the Frisian's friend, and old soldier. Reginida was Tofrida's friend, so was, still more, the boy Arnoul, which party should he take? Neither, if he could help it. And he lounged to be safe out of the land.

And at last his time came. Martin Lightfoot ran in, breathless, to tell how the sails of a mighty fleet were visible from the Dunes.

'Here!' cried Hereward. 'What are the fools doing down here, wandering into the very jaws of the wolf? How will they land here? They were to have gone straight to the Lincolnshire coast. God grant this mistake be not the first of dozens!'

Hereward went into Tofrida's bower.

'This is an evil business. The Danes are here, where they have no business, instead of being off Scheldtmouth, as I entreated them. But go we must, or be for ever shamed. Now, true wife, are you ready? Dare you leave home, and kin, and friends, once and for all, to go, you know not whither, with one who may be a gory corpse by this busy week ?'

'I dare,' said she.

So they went down the Aa by night, with Torhula's mother, and the churl, and all their jewels, and all they had in the world. And then housecarles went with them, forty men, tried and trained, who had vowed to follow Hereward round the world. And there were two longships ready, and twenty good mariners in each. So when the Danes made the South Foreland the next morning, they were aware of two gallant ships bearing down on them, with a strange knot endronkered on their sails.

A proud man was Hereward that day, as he sailed into the midst of the Danish fleet, and up to the royal ships, and shouted -

'I am Hereward the Wake, and I come to take service under my rightful lord, Sweyn, king of England.'

'Come on board, then, will do we know you, and right glad we are to have the Wake with us.'

And Hereward laid his ship's bow upon the quarter of the royal ship (to lay alongside was impossible, for fear of breaking oars), and came on board.

'And thou art Hereward?' asked a tall and noble warrior.

'I am. And thou art Sweyn Ulfsson, the king?'

'I am Jarl Aslaug, his brother.'

'Then where is the king?'

'He is in Denmark, and I command his fleet, and with me Camuto and Hurohl, Sweyn's sons, and juls and bishops enough for all England.'

This was spoken in a somewhat haughty tone, in answer to the look of surprise and disappointment which Hereward had, unawares, allowed to pass over his face.

'Thou art better than none,' said Hereward.

'Now, he ken, Aslaug the jarl. Had Sweyn been here, I would have put my hand between his, and said in my own name, and that of all the men in Kesteven and the fens, Sweyn's men we are, to live and die.' But now, as it is, I say for me and them thy men we are, to live and die, as long as thou art true to us.'

'True to you I will be,' said Aslaug.

'Be it so,' said Hereward. 'Thou wilt be, whatever befall. Now, whither goes Jarl Aslaug, and all his great men?'

'We purpose to try Dover.'

'You will not like it. The Frenchman has strengthened it with one of his accursed keeps, and without battering engines you may sit before it a month.'

'What if I ask you to go in thither yourself, and try the mettle and the luck which, they say, never failed Hereward yet?'

'I should say that it was a churl's trick to throw away against a paltzy stone wall the life of a man who was ready to raise for you, in Lincolnshire and Cambridgeshire, five times as many men, as you will lose in taking Dover.'

'Hereward is right,' said more than one jarl.

'We shall need him in his own country.'

'If you are wise, to that country you yourselves will go. It is ready to receive you. This is truly to oppose you. You are attacking the Frenchman at his strongest point, instead of his weakest. Did I not send again and again, entreating you to cross from Scheklmouth to the Wash, and send me word that I might come and raise the Fin-men for you, and then we would all go north together?'

'I have heard, ere now,' said Aslaug haughtily, 'that Hereward, though he be a valiant Viking, is more fond of giving advice than of taking it.'

Hereward was about to answer very hotly. If he had, no one would have thought any harm, in those plain spoken times. But he was wise, and restrained himself, remembering that Torhula was there, all but alone in the midst of a fleet of savage men, and that beside, he had a great deed to do, and must do it as he could. So he answered -

'Aslaug the jarl has not, it seems, heard this of Hereward. That because he is accustomed to command, he is also accustomed to obey. What thou wilt do, do, and bid me do. He that quarrels with his captain cuts his own throat and his fellows too.'

'Wise spoken!' said the jarls, and Hereward went back to his ship.

'Torhula,' said he latterly, 'the game is lost before it is begun.'

'God forbid, my beloved! What words are these?'

'Sweyn took that he is with his over-caution always the same. He has let the prize slip from between his fingers. He has sent Aslaug instead of himself.'

'But why is that so terrible a mistake?'

'We do not want a fleet of Vikings in England, to plunder the French and English alike. We want a king, a king, a king!' and Hereward stamped with rage. 'And instead of a king we have this Aslaug - all men know him - greedy, and false, and weak-headed. Here he is going to be bestricken at Dover, and then, I suppose, at the next port, till the whole season is wasted, and the ships and men lost by dribbles. Pray for us to God and His saints, Torhula, you who are no nearer to heaven than I, for we never needed it more.'

So Aslaug went in, tried to take Dover, and was beaten off with heavy loss.

Then the jarls bade him take Hereward's advice. But he would not.

So he went round the Forland, and tried Sandwich. As it, indeed, there, he would have been seen marching on London, in the teeth of the clite of Normandy.

But he was beaten off there with more loss. Then, too late, he took Hereward's advice - or, rather, half of it - and sailed north, but only to commit more follies.

He dared not enter the Thames. He would not go on to the Wash, but he went into the Orwell, and attacked Ipswich, plundering right and left, instead of proclaiming King Sweyn, and calling the Danish folk around him. They naturally enough rose, and, like valiant men, beat him off, while Hereward lay outside the river mouth, his soul within him black with disappointment, rage, and shame. He would not go in. He would not fight against his own countrymen. He would not help to turn the whole plan into a marauding raid. And he told Jarl Ashnorn so, so fiercely, that his life would have been in danger, had not the force of his arm been as much feared as the force of his name was needed.

At last they came to Yarmouth. Ashnorn would needs land there, and try Norwich. Hereward was high desperate but he lit upon a plan. Let Ashnorn do so, if he would. He himself would sail round to the Wash, raise the Fen-men, and march eastward at their head through Norfolk to meet him. Ashnorn himself could not refuse so rational a proposal. All the jarls and bishops approved loudly, and away Hereward went to the Wash, his heart well-nigh broke, foreseeing nothing but evil.

CHAPTER XXIII

HOW HERWARD GATHERED AN ARMY

THE voyage round the Norfolk coast was rough and wild. Torfrida was ill, the little girl was ill, the poor old mother was so ill that she could not even say her prayers. Packed in comfortably under the awning on the poop, Torfrida looked on from beneath it upon the rolling water-waste, with a heart full of gloomy forebodings, and a brain whirling with wild fancies. The wreaths of cloud were gray with lies, hurrying on with the ship to work her woe; the low red storm dawn was streaked with blood; the water which gurgled all night under the lee was alive with hoarse voices, and again and again she started from fitful slumber to clasp the child closer to her, or look up for comfort to the sturdy figure of her husband, as he stood, like a tower of strength, steering and commanding, the long night through.

Yes, on him she could depend. On his courage, on his skill. And as for his love, had she not that utterly? and what more did woman need?

But she was going, she scarce knew whither, and she scarce knew for what. At least, on a fearful adventure, which might have a fearful end. She looked at the fair child, and reproached herself for a moment, at the poor old mother, whining, and mumbling, her soft southern heart quite broken by the wild chill northern sea-breeze, and reproached herself still more. But was it not her duty? Him she loved, and his she was, and him she must follow, over sea and land, till death, and if possible, beyond death again for ever. For his sake she would slave. For his sake she would be strong. If ever there rose in her a home-sickness, a regret for leaving Flanders, and much more for that summer south where she was born, he at least should never be saddened or weakened by one hint of her sadness and weakness. And so it befell that, by the time they made the coast, she had (as the old chronicler says) 'altogether conquered all womanly softness.'

And yet she shuddered at the dreary mud-creek into which they ran their ships, at the dreary flats on which they landed shivering, swept over by the keen north-east wind. A lonely land, and within, she knew not what of danger, it might be of hideous death!

But she would be strong, and when they were all landed, men, arms, baggage, and had pitched the tents which the wise Hereward had brought with them, she rose up like a queen, and took her little one by the hand, and went among the men, and spoke.

'Housecarles and mariners! You are following a great captain upon a great adventure. How great he is you know as well as I. I have given him myself, my wealth, and all I have, and have followed him. I know not whither, because I trust him utterly. Men, trust him as I trust him, and follow him to the death.'

'That we will!'

'And men, I am here among you, a weak woman, trying to be brave for his sake—and for yours. Be true to me, too, as I have been true to you. For your sakes have I worked hard, day and night, for many a year. For you I have baked, and brewed, and cooked, like any poor churl's wife. Is there a garment on your backs which my hands have not mended? Is there a wound on your limbs which my hands have not salved? Oh, if Torfrida has been true to you, promise me this day that you will be true men to her and hers, that if—which Heaven forbid—' ought should befall him and me, you will protect this my poor old mother, and this my child, who has grown up amongst you all—a lambs-brought up within the lion's den. Look at her, men, and promise me, on the faith of valiant soldiers, that you will be lions on her behalf, if she shall ever need you. Promise me, that if you have but one more stroke left to strike on earth, you will strike it to defend the daughter of Hereward and Torfrida from cruelty and shame.'

The men answered with a shout which rolled along the fen, and startled the wild fowl up from far-off pools. They crowded round their lady, they kissed her hands, they bent down and kissed their little playmate, and swore—one by God and His Apostles, and the next by Odin and Thor—that she should be a daughter to each and every one of them, as long as they could grip steel in hand.

Then (says the chronicler) Hereward sent on spies, to see whether the Frenchmen were in the land, and how folks fared at Holbeach, Spalding, and Bourne.

The two young Siwards, as 'knowing the country and the folk, pushed forward, and with them Martin Lightfoot to bring back news.

Martin ran back all the way from Holbeach, the very first day, with right good tidings. There was not a Frenchman in the town. Neither was there, they said, in Spalding. Ivo Tallobous was still away at the wars, and long might he stay.

So forward they marched, and everywhere the landsfolk were tilling the ground in peace, and when they saw that stout array, they hurried on to meet the troops, and burdened them with food, and ale, and all they needed.

And at Holbeach, and at Spalding, Hereward split up the war-arrow, and sent it through Kesteven, and south into the Cambridge fens, calling on all men to arm, and come to him at Bourne, in the name of Walthof and Morcar the earls.

And at every farm and town he blew the war-horn, and summoned every man who could bear arms to be ready, against the coming of the Danish host from Norwich. And so through all the fens came true what the wild fowl said upon the meres, that the Wako was come again.

And when he came to Bourne, all men were tilling in peace. The terror of the Wako had fallen on the Frenchmen, and no man had dared to enter on his inheritance, or to set a French foot over the threshold of that ghastly hall, above the gable whereof still grinned the fifteen heads, on the floor whereof still spread the dark stains of blood.

Only Gory dwelt in a corner of the house, and with him Leofric, once a roystering housecarle of Hereward's youth, now a monk of Crowland, and a deacon, whom Lady Godiva had sent thither that he might take care of her poor. And there Gory and Leofric had kept house, and told sagas to each other over the beech log fire might after night, for all Leofric's study was, says the chronicler, 'to gather together for the edification of his hearers all the acts of giants and warriors out of the fables of the ancients, or from faithful report, and to commit them to writing, that he might keep England in mind thereof.' Which Leofric was afterwards ordained priest, probably in Ely, by Bishop Egelwin of Durham, and was Hereward's chaplain for many a year.

Then Hereward, as he had promised, set fire to the three farms close to the Bruneswold, and all his outlawed friends, lurking in the forest, knew by that signal that Hereward was come again. So they cleansed out the old house, though they did not take down the heads from off the gable, and Torfrida went about the town, and about it, and confessed that England was after all a pleasant place enough. And they were as happy, it may be, for a week or two, as ever they had been in their lives.

'And now,' said Torfrida, 'while you see to your army, I must be doing, for I am a lady now, and mistress of great estates. So I must be seeing to the poor.'

'But you cannot speak their tongue.'

'Can I not? Do you think that in the face of coming to England, and fighting here, and plotting here, and being, may be, an earl's countess, I have not made Martin Lightfoot teach me your English tongue, till I can speak it as well as you? I kept that hidden as a surprise for you, that you might find out, when you most needed, how Torfrida loved you.'

'As if I had not found out already! Oh, woman, woman! I verily believe that God made you alone, and left the devil to make us linters of men.'

Meanwhile went round through all the fens, and north into the Bruneswold, and away again to Lincoln and merry Sherwood, that the Wako was come again. And Gilbert of Ghent, keeping Lincoln Castle for the Conqueror, was perplexed in mind, and looked well to gates and bars, and sentinels, for Hereward sent him at once a message, that forasmuch as he had forgotten his warning in Bruges street, and put a rascal cook into his mother's manors, he should ride Odin's horse on the highest ash in the Bruneswold.

On which Gilbert of Ghent, inquiring what Odin's horse might be, and finding it to signify the ash tree whereon, as a rod to Odin, the ves were hanged by Danes and Norse, made answer.

'That he Gilbert had not put his cook into Bourne, nor otherwise harmed Hereward or his. That Bourne had been seized by the king himself, together with Earl Morcar's lands in those parts, as all men knew. That the said cook so pleased the king with a dish of stewed eel-pout, which he served up to him at Cambridge, and which the king had never eaten before, that the king begged the said cook of him (Gilbert) and took him away, and that after, so he heard, the said cook had begged the said manor of Bourne of the king, without the knowledge or consent of him (Gilbert). That he therefore knew nought of the matter. That if Hereward meant to keep the king's peace, he might live in Bourne till Doomsday, for aught he Gilbert cared; but that if he and his men meant to break the king's peace, and attack Lincoln city, he Gilbert would nail their skins to the door of Lincoln Cathedral, as they used to do by the heathen Danes in old time. And that, therefore, they now understood each other.'

At which Hereward laughed, and said that they had done that for many a year.

And now poured into Bourne from every side brave men and true, some great holders dispossessed of their land, some the sons of holders who were not yet dispossessed, some Morcar's men, some Edwin's, who had been turned out by the king, and almost all of them, probably, blood relations of Hereward's, or of King Harold's, or of each other.

To him came 'Guenoch and Alutus Gurgan, foremost in all valour and fortitude, tall and large, and ready for work,' and with them their three nephews, Godwin Gille, 'so called because he was not inferior to that Godwin Guthlacsson who is preached much in the fables of the ancients,' and Houti and Onti, the twins, alike in face and manners', and Godric, the knight of Conby, nephew of the 'Count of Warwick, and thus, probably, Hereward's first cousin or nephew', and Tosti of Davenesse, his kinsman, and Aser Vass, whose father had possessed Lincoln Tower, and Loofwin Mone—that is, the scythe, so called 'because when he was mowing all alone, and twenty country folk set on him with pitchforks and javelins, he slew and wounded almost every one, sweeping his scythe among them as one that moweth', and Whinnens the Blackfalcon, so called because he once blackened his face with coal, and came unknown among the enemy, and slew ten of them with one lance, and 'Timbertin, a great-grandson (†) of Earl Edwin', and Loofwin Priat (perhaps the ancestor of the ancient and honourable house of Priat of Ryston), so called from his 'Priat' or call, 'because he had often escaped cunningly when taken by the enemy, having more than once killed his keepers', and the Steward of Drayton, and Thurkill and Uthunle, the outlaws, Hereward's cook, and Oger, Hereward's kinsman, and 'Winter and Lavret, two very famous ones', and Randel the skuschil of Ramsey—'he was the standard-bearer, and Wulfic the Black and Wulfic the White, and Hugh the Norman, a priest, and Wulfic, his brother, and Tosti and Godwin of Rothwell, and Alan and Hunkill, and Hugh the Breton, who was Hereward's chaplain, and Whislaw, his brother, 'a magnificent knight, which two came with him from Flanders',—and so forth. Names merely, of whom naught is known, save, in a few cases, from Domesday-book, the manors which they held. But honour to their very names! Honour to the last heroes of the old English race.

These valiant gentlemen, with the house-carles whom, more or fewer, they would bring with them, constituted a formidable force, as after years proved well. But having got his men, Hereward's first care was, doubtless, to teach them that art of war, of which they, like true Englishmen, know nothing.

The art of war has changed little, if at all, by the introduction of gunpowder. The campaigns of Hannibal and Cæsar succeeded by the same tactics as those of Frederic and Wellington, and so, as far as we can judge, did those of the master-general of his age, William of Normandy.

But of those tactics the English knew nothing. Their armies were little more than tumultuous levies, in which men marched and fought under local leaders, often divided by local jealousies. The commissariats of the armies seem to have been so worthless that they had to plunder friends as well as foes as they went along, and with plunder came every sort of excess—as when the Northern men, marching down to meet Harold Godwinsson and demand young Edwin as their earl, laid waste, seemingly out of mere brute wantonness, the country round Northampton, which must have been in Edwin's earldom, or at least in that of his brother Morcar. And even the local leaders were not over-well obeyed. The reckless spirit of personal independence, especially among the Anglo-Danes, prevented anything like discipline, or organised movement of masses, and made every battle degenerate into a confusion of single combats.

But Hereward had learned that art of war which enabled the French to crush piecemeal, with their inferior numbers, the vast but straggling levies of the English. His men, mostly outlaws and homeless, kept together by the pressure from without, and free from local jealousies, resembled rather an army of professional soldiers than a country posse comitatus. And to the discipline which he instilled into them, to his ability in marching and manœuvring troops, to his care for their food and for their transport, possibly also to his training them in that art of fighting on horseback in which the men of Wessex, if not the Anglo-Danes of the East, are said to have been quite unskilled—in short, to all that he had learned as a mercenary under Robert the First, and among the highly civilised warriors of Flanders and Normandy, must be attributed the fact that he and his little army defied for years the utmost efforts of the Frenchmen, appearing and disappearing with such strange swiftness, and comparing against such strange odds, as astonished the guerrilla captain in an atmosphere of myth and wonder, only to be accounted for, in the mind of French as well as English, by the supernatural counsels of his sorceress wife.

But Hereward grew anxious and more anxious as days and weeks went on, and yet there was no news of Asbiorn and his Danes at Norwich. Time was precious. He had to march his little army to the Wash, and then transport it by boats—no easy matter to Lynn in Norfolk, as his nearest point of attack. And as the time went on, Earl Waren and Ralph de Guader would have gathered their forces between him and the Danes, and a landing at Lynn might become impossible. Meanwhile there were hints of great clangs in the north of Lincolnshire. Young Earl Wulfic was said to be there, and Edgar the Atheling with him, but what it portended, no man knew. Morcar was said to have raised the centre of Mercia, and to have sent Edmund to have raised the Welsh, and to be at Chester with Alkythia his sister. And Hereward sent spies along the Fosse Street—the only road, then, toward the north-west of England—and spies northward along the Roman road to Lincoln. But the former met the French in force near Nottingham, and came back much later than they went. And the latter stumbled on Gilbert of Ghent, riding out of Lincoln to Folkingham, and had to flee into the fens, and came back much slower than they went.

At last news came. For into Bourne stalked Wulfic the Heron, with axe and bow, and leaping-pole on shoulder, and an evil tale he brought.

The Danes had been beaten utterly at Norwich. Ralph de Guader and his Frenchmen had fought like lions. They had killed many Danes in the assault on the castle. They had sallied out on them as they recoiled, and driven them into the river, drowning many more. The Danes had gone down the Yare again, and out to sea northward, no man knew whither. He, the Horon, prowling about the fenslands of Norfolk, to pick off straggling Frenchmen and look out for the Danes, had heard all the news from the landsfolk. He had watched the Danish fleet along the shore as far as Blakeney. But when they came to the mole, they stood out to sea, right north-west. He, the Horon, believed that they were gone for Humber Mouth.

After a while he had heard how Hereward was come again, and had sent round the war-arrow, and it seemed to him that a landless man could be in no better company, wherefore he had taken boat, and come across the deep sea. And there he was, if they had need of him.

'Need of you?' said Hereward, who had heard of the deed at Wikesham Bidge. 'Need of a hundred like you. But this is better now.'

And he went in to ask counsel of Torfrid, ready to weep with rage. He had disappointed—deceived his men. He had drawn them into a snare. He had proposed that the Danes should come. How should he look them in the face?

'Look them in the face! Do that at once now, without losing a moment. Call them together and tell them all. If their hearts are staunch, you may do great things without the traitor earl. If their hearts fail them, you would have done nothing with them worthy of yourself, had you had Norway as well as Denmark at your back. At least, be true with them, as your only chance of keeping them true to you.'

'Wise, wise wife,' said Hereward, and went out and called his band together, and told them every word, and all that had passed since he left Calais Straits.

'And now I have deceived you, and entrapped you, and I have no right to be your captain more. He that will depart in peace, let him depart, before the Frenchmen close in on us on every side and swallow us up at one mouthful.'

Not a man answered.

'I say it again. He that will depart, let him depart.'

They stood thoughtful.

Ranald of Ramsey drove the Wake-knot banner firm into the earth, tucked up his monk's frock, and threw his long axe over his shoulder, as if preparing for action.

Winter spoke at last.

'If all go, there are two men here who stay, and fight by Hereward's side as long as there is a Frenchman left in English soil; for they have sworn an oath to Heaven and to St. Peter, and that oath will they keep. What say you, Gwenoeh, knighted with us at Peterborough?'

Gwenoeh stepped to Hereward's side.

'None shall go!' shouted a dozen voices. 'With Hereward we will live and die. Let him lead us to Lincoln, to Nottingham—where he will. We can save England for ourselves without the help of Danes.'

'It is well for one at least of you, gentlemen, that you are in this pleasant inn,' quoth Ranald the monk.

'Well for all of us, then, valiant purveyor of beef and beer.'

'Well for me. For the first man that had turned to go, I would have blamed him with this axe.'

'And now, gallant gentlemen,' said Hereward, 'we must take new counsel, as our old has failed. Whither shall we go? For stay here, eating up the country, we must not do.'

'They say that Waltham is in lamsey, raising the landsfolk. Let us go and join him.'

'We can at least find what he means to do. This can be no better counsel. Let us march. Only we must keep clear of Lincoln as yet. I hear that Gilbert has a strong garrison there, and we are not strong enough yet to force it.'

So they rode north, and up the Roman road toward Lincoln, sending out spies as they went, and soon they had news of Waltham. News, too, that he was between them and Lincoln.

'Then the sooner we are with him, the better; for he will find himself in trouble ere long, if old Gilbert comes up with him. So run your best, footmen, for forward we must get.'

And as they came up the Roman road, they were aware of a great press of men in front of them, and hard fighting toward.

Some of the English would have spurred forward at once. But Hereward held them back with loud reproaches.

'Will you forget all I have told you in the first skirmish, like so many dogs when they see a bull? Keep together for five minutes more. The pot will not be cool before we get our sip of it. I verily believe that it is Waltham and that Gilbert has caught him already.'

As he spoke, one part of the combatants broke up, and fled right and left, and a knight in full armour galloped furiously down the road right at them, followed by two or three more.

'Here comes some one very valiant or very much afraid,' said Hereward, as the horseman rode right upon him, shouting.

'I am the king.'

'The king?' roared Hereward, and dropping his lance, spurred his horse forward, kicking his feet clear of the stirrups. He caught the knight round the neck, dragged him over his horse's tail, and fell with him to the ground.

The armour clashed, the sparks flew from the old gray Roman flint, and Hereward, willing over once, rose, and knelt upon his prisoner.

'Wilham of Normandy! yield or die!'

The knight lay still and stark.

'Ride on!' cried Hereward from the ground.

'Ride at them and strike hard' You will soon find out which is which. This booty I must pick for myself. What are you doing?' roared he after his knights. 'Spread off the road, and keep your line, as I told you, and don't override each other! Curse the hot-headed fools! The French will scatter them like sparrows. Run on, men-at-arms, to stop the French if we are broken. And don't forget Gunes's field and the horses' legs. Now, king, are you come to life yet!'

'You have killed him,' smothered Leofric the deacon, whom Hereward had beckoned to stop with him.

'I hope not. Lend me a knife. He is a much lighter man than I fancied,' said Hereward, as they got his helmet off.

And when it was off, both started and stared. For they had uncovered, not the beetling brow, Roman nose, and firm curved lip of the Ulysses of the middle age, but the face of a fair lad, with long straw-coloured hair, and soft blue eyes staring into vacancy.

'Who are you?' shouted Hereward, saying very bad words, 'who come here, among the name of kings?'

'Mother! Christina! Margaret! Waltheof Earl!' moaned the lad, raising his head and letting it fall again.

'It is the Atheling!' cried Leofric.

Hereward rose, and stood over the boy.

'Ah! what was I doing to handle him so tenderly? I took him for the Mamzer, and thought of a king's ransom.'

'Do you call that tenderly? You have nigh pulled the boy's head off.'

'Would that I had! Ah!' went on Hereward, apostrophising the unconscious Atheling, 'ah, that I had broken that white neck once and for all! To have sent thee feet foremost to Winchester, to be by thy grandfathers and great grandfathers, and then to tell Norman William that he must fight it out henceforth not with a straw malkin like thee, which the very crows are not afraid to perch on, but with a cock of a very different make, Sweyn Ulsson, King of Denmark.'

And Hereward drew Bram-bite.

'For mercy's sake! you will not harm the lad?'

'If I were a wise man now, and hard hearted as wise men should be, I should—I should——' and he played the point of the sword backwards and forwards, nearer and nearer to the lad's throat.

'Master! master!' cried Leofric, clinging to his knees, 'by all the saints! What would Our Lady in heaven say to such a deed!'

'Well, I suppose you are right. And I fear what our lady at home might say likewise and we must not do anything to vex her, you know. Well, let us do it handsomely, if we must do it. Get water somewhere, in his helmet. No, you need not linger. I will not cut his throat before you come back.'

Leofric went off in search of water; and Hereward knelt with the Atheling's head on his knee, and on his lip a sneer at all things in heaven and earth. To have that lad stand between him and all his projects, and, to be forced, for honour's sake, to let him stand!

But soon his men returned, seemingly in high glee, and other knights with them.

'Hoy, lads!' said he, 'I aimed at the falcon and shot the goose. Here is Edgar Atheling prisoner. Shall we put him to ransom?'

'He has no money, and Malcolm of Scotland is much too wise to lend him any,' said some one. And some more rough jokes passed.

'Do you know, sirs, that he who lies there is your king?' asked a very tall and noble looking knight.

'That do we not,' said Hereward sharply.

'There is no king in England this day, as far as I know. And there will be none north of the Watling Street till he be chosen in full hustings, and anointed at York, as well as at Winchester or London. We have had one king made for us in the last forty years, and we intend to make the next ourselves.'

'And who art thou, who talkest so bold of king-making?'

'And who art thou, who askest so bold who I am?'

'I am Waltheof Swardsson, the earl, and you is my army behind me.'

'And I am Hereward Leofnesson, the Wake, and you is my army behind me.'

If the two champions had flown at each other's throats, and their armies had followed their example, simply as dogs fly at each other they know not why, no one would have been astonished in those unhappy times.

But it fell not out upon that wise, for Waltheof, leaping from his horse, pulled off his helmet, and seizing Hereward by both hands, cried

'Blessed is the day which sees again in England Hereward, who has upheld throughout all lands and seas the honour of English chivalry.'

'And blessed is the day in which Hereward, meets the head of the house of Sward where he should be, at the head of his own men, in his own carldoon. When I saw my friend, thy brother Ashborn Bulax, brought unto the camp at Dunsinane with all his wounds in front, I wept a young man's tears, and said, "Ther ends the glory of the White-Bears' house!" But this day I say—The White-Bears' blood is risen from the grave in Waltheof Swardsson, who with his single axe kept the gate of York against all the army of the French, and who shall keep against them all England, if he will be as wise as he is brave.'

Was Hereward honest in his words? Hardly so. He wished to be honest. As he looked upon that magnificent young man, he hoped and trusted that his words were true. But he gave a second look at the face, and whispered to himself, 'Weak, weak. He will be led by priests perhaps by William himself. I must be courteous but confide I must not.'

The men stood round, and looked with admiration on the two most splendid Englishmen then alive. Hereward had taken off his helmet likewise, and the contrast between the two was as striking as the completeness of each of them in his own style of beauty. It was the contrast between the slow-hound and the deer-hound, each alike high-couraged and high-bred; but the former short, sturdy, cheerful, and sagacious, the latter tall, stately, melancholy, and not over wise withal.

Walthoof was a full head and shoulders taller than Hereward. He was one of the tallest men of his generation, and of a strength which would have been gigantic, but for the too great length of neck and limb, which made him loose and slow in body, as he was somewhat loose and slow in mind. An old man's child, although that old man was one of the old giants, there was a vein of weakness in him, which showed in the arched eyebrow, the sleepy pale blue eye, the small soft mouth, the lazy voice, the narrow and lofty brow over a shallow brow. His face was not that of a warrior, but of a saint in a painted window, and to his own place he went, and became a saint, in his due time. But that he could out-general William, that he could even manage Gospatric and his intrigues, Hereward expected as little, as that his own nephews Edwin and Morecar could do it.

'I have to thank you, noble sir,' said Walthoof languidly, 'for sending your knights to our rescue when we were really hard pressed—I fear much by our own fault. Had they told me whose men they were, I should not have spoken to you so roughly as I fear I did.'

'There is no offence. Let Englishmen speak their minds, as long as English land is above sea. But how did you get into trouble, and with whom?'

Walthoof told him how he was going round the country, raising forces in the name of the Atheling, when, as they were struggling along the Roman road, Gilbert of Ghent had dashed out on them from a wood, cut their line in two, driven Walthoof one way, and the Atheling another, so that the Atheling had only escaped by riding, as they saw, for his life.

'Well done, old Gilbert!' laughed Hereward. 'You must beware, my lord owl, how you venture within reach of that old bear's paw.'

'Bear! By the joys, Sir Hereward,' asked Walthoof, whose thoughts ran loosely right and left, 'they told me that you carried a white bear on your banner—but I only see a knot.'

'Ah! I have parted with my old bear, all save his skin, for keeping which, by the bye, your house ought to have a blood feud against me. I slew your great-uncle or cousin, or some other kinsman, at Gilbert's house in Scotland long ago, and since then I sleep on his skin every night, and need to carry his picture in my banner all day.'

'Blood-feuds are solemn things,' said Walthoof, frowning. 'Karl killed my grandfather Aldred at the battle of Setterington, and his four sons are with the army at York now—'

'For the love of all saints and of England, do not think of avenging that! Every man must now put away old grudges, and remember that he has but one foe, William and his Frenchmen.'

'Very nobly spoken. But those sons of Karl—and I think you said you had killed a kinsman of mine?'

'It was a bear, lord earl, a great white bear. Cannot you understand a jest? Or are you going to take up the quarrels of all white bears that are slain between here and Iceland? You will end by burning Crowland monster then, for there are twelve of your kinsmen's skins there, which Canute gave forty years ago.'

'Burn Crowland monster! St Guthlac and all saints forbid!' said Walthoof, crossing himself devoutly.

'Are you a monk-monger into the bargain, as well as a dolt? A bad prospect for us, if you are,' said Hereward to himself.

'Ah, my dear lord king!' said Walthoof, 'and you are recovering?'

'Somewhat,' said the king, sitting up, 'under the care of this kind knight.'

'He is a monk, Sir Atheling, and not a knight,' said Hereward. 'Our men can wear a mail-shirt as easily as a frock, and handle a twybill as neatly as a breviary.'

Walthoof shook his head. 'It is contrary to the canons of Holy Church.'

'So are many things that are done in England just now. Need has no master. Now, sir earl and Sir Atheling, what are you going to do?'

'Neither of them, it seemed, very well knew. They would go to York if they could get there, and join Gospatric and Maelgwyn. And certainly it was the most reasonable thing to be done.'

'But if you mean to get to York, you must march after another fashion than this,' said Hereward. 'See, sir earl, why you were broken by Gilbert. And why you will be broken again, if this order holds. If you march your men along one of these old Roman streets—By St Mary, these Romans had more wits than we, for we have spoilt the roads they left us, and never made a new one of our own—'

'They were heathens and enchanter,' and Walthoof crossed himself.

'And conquered the world. Well—it you march along one of these streets, you must ride as I rode, when I came up to you. You must not let your knights go head, and your men at arms struggle after in a tail a mile long, like a scratch pack of hounds, all sizes except each others'. You must keep your footmen on the high street, and make your knights ride in two bodies, right and left, upon the wold, to protect their flanks and baggage.'

'But the knights will not. As gentlemen, they have a right to the best ground.'

'Then they may go to—, whither they will go, if the French come upon them. If they are on the flanks, and you are attacked, then they can charge in right and left on the enemy's flank, while the footmen make a stand to cover the waggons.'

'Yes—that is very good, I believe that is your French fashion!'

'It is the fashion of common sense, like all things which succeed.'

'But, you see, the knights would not submit to ride in the mire.'

'Then you must make them. What else have they horses for, while homelier men than they trudge on foot?'

'Make them?' said Waltheof, with a shrug and a smile. 'They are all free gentlemen, like ourselves.'

'And, like ourselves, will come to utter ruin, because every one of them must needs go his own way.'

'I am glad,' said Waltheof, as they rode along, 'that you called this my earldom. I hold it to be mine of course in right of my father. But the landstolk, you know, gave it to your nephew Morcar.'

'I care not to whom it is given. I care for the man who has it, to raise these landstolk, and make them fight. You are here, therefore you are earl.'

'Yes, the powers that be are ordained by God.'

'You must not strain that text too far, lord earl, for the only power that is, whom I see in England—worse luck for it—is William the Man-of-war.'

'So I have often thought.'

'You live! As I feared!' (To himself) 'The jake will have you again, gadgeon!'

'He has with him the Holy Father at Rome, and therefore the Blessed Apostle St Peter of course. And—is a man right in the sight of heaven, who resists them? I only say it—but where a man looks to the salvation of his own soul, he must needs think thereof seriously at least.'

'Oh, are you at that?' thought Hereward. 'Tont est perdu! The question is, earl,' said he aloud, 'simply this. How many men can you raise off this shire?'

'I have raised—not so many as I could wish. Harold and Eilth's men have joined me fairly well, but your nephew, Morcar—'

'I can command them. I have half of them here already.'

'Then—then we may raise the rest?'

'That depends, my lord earl, for whom we fight?'

'For whom? I do not understand.'

'Whether we fight for that lad, child Edgar—or for Sweyn of Denmark, the rightful king of England?'

'Sweyn of Denmark? Who should be the rightful king but the heir of the blessed St Edward?'

'Blessed old fool! He has done harm to us enough on earth, without leaving us his second-cousin's aunt's walking to him in us after he is in heaven.'

'Sir Hereward, Sir Hereward, I fear thou art not as good a Christian as so good a knight should be.'

'Christian or not, I am as good a one as my neighbours. I am Leofric's son. Leofric put Hardicanute on the throne; and your father, who was a man, helped him. You know what has befallen England, since we Danes left the Danish stock at Godwin's bidding, and put our necks under the yoke of Wessex monks and monk-mongers. You may follow your father's track, or not, as you like. I shall follow my father's, and fight for Sweyn Ulfsson, and no man else.'

'And I,' said Waltheof, 'shall follow the appointed of the Lord.'

'The appointed of Gospatric and two or three boys!' said Hereward. 'Knights! Turn your horses' heads. Right about face all! We are going back to the Bruneswald, to live and die free Danes.'

And to Waltheof's astonishment, who had never before seen discipline, the knights wheeled round, the men-at-arms followed them, and Waltheof and the Atheling were left to themselves on Lincoln Heath.

CHAPTER XXIV

HOW AN BISHOP ALDRED DIED OF SORROW

In the tragedies of the next few months Hereward took no part, but they must be looked at now, in order to understand somewhat of the men who were afterwards mixed up with him for weal and woe.

When William went back to the South, the confederates, child Edgar the Atheling, Gospatric, and their friends, had come south again from Durham. It was undignified, a confession of weakness. If a Frenchman had likened them to a snice coming out when the cat went away, none could blame him. But so they did, and Aslaug and his Danes, landing in Humbershire, 'were met (says the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle) by child Edgar and Earl Waltheof and Malcolme, and Earl Gospatric with the men of Northumberland, riding and marching joyfully with an immense army,' not having the spirit of prophecy, or foreseeing those things which were coming on the earth.

To them repaired Edwin and Morcar, the two young earls, Arkil and Kniel, 'the great thanes', or at least the four sons of Karl—for accounts differ, and what few else of the northern nobility that had left unmurdered.

The men of Northumberland received the Danes with open arms. They would besiege York. They would storm the new French keep. They would proclaim Edgar king at York.

In that keep sat two men, one of whom knew his own mind, the other did not. One was William Malet, knight, one of the heroes of Hastings, a noble Norman, and chateau of York Castle. The other was Archbishop Aldred.

Aldred seems to have been a man like too many more—pious, and virtuous, and harmless enough, and not without worldly prudence; but his prudence was of that sort which will surely swim with the stream, and 'honour the powers that be,' if they be but prosperous enough. For after all, if success be not God, it is like enough to Him in some men's eyes to do instead. So Archbishop Aldred had crowned Harold Godwinsson, when Harold's star was in the ascendant.¹ And who but Archbishop Aldred should crown William, when his star had cast Harold's down from heaven? He would have crowned Satan's himself, had he only proved himself king de facto—as he asserts himself to be de jure—of this wicked world.

So Aldred, who had not only crowned William, but supported his power north of Humber by all means lawful, sat in York keep, and looked at William Malet, wondering what he would do.

Malet would hold out to the last. As for the new keep, it was surely impregnable. The old walls the Roman walls on which had floated the flag of Constantine the Great were surely strong enough to keep out men without battering rams, balistas, or artillery² of any kind. What mattered Ashmole's two hundred and forty ships, and their crews of some ten or fifteen thousand men? What mattered the tens of thousands of northern men, with Gasparic at their head? Let them rage and rob round the walls. A messenger had galloped in from William in the forest of Dean, to tell Malet to hold out to the last. He had galloped out again, bearing for answer that the Normans could hold York for a year.

But the Archbishop's heart misgave him, as from north and south at once came up the dark masses of two mighty armies, broke into columns, and surged against every gate of the city at the same time. They had no battering ram to breach the ancient walls—but they had—aplomb knew it better than Ashmole—hundreds of friends inside, who would throw open to them the gates.

One gate he could command from the castle town. His face turned pale as he saw a mob of armed townsmen rushing down the street towards it, a furious scuffle with the French guards, and then, through the gateway, the open campaign beyond, and a gleaming wave of axes, helms, and spears, pouring in and up the street.

'The traitors!' he almost shrieked, as he turned and ran down the ladder to tell Malet below.

Malet was firm, but pale as Aldred.

'We must fight to the last,' said he, as he hurried down, commanding his men to sally at once en masse and clear the city.

The mistake was fatal. The French were entangled in the narrow streets. The houses, shut to them, were opened to the English and Danes, and, overwhelmed from above, as well as in front, the greater part of the French garrison perished in the first fight. The remnant were shut up in the castle. The Danes and the English seized the houses round, and shot from the windows at every loophole and embrasure where a Frenchman showed himself.

'Shoot me upon the houses!' said Malet.

'You will not leave York? O God! is it come to this?'

'And why not York town, or Yorkminster, or Rome itself with the Pope inside it, rather than yield to barbarians?'

Archbishop Aldred went into his room, and lay down on his bed. Outside was the roar of the battle, and soon, louder and louder, the roar of flame. This was the end of his time-serving and king-making. And he said many prayers, and beat his breast, and then called to his chaplain for clothes, for he was very old. 'I have slain my own sheep,' he moaned, 'slain my own sheep!'

His chaplain kept him up in bed, and looked out of the window at the light. 'There was no hill, neither was there any great advantage on either side.' Only from the southward he could see fresh bodies of Danes coming across the plain.

'The cross is here, and the eagles are gathered together. Hush me the Holy Sacrament, chaplain, and God be merciful to an unfaithful shepherd!'

The chaplain went.

'I have slain my own sheep,' moaned the archbishop. 'I have given them up to the wolves, given mine own minister, and all the treasures of the saints, and said—I am very cold!'

When the chaplain came back with the blessed Sacrament, Archbishop Aldred was more than cold, for he was already dead and still. But William Malet would not yield. He and his Frenchmen fought day after day, with the energy of despair. They asked leave to put forth the body of the archbishop, and young Wulfstan, who was a pious man, insisted that leave should be given.

So the archbishop's coffin was thrust forth of the castle-gate, and the monks from the abbey came and bore it away, and buried it in the cathedral-church.

And then the fight went on, day after day, and more houses burnt, till York was all aflame. On the eighth day the number was in a light low over Archbishop Aldred's new-made grave. All was burnt, minister, churches, old Roman palaces, and all the glories of Constantine the Great and the mythic past.

The besiegers, hewing and hammering gate after gate, had now won all but the keep itself. Then Malet's heart failed him. A wife he had, and children, for their sake he turned coward, and fled by night, with a few men-at-arms, across the burning ruins.

¹ So says Florence of Worcester. The Norman chroniclers impute the act to Sigismund.

² Artillery is here used in its old English meaning for any kind of warlike engine. Cf. 1 Samuel xx. 40.

Then, into what once was York, the confederate earls and thanes marched in triumph, and proclaimed Edgar king—a king of dust and ashes.

And where were Edwin and Morcar the meanwhile? It is not told. Were they struggling against William at Stafford, or helping Edric the Wild and his Welshmen to besiege Chester? Probably they were aiding the insurrection, if not at these two points, still at some other of their great earldoms of Mercia and Chester. They seemed to triumph for a while during the autumn of 1069 the greater part of England seemed lost to William. Many Normans packed up their plunder and went back to France, and those whose hearts were too stout to return showed no mercy to the English, even as William showed none. To crush the heart of the people by massacres, and mutilations, and devastations, was the only hope of the invader and thoroughly he did his work whenever he had a chance.

CHAPTER XXV

HOW HERWARD FOUND A WISE MAN IN ENGLAND LIAN HIMSELF

THERE have been certain men so great, that he who describes them in words—much more pretends to analyse their inmost feelings—must be a very great man himself, or incur the accusation of presumption. And such a great man was William of Normandy—one of those unfathomable master-personages, who must not be rashly dragged on any stage. The genius of a Bulwer, in attempting to draw him, took care with a wise modesty not to draw him in too much detail—to confess always that there was much beneath and behind in William's character, which none, even of his contemporaries, could guess. And still more modest than Bulwer is this chronicler bound to be.

But one may fancy, for once in a way, what William's thoughts were, when they brought him the evil news of York. For we know what his acts were, and he acted up to his thoughts.

Hunting he was, they say, in the Forest of Dean, when first he heard that all England, north of the Watling Street, had broken loose, and that he was king of only half the Isle.

Did he—as when, hunting in the Forest of Ronen, he got the news of Harold's coronation—play with his bow, stinging and unstringing it nervously, till he had made up his mighty mind? Then did he go home to his lodge, and there spread on the rough oak board a parchment map of England, which no child would deign to learn from now, but was then good enough to guide armies to victory, because the eyes of a great general looked upon it?

As he pored over the map, by the light of a bog-dial torch or rush candle, what would I see upon it?

Three separate blazes of insurrection, from north-west to east, along the Watling Street.

At Chester, Edric, 'the wild Thane' who, according to Domesday-book, had lost vast lands in Shropshire, Alghitha, Harold's widow, and Blethwallon and all his Welsh, 'the white mantles' swarming along Chester streets, not as usually, to tear and ravage like the wild cats of their own rocks, but fast friends by blood with Aldyth, once their queen, on Penmaenmawr.¹ Edwin, the young earl, Alghitha's brother, Hereward's nephew—he must be with them too, if he were a man.

Eastward, round Stafford, and the centre of Mercia, another blaze of furious English valour. Morcar, Edwin's brother, must be there, as their earl, if he too was a man.

Then in the fens and Kesteven. What meant this news, that Hereward of St Omer was come again, and an army with him? That he was loving war on all Frenchmen, in the name of Sweyn, King of Denmark and of England? He is an outlaw, a desperado, a boastful swash-buckler, thought William, it may be, to himself. He found out, in after years, that he had mistaken his man.

And north, at York, in the rear of those three insurrections, lay Gospatric, Waltheof, and Maelgwyn, with the Northumbrian host. Durham was lost, and Comyn burnt therein. But York, so boasted William Malet, could hold out for a year. He should not need to hold out for so long.

And last, and worst of all, hung on the eastern coast the mighty fleet of Sweyn, who claimed England as his of right. The foe whom he had most feared ever since he set foot on English soil, a collision with whom had been inevitable all along, was come at last—but when would he strike his blow?

William knew, doubt it not, that the Danes had been defeated at Norwich. He knew, doubt it not, for his spies told him everything, that they had purposed entering the Wash. To prevent a junction between them and Hereward was impossible. He must prevent a junction between them and Edwin and Morcar.

He determined, it seems—for he did it—to cut the English line in two, and marched upon Stafford as its centre.

But all records of these campaigns are fragmentary, confused, contradictory. The Normans fought, and had no time to write history. The English, beaten and crushed, died and left no sign. The only chroniclers of the time are monks. And little could Ordericus Vitalis, or Florence of Worcester, or he of Peterborough, faithful as he was, who filled up the sad pages of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle—little could they see or understand of the masterly strategy which was conquering all England for Norman monks, in order that they, following the army like black ravens, might feast themselves upon the prey which others won for them. To them the death of an abbot, the squabbles of a monastery, the journey of a prelate to Rome, are more important than the manoeuvres which decided the life and freedom of tens of thousands.

So all we know is, that William fell upon Morcar's men at Stafford, and smote them with a great destruction, rolling the fugitives west and east, toward Edwin, perhaps, at Chester, certainly toward Hereward in the fens.

At Stafford met him the fugitives from York, Malet, his wife, and children, with the dreadful news that the Danes had joined Gospatric, and that York was lost.

William burst into terrible fury. He accused the wretched men of treason. He cut off their hands, thrust out their eyes, threw Malet into prison, and stormed on northward.

He lay at Pontefract for three weeks. The bulwarks over the Aire were broken down. But at last he crossed and marched on York.

No man opposed him. The Danes were given down to the Humber. Gospatric and Walthoof's hearts had failed them, and they had retired before the great captain.

Florence of Worcester says that William bought Earl Asbjorn off, giving him much money, and leave to lounge for his fleet along the coast.

Doubtless William would have so done if he could. Doubtless the angry and disappointed English raised such accusations against the earl, believing them to be true. But is not the simpler cause of Asbjorn's conduct to be found in the plain facts?—That he had sailed from Denmark to join Sweyn, his brother, on the throne. He found on his arrival that Gospatric and Walthoof had seized it in the name of Edgar Atheling. What had he to do more in England, save what he did?—go out into the Humber, and winter safely there, waiting till Sweyn should come with reinforcements in the spring?

Then William had his revenge; he destroyed, in the language of Scripture, 'the life of the land.' Far and wide the farms were burnt over their owners' heads, the growing crops upon the ground, the houses were houghed, the cattle driven off, while of human death and misery there was no end. Yorkshire and much of the neighbouring counties lay waste for the next nine years. It did not recover itself fully till several generations after.

The Danes had boasted that they would keep their Yule at York. William kept his Yule there instead. He sent to Winchester for the regalia of the Confessor, and in the midst of the blackened ruins, while the English for miles around wandered starving in the snows, feeding on carrion, on rats and mice, and at last upon each other's corpses, he sat in his royal robes, and gave away the lands of Edwin and Morcar to his henchmen. And thus, like the Romans, from whom he derived both his strategy and his civilisation, he 'made a solitude, and called it peace.'

He did not give away Walthoof's lands, and only part of Gospatric's. He wanted Gos-patric, he loved Walthoof, and wanted him likewise.

Therefore through the desert which he himself had made he forced his way up to the Tees, a second time, over snow-covered moors, and this time St. Cuthbert sent no fog, being satisfied presumably with William's orthodox attachment to St. Peter and Rome, so the Conqueror treated quietly with Walthoof and Gospatric, who lay at Durham.

Gospatric got an earldom, from Tees to Tyne, and paid down for it much hard money and treasure,—bought it, in fact, he said.

Walthoof got back his earldom, and much of Morcar's. From the Tees to the Tees was to be his province.

And then, to the astonishment alike of Normans and English, and, it may be of himself, he married Judith, the Conqueror's niece, and became once more William's loved and trusted friend—or slave.

It seems inexplicable at first sight. Inexplicable, save as an instance of that fascination which the strong sometimes exert on the weak.

Then William turned southwest. Edwin, wild being, the dispossession of Thane of Shropshire, and the wilder Methwylan and his Welshmen, were still harrying and slaying. They had just attacked Shrewsbury. William would come upon them by a way they thought not of.

So over the backbone of England, by way probably of Malpas or Huddersfield, through pathless moors and bogs, down towards the plains of Lancashire and Cheshire he pushed over and on. His subjects from the plains of sunny Flanders could not face the cold the rain, the morasses, the hideous gorges, the valiant peasants still the stout and sturdyest race of men in all England—who set upon them in wooded glens, in wild stones on them from the limestone crags. They feared to be themselves, to go home.

'Towards might go back,' said William, 'he should go on.' If he could not take, he would walk. Whoever lagged, he would be farriest. And cheered by his example, the army at last debouched upon the Cheshire flats.

Then he fell upon Edwin, as he had taken upon Morcar. He drove the wild Welsh through the pass of Mold, and up into their native hills. He laid all waste with fire and sword for many a mile, as Domesday book testifies to this day. He strengthened the walls of Chester, trampled out the last embers of rebellion, and went down south to Salisbury, King of England once again.

Why did he not push on at once against the one rebel left alight, that of Hereward and his men?

It may be that he understood him and them. It may be that he meant to treat with Sweyn, as he had done, if the story be true, with Asbjorn. It is more likely that he could do no more, that his army, after so swift and long a campaign, required rest. It may be that the time of service of many of his mercenaries was expired.

Be that as it may, he mustered them at Old Sarum—the Roman British burgh which still stands on the down side—and rewarded them, according to their deserts, from the lands of the conquered English.

How soon Hereward knew all this, or how he passed the winter of 1070-71, we cannot tell. But to him it must have been a winter of latter perplexity.

It was impossible to get information from Edwin, and news from York was almost impossible to get, for Gilbert of Ghent stood between him and it.

He felt himself now pent in, all but trapped. Since he had set foot last in England ugly things had risen up, on which he had calculated too little, namely, Norman castles. A whole ring of them in Norfolk and Suffolk cut him off from the south. A castle at Cambridge closed the south end of the fens, another at Bedford, the western end, while Lincoln Castle to the north cut him off from York.

His men did not see the difficulty, and wanted him to march towards York, and clear all Lindsey and right up to the Humber.

Gladly would he have done so, when he heard that the Danes were wintering in the Humber.

'But how can we take Lincoln Castle without artillery or even a lattering-rain?'

'Let us march past it, then, and leave it behind.'

Alh, my sons,' said Hereward, lunging sulkily, 'do you suppose that the Manner spends his time—and Englishmen's life and labour—in heaping up those great stone mountains, that you and I may walk past them? They are put there just to prevent our walking past, unless we choose to have the garrison rallying out to attack our rear, and cut us off from home, and carry off our women into the laigam, when our backs are turned.'

The English swore, and declared that they had never thought of that.

'No. We drink too much ale on this side of the Channel, to think of that—in of anything beside.'

'But,' said Leofwin Prat, 'if we have no artillery, we can make some.'

'Spoken like yourself, good comrade. If we only knew how.'

'I know,' said Torfrida. 'I have read of such things in books of the ancients, and I have watched them making continually—I little knew why, or that I should ever turn engineer.'

'What is there that you do not know?' cried they all at once. And Torfrida actually showed herself a fair practical engineer.

But where was men to come from? Iron for catapult springs, iron for ram-heads, iron for bolts and bars?

'Torfrida,' said Hereward, 'you are wise. Can you use the divining rod?'

'Why, my knight?'

'Because there might be iron-ore in the woods, and if you could find it by the rod, we might get it up and smelt it.'

Torfrida said humbly that she would try; and walked with the divining rod between her pretty fingers for many a mile in wood and wold, wherever the ground looked red and rusty. But she never found any iron.

'We must take the tires off the cart-wheels,' said Leofwin Prat.

'But how will the carts do without? For we shall want them if we march.'

'In Provence, where I was born, the wheels were made out of one round piece of wood. Could we not cut wheels like them?' asked Torfrida.

'You are the wise woman as usual,' said Hereward.

Torfrida burst into a violent flood of tears, no one knew why.

There came over her a vision of the creaking carts, and the little sleek oxen, dove coloured and dove-eyed, with their canvas mantles tied neatly on to keep off heat and flies, lugging on with their light load of vine and olive-twigs beneath the blazing southern sun. When should she see the sun once more? She looked up at the brown branches overhead, howling in the December gale, and down at the brown fen below, dying into mist and darkness as the low December sun died down; and it seemed as if her life was dying down with it. There would be no more sun, and no more summers, for her upon this earth.

None certainly for her poor old mother. Her southern blood was churning more and more beneath the latter sky of Kesteven. The fall of the leaf had brought with it rheumatism, ague, and many miseries. Cunning old leech-wives treated the French lady with tunces, mugwort, and logbean, and good wine enough. But, like David of old, she got no heat, and before Yuletide came, she had perished herself safely out of this world, and into the world to come. And Torfrida's heart was the more light when she saw her go.

She was absorbed utterly in Hereward and his plots. She lived for nothing else, hardly even for her child, and clinging to her husband's fortunes all the more fiercely, the more desperate they seemed.

So that small band of gallant men laboured on, waiting for the Danes, and trying to make artillery and take Lincoln keep. And all the while, so unequal is fortune when God wills—throughout the Southern Weald, from Hastings to Hud-head, every corner glared with charcoal heaps, every glen was burrowed with iron diggups, every hammer-pound stamped and gurgled night and day, smelting and forging English iron, wherewith the Frenchmen might slay Englishmen.

Wilham—though perhaps he knew it not himself—had, in securing Essex and Surrey, secured the then great ironfield of England, and an unlimited supply of weapons. And to that circumstance, it may be, as much as to any other, the success of his campaigns may be due.

It must have been in one of these December days that a handful of knights came through the Bruneswald, mud and blood-be-spattered, urging on tired horses, as men desperate and forlorn. And the foremost of them all, when he saw Hereward at the gate of Bourne, leaped down, and threw his arms round his neck, and burst into bitter weeping.

'Hereward, I know you, though you know me not. I am your nephew, Morcar Algarsson, and all is lost.'

As the winter ran on, other fugitives came in, mostly of rank and family. At last Edwin himself came, young and fair, like Morcar, he who should have been the Conqueror's son-in-law, for whom his true-love pined, as he pined in vain. Where were Sweyn and his Danes? Whither should they go till he came?

'To Ely,' answered Hereward.

Whether or not it was his wit which first seized on the military capabilities of Ely is not told. Leofric the deacon, who is likely to know best, says that there were men already there holding out against William; and that they sent for Hereward. But it is not clear from his words whether they were fugitives, or merely bold Abbot Thurstan and his monks.

It is but probable nevertheless, that Hereward, as the only man among the fugitives who ever showed any ability whatsoever, and who was also the only leader (save Morcar) connected with the fen, conceived the famous 'Camp of Refuge,' and made it a formidable fact. Be that as it may, Edwin and Morcar went to Ely, and there joined an Earl Tofti (according to Richard of Ely), unknown to history, a Seward Barn, 'the boy or the chieftain,' who had been dispossessed of lands in Lincolnshire, and other valiant and noble gentlemen—the last remnants of the English aristocracy. And there they sat in Abbot Thurstan's hall, and waited for Sweyn and the Danes.

But the worst job's messenger who, during that evil winter and spring, came into the fen, was Bishop Egelwin of Durham. He it was, most probably, who brought the news of Berkshire laid waste with fire and sword. He it was, most certainly, who brought the worst news still, that Gospatric and Waltheof were gone over to the king. He was at Durham, seemingly, when he saw that, and fled for his life, ere evil overtook him for to yield to William that brave bishop had no mind.

But when Hereward heard that Waltheof was married to the Conqueror's niece, he smote his hands together, and cursed him, and the mother who bore him to Seward the Stout.

'Could thy father rise from the grave he would spit thy craven head in the very lap of the Frenchwoman.'

'A hard lap will he find it, Hereward,' said Toftida. 'I know her—wanton, false, and vain. Heaven grant he do not see the day he ever saw her!'

'Heaven grant he may rue it! Would that her bosom were knives and fish-hooks, like that of the statue in the fairy tale. See what he has done for us! He is cruel, not only of his own hands, but of poor Morcar's too, and of half his earldom. He is Earl of Huntingdon, of Cambridge, they say—of this ground on which we stand. What right have I here now? How can I call on a single man to arm, as I could in Morcar's name? I am an outlaw here, and a robber, and so is every man with me. And do you think that William did not know that? He saw well enough what he was doing when he set up that great brainless idol as earl again. He wanted to spit up the Danish folk, and he has done it. The Northumbrians will stick to Waltheof. They think him a mighty hero, because he held York gate alone with his own axe against all the French.'

'Well, that was a gallant deed.'

'Fish! we are all gallant men, we English. It is not courage that we want, it is brains. So the Yorkshire and Lindsey men, and the Nottingham men too, will go with Waltheof. And round here, and all through the fens, every coward, every prudent man even—every man who likes to be within the law, and to feel his head safe on his shoulder—no blame to him—will draw off from me for fear of this new earl, and leave us to end as a handful of outlaws. I see it all. And William sees it all. He is wise enough, the Mamzer, and so is his father Beht, to whom he will go home some day. Yes, Toftida, he went on after a pause, more gently, but in a tone of exquisite sadness, 'you are right, as you always are. I am no match for that man. I see it now.'

'I never said that. Only—'

'Only you told me again and again that he was the wisest man on earth.'

'And yet, for that very reason, I had you win glory without end by defying the wisest man on earth.'

'And do you bid me do it still?'

'God knows what I bid,' said Toftida, bursting into tears. 'Let me go pray, for I never needed it more.'

Hereward watched her kneeling, as he sat moody, all but desperate. Then he glided to her side and said gently—

'Teach me how to pray, Toftida. I can say a pater or an ave. But that does not comfort a man's heart, as far as I could ever find. Teach me to pray, as you and my mother pray.'

And she put her arms round the wild man's neck, and tried to teach him like a little child.

CHAPTER XXVI

HOW HERWARD FULFILLED HIS WORDS TO THE PRIOR OF THE GOLDEN BOROUGH

In the course of that winter died good Abbot Brand. Hereward went over to see him, and found him moaning to himself texts of Isaiah, and confessing the sins of his people.

'Woe to the vineyard that bringeth forth wild grapes. Woe to those that join house to house and field to field—like us, and the Goldwinsons, and every man that could—till we stood alone in the land. Many houses, great and fan, shall be without inhabitants. It is all for told in holy writ, Hereward, my son. Woe to those who rise early to fill themselves with strong drink, and the tabret and harp are in their fists but they regard not the works of the Lord. Therefore my people are gone into captivity, because they have no knowledge. Ah—those Frenchmen have knowledge, and too much of it while we have brains filled with ale instead of justice. Therefore hell hath enlarged herself, and opened her mouth without measure—and all go down into it, one by one. And dost thou think thou shalt escape, Herward, thou stout-hearted?'

'I neither know nor care—but this I know, that whithersoever I go, I shall go sword in hand.'

'Tary that take the sword shall perish by the sword,' said Brand, and blessed Herward and died.

A week after came news that Thorold of Malmesbury was coming to take the abbey of Peterborough, and had got as far as Stamford, with a right royal train.

Then Herward sent Abbot Thorold word that if he or his Frenchman put foot into Peterborough, his Hereward would hunt it over their heads. And that if he rode a mile beyond Stamford town, he should walk into it barefoot in his shirt.

Whereon Thorold abode at Stamford, and kept up his spirits by singing the song of Roland, which some say he himself composed.

A week after that, and the Danes were come.

A mighty fleet, with Sweyn Ulfsson at their head, went up the Ouse towards Ely. Another, with Ashorn at their head, having joined them off the mouth of the Humber, sailed (it seems) up the Nene. All the chivalry of Denmark and Ireland was come, and with it all the chivalry, and the unchivalry, of the Baltic shores—Vikings from Jomsburg and Aikona, Gottlanders from Wisby, and with them their heathen tributaries, Wends, Finns, Esthoniens, Comluders, Russians from Novogorod and the heart of Holmgard, Letts who still offered, in the forest of Rugen, human victims to the four-headed Swantowit, foul hordes in sheepskins and primeval filth, who might have been scented from Hinnantanon Ness ever since their ships had rounded the Skaw.

Hereward hurried to them with all his men. He was anxious, of course, to prevent their plundering the landfolk as they went—and that the savages from the Baltic shore would certainly do, if they could, however reasonable the Danes, Orkney-men, and Irish Ostmen might be.

Food, of course, they must take where they could find it, but outrages were not a necessary, though a too common, adjunct to the process of emptying a farmer's granaries.

He found the Danes in a dangerous mood, sulky and disgusted, as they had good right to be. They had gone to the Humber, and found nothing but mud, the land waste, the French holding both the shores of the Humber, and Ashorn covering in Humber-mouth, hardly able to feed his men. They had come to conquer England, and nothing was left for them to conquer but a few peat-bogs. Then they would have what there was in them. Every one knew that gold grew up in England out of the ground, wherever a monk put his foot. And they would plunder Crowland. Their forefathers had done it, and had fared none the worse. English gold they would have, if they could not get fat English manors.

'No—not Crowland!' said Hereward. Any place but Crowland, endowed and honoured by Canute the Great—Crowland, whose abbot was a Danish nobleman, whose monks were Danes to a man, of their own flesh and blood. Canute's soul would rise up in Valhalla and curse them, if they took the value of a penny from St Guthlac. St Guthlac was then good friend. He would send them bread, meat, ale, all they needed, but woe to the man who set foot upon his ground.

Hereward sent off messengers to Crowland, warning all to be ready to escape into the fens, and entreating Ulfketyl to empty his storehouses into his barges, and send food to the Danes ere a day was past. And Ulfketyl worked hard and well, till a string of barges wound its way through the fens, laden with beaver and bread, and ale-barrels in plenty, and with monks too who welcomed the Danes as their brethren, talked to them in their own tongue, blessed them in St Guthlac's name as the saviours of England, and then went home again, chanting so sweetly their thanks to heaven for their safety, that the wild Vikings were awed, and agreed that St Guthlac's men were wise folk and open-hearted, and that it was a shame to do them harm.

But plunder they must have.

'And plunder you shall have!' said Hereward, as a sudden thought struck him. 'I will show you the way to the Golden Borough—the richestminster in England, and all the treasures of the Golden Borough shall be yours, if you will treat Englishmen as friends, and spare the people of the fens.'

It was a great crime in the eyes of men of that time. A great crime, taken simply, in Hereward's own eyes. But necessity has no law. Something the Danes must have, and ought to have, and St. Peter's gold was better in their purses than in that of Thorold and his French monks.

So he led them up the fens and rivers, till they came into the old Nene, which men call Catwater and Muscal now.

As he passed Nomanlandhurne, and the mouth of the Portland river, he trembled, and trusted that the Danes did not know that they were within three miles of St Guthlac's sanctuary. But they went on ignorant, and up the Muscal till they saw St. Peter's towers on the wooded rise, and behind them the great forest which is now Milton Park.

There were two parties in Peterborough minster, a smaller faction of stout-hearted English, a larger one which favoured William and the French customs, with Prior Herhun at their head. Herhun wanted not for for-sight, and he knew that evil was coming on him. He knew that the Danes were in the land. He knew that Herward was with them. He knew that they had come to Crowland. Herward could never mean to let them sack it. Peterborough must be their point. And Herhun set his teeth, like a bold man determined to abide the worst, and barred and barricaded every gate and door.

That night a hapless churchwarden—Ywa was his name—might have been seen galloping through Milton and Castor Hanglands, and on by Barnack quarries over Southorpe heath, with saddlebags of huge size stuffed with 'gospels, mass robes, cassocks, and other garments, and such other small things as he could carry away.' And he came before day to Stamford, where Abbot Thorold lay at his ease in his inn with his homines d'armes asleep in the hall.

And the churchwarden knocked them up, and drew Abbot Thorold's curtains with a face such as his who 'drew Priam's curtain in the deed of night,

And would have told him half his Troy was burned', and told Abbot Thorold that the monks of Peterborough had sent him, and that unless he saddled and rode his best that night, with his mainie of men-at-arms, his Golden Borough would be even as Troy town by morning light.

'A moi hommes d'armes!' shouted Thorold, as he used to shout whenever he wanted to scourge his wretched English monks at Midnesbury into some French fashion.

The men leaped up and poned in, growling.

'Take me this monk and kick him into the street for waking me with such news.'

'But, gracious lord, the heathen will surely burn Peterborough, and folks said that you were a mighty man of war.'

'So I am, but if I were Roland, Oliver, and Turpin rolled into one, how am I to fight Herward and the Danes with forty men-at-arms? Answer me that, thou dunder-headed English porker.'

So Ywa was kicked into the cold, while Thorold raged up and down his chamber in mantle and slippers, wringing his hands over the treasure of the Golden Borough, snatched from his fingers just as he was closing them upon it.

That night the monks of Peterborough prayed in the minster till the long hours passed into the short. The corrodiers, and servants of the monastery, fled from the town outside into the Milton woods. The monks prayed on inside till an hour after matins. When the first flush of the summer's dawn began to show in the north-eastern sky, they heard, mingling with their own chant, another chant, which Peterborough had not heard since it was Medehamstead, three hundred years ago, the terrible Ych-hey-saa-saa—the war song of the Vikings of the north.

Their chant stopped of itself. With blanched faces and trembling knees, they fled, regardless of all discipline, up into the minster tower, and from the leads looked out north-eastward on the fen.

The first rays of the summer sun¹ were just steaming over the vast sheet of mistral, and glittering upon the winding river, and on a winding fur, too, seemingly endless, of scarlet coats and shields, black hulls, gilded prows and vanes and beak heads, and the flash and foam of innumerable oars.

And nearer and louder came the oar roll, like thunder working up from the east, and mingled with it, that grim yet laughing Hey-saa, which he spoke in its very note the revelry of slaughter.

The ships had all their sails on deck. But as they came nearer the monks could see the banners of the two foremost vessels.

The one was the red and white of the terrible Danelaw. The other, the scarcely less terrible Waki knot of Herward.

'He will burn the minster!' He has vowed to do it. As a child he vowed, and he must do it. In this very minster the head entered into him and possessed him, and to this minster has the head brought him back to do his will. Sathur, my brethren, having a special spite (as must needs be) against St. Peter, rock and pillar of the Holy Church, chose out and inspired this man, even from his mother's womb, that he might be the foe and robber of St. Peter, and the hater of all who, like my humility, honour him, and strive to bring this English land in due obedience to that blessed Apostle. Bring forth the relics, my brethren. Bring forth, above all things, those things of St. Peter's own chains, the special glory of our monastery—and perhaps its safeguard this day.

Some such bombast would any monk of those days have talked in like case. And yet, so strange a thing is man, he might have been withal, like Herhun, a shrewd and valiant man.

They brought out all the relics. They brought out the filings themselves, in a box of gold. They held them out over the walls at the ships, and called on all the saints to whom they belonged. But they stopped that line of scarlet, black, and gold, as much as their spiritual descendants stop the lava-stream of Vesuvius, when they hold out similar matters at them, with a hope unchanged by the experience of eight hundred years. The Heysaa rose louder and nearer. The Danes were coming. And they came.

¹ 'This befell on the fourth day of the Nonas of June.' So says the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, from which the details of the sack are taken.

And all the while a thousand skylarks rose from off the fen, and chanted their own chant aloft, as if appealing to heaven against that which man's greed, and man's rage, and man's superstition, had made of this fair earth of God.

The relics had been brought out—but, as they would not work, the only thing to be done was to put them back again and hide them safe, lest they should bow down like Bel and stoop like Nebo, and be carried, like them, into captivity themselves, being worth a very large sum of money in the eyes of the more Christian part of the Danish host.

Then to hide the treasures as well as they could, which (says the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle) they hid somewhere in the steeples.

The Danes were landing now. The shout which they gave as they leaped on shore made the hearts of the poor monks sink low. 'Would they be murdered as well as robbed?' Perhaps not—probably not. Hereward would see to that. And some wanted to retaliate.

Herluf would not hear of it. They were safe enough. St Peter's relics might not have worked a miracle on the spot—but they must have done something. St Peter had been appealed to on his honour, and on his honour he must surely take the matter up. At all events, the walls and gates were strong, and the Danes had no artillery. Let them howl and rage round the holy place, till Abbot Thorold and the Frenchmen of the country rose and drove them to their ships.

In that last thought the cunning Frenchman was not so far wrong. The Danes pushed up through the little town, and to the monster gates—but entrance was impossible and they prowled round and round like 'raging wolves about a winter steading—but found no crack of entry.

Prior Herluf grew bold, and coming to the heads of the gateway tower, looked over cautiously, and holding up a certain most sacred emblem—not to be profaned in these pages—cursed them in the name of his whole Pantlecon.

'Aha, Herluf! Are you there?' asked a short square man in gay armour. 'Have you forgotten the peatstack outside Bolldyke Gate, and how you bade light it under me thirty years since!'

'Thou art Winter!' and the prior uttered what would be considered from any but a churchman's lips a blasphemous and blood-thirsty curse.

'Aha! That goes like rain off a duck's back to one who has been a minister scholar in his time. You! Danes! Oetmen! down! If you shoot at that man, I'll cut your heads off! He is the oldest foe I have in the world, and the only one who ever hit me without my hitting him again, and nobody shall touch him but me. So down bows, I say.'

The Danes—humorous all of them—saw that there was a jest toward, and perhaps some earnest too, and joined in jeering the prior.

Herluf had ducked his head behind the parapet, not from cowardice, but simply because he had on no mail, and might be shot any moment. But when he heard Winter forbid them to touch him, he lifted up his head, and gave his old pupil as good as he brought.

With his sharp swift French priest's tongue he sneered, he jeered, he scolded, he argued, and then threatened. Suddenly changing his tone, in words of real eloquence he appealed to the superstitious of his hearers. He threatened them with supernatural vengeance. He set before them all the terrors of the unseen world.

Some of them began to slink away frightened. St Peter was an ill man to have a blood feud with.

Winter stood, laughing and jeering in return, for full ten minutes. At last 'I asked, and you have not answered, have you forgotten the old peatstack outside Bolldyke Gate? For if you have, The Wake has not. He has piled it against the gate, and it should be burnt through by this time. Go and see.'

Herluf disappeared with a curse.

'Now, you sea-cocks,' said Winter, springing up. 'We'll to the Bolldyke Gate, and all start fan.'

The Bolldyke Gate was on fire, and more, so were the suburbs. There was no time to save them, as Hereward would gladly have done, for the sakes of the corrobbers. They must go—on to the Bolldyke Gate. Who cared to put out flames behind him, with all the treasures of Golden Borough before him? In a few minutes all the town was alight. In a few minutes more, the monastery likewise.

A fire is detestable enough at all times, but most detestable by day. At night it is customary, a work of darkness which lights up the dark, picturesque, magnificent, with a fitness Tartarean and diabolical. But under a glaring sun, amid green fields and blue skies, all its wickedness is revealed without its beauty. You see its works and little more. The flame is hardly noticed. All that is seen is a canker eating up God's works, breaking the bones of its prey with a horrible cracking uglier than all stage-scene glares, cruelly and shamelessly under the very eye of the great, honest, kindly sun.

And that felt Hereward, as he saw Peterborough burn. He could not put his thoughts into words, as men of this day can—so much the better for him, perhaps. But he felt all the more intensely—as did men of his day—the things he could not speak. All he said was, aside to Winter—

'It is a dark job. I wish it had been done in the dark.' And Winter knew what he meant.

Then the men rushed into the Bolldyke Gate, while Hereward and Winter stood and looked with their men, whom they kept close together, waiting their commands. The Danes and their allies cared not for the great glowing heap of peat. They cared not for each other, hardly for themselves. They rushed into the gap, they thrust the glowing heap inward through the gateway with their lances, they thrust each other down into it, and trampled over them to fall themselves, rising scorched and withered, and yet struggling on toward the gold of the Golden Borough. One savage Lett caught another round the waist, and hurled him bodily into the fire, crying in his wild tongue—

'You will make a good stepping-stone for me.'

'That is not fair,' quoth Hereward, and clove him to the chine.

It was wild work. But the Golden Borough was won.

'We must in now and save the monks,' said Hereward, and dashed over the embers.

He was only just in time. In the midst of the great count were all the monks, huddled together like a flock of sheep, some kneeling, most weeping bitterly, after the fashion of monks.

Only Herlum stood in front of them, at bay, a lofty crucifix in his hand. He had no mind to weep. But with a face of calm and bitter wrath, he uttered words of peace and entreaty. They were what the time needed. Therefore they should be given. To-morrow he would write to Bishop Egelsin, to excommunicate with hell, hook, and handle, to the lowest put of Tartarus, all who had done the deed.

But to-day he spoke thus in fair. However, his fair speeches profited little, not being understood by a huddle of Letts and Finns, who howled and bayed at him, and tried to tear the crucifix from his hand, but feared 'The white Christ.'

They were already gaining courage from their own yells, in a moment more blood would have been shed, and then a general massacre must have ensued.

Hereward saw it, and shouting 'After me, Hereward's men! A Wake! A Wake!' swung Letts and Finns right and left like cornsheaves, and stood face to face with Herlum.

An angry savage smote him on the hind head full with a stone axe. He staggered, and then looked round and laughed.

'Fool! hast thou not heard that Hereward's armour was forged by dwarfs in the mountain-bowels? Off, and hunt for gold, or it will be all gone.'

The Finn, who was astonished at getting no more from his blow than a few sparks, and expected instant death in return, took the hint and vanished jabbering, as did his fellows.

'Now, Herlum the Frenchman!' said Hereward.

'Now, Hereward the robber of saints!' said Herlum.

It was a fine sight. The soldier and the churchman, the Englishman and the Frenchman, the man of the then world, and the man of the then Church, jotted fairly, face to face.

Hereward tried for one moment to stare down Herlum. But those terrible eye glances, before which Vikings had quailed, turned off harmless from the more terrible glance of the man who believed himself backed by the Maker of the universe, and all the hierarchy of heaven.

A sharp, unlovely face it was, though, like many a great churchman's face of those days, it was neither thin nor haggard. But rather round, sleek, of a puffy and unwholesome paleness. But there was a thin lip above a broad square jaw, which showed that Herlum was neither fool nor coward.

'A robber and a child of Belial thou hast been from thy cradle, and a robber and a child of Belial thou art now. Dare thy last iniquity. Slay the servants of St Peter on St Peter's altar, with thy worthy comrades, the heathen Saracens,¹ and set up Mahound with them in the holy place.'

Hereward laughed so puffy a laugh, that the prior was taken aback.

'Slay St Peter's monks.' Not even his rats! I am a monk's knight, as my knot testifies. There shall not a hair of your head be touched. Only, I must clear out all Frenchmen hence, and all Englishmen likewise, as stinks have chosen to jock with the cranes. Here, Hereward's men! march these traitors and their French prior safe out of the walls, and into Milton woods, to look after their poor comrades.'

'Out of this place I stir not. Here I am, and here I will live or die, as St Peter shall send aid.'

But as he spoke he was precipitated rudely forward, and hurried almost into Hereward's arms. The whole body of monks, when they heard Hereward's words, cared to hear no more, but, desperate between fear and joy, rushed forward, bearing away their prior in the midst.

'So go the rats out of Peterborough, and so is my dream fulfilled. Now for the treasure, and then to fly.'

But Herlum thrust himself clear of the frantic mob of monks, and turned back on Hereward.

'Thou wast dubbed knight in that church!'

'I know it, man, and that church and the relics of the saints in it are safe therefore. Hereward gives his word.'

'That—but not that only, if thou art a true knight, as thou holdest, Englishman.'

Hereward growled savagely, and made an ugly step toward Herlum. That was a point which he would not have questioned.

'Then behave as a knight, and save, save'—as the monks dragged him away—'save the heathen! There are women—ladies there!' shouted he, as he was borne off.

They never met again on earth. But both comforted themselves in after years, that two old enemies' last deed in common had been one of mercy.

Hereward uttered a cry of horror. If the wild Letts, even the Jomsburgers, had got in, all was lost. He rushed to the door. It was not yet burst, but a bench, swung by strong arms, was battering it in fast.

'Winter! Gery! Swards! To me, Hereward's men! Stand back, fellows. Here are friends here inside. If you do not, I'll cut you down.'

But in vain. The door was burst, and in poured the savage mob. Hereward, unable to stop them, headed them, or pretended to do so, with five or six of his own men round him, and went into the hall.

On the rushes lay some half-dozen groans. They were hunched instantly, simply because they were there. Hereward saw but could not prevent. He ran as hard as he could to the foot of the wooden stairs which led to the upper floor.

'Guard the stair-foot, Winter!' and he ran up.

Two women covered upon the floor, shrieking and praying with hands clasped over their heads. He saw that the arms of one of them were of the most delicate whiteness, and judging her to be the lady, bent over her. 'Lady, you are safe. I will protect you. I am Hereward.'

She sprang up, and threw herself with a scream into his arms.

'Hereward! Hereward! Save me. I am—'

'Alfrida!' said Hereward.

It was Alfrida, if possible more beautiful than ever.

'I have got you!' she cried. 'I am safe now. Take me away—Out of this horrible place—Take me into the woods—Anywhere—Only do not let me be hurt here—stilled like a rat. Give me air! Give me water!' and she clung to him so madly that Hereward, as he held her in his arms, and gazed on her extraordinary beauty, forgot Torfrida for the second time.

But there was no time to indulge in evil thoughts, even had any crossed his mind. He caught her in his arms, and exclaiming the maid to follow, hurried down the stair.

Winter and the Swards were defending the foot with swinging blades. The savages were howling round like curs about a bull, and when Hereward appeared above with the women, there was a loud yell of rage and envy.

He should not have the women to himself. They would share the plunder equally—was shouted in half a dozen barbarous dialects.

'Have you left any valuables in the chamber?' whispered he to Alfrida.

'Yes, jewels—tokens—Let them have all, only save me!'

'Let me pass!' roared Hereward. 'There is rich booty in the room above, and you may have it as these ladies' ransom. Then you do not touch. Back, I say, let me pass!'

And he rushed forward. Winter and the housecarles formed round him and the women, and hurried down the hall while the savages hurried up the ladder, to quarrel over their spoil.

They were out in the courtyard, and so for the moment. But whither should he take her?

'To Earl Asbiorn,' said one of the Swards. But how to find him?

'There is Bishop Christein!' And the bishop was caught and stopped.

'This is an evil day's work, Sir Hereward.'

'Then help to mend it by taking care of these ladies, like a man of God.' And he explained the case.

'You may come safely with me, my poor lamb,' said the bishop. 'I am glad to find something to do fit for a churchman. To me, my housecarles.'

But they were all off plundering.

'We will stand by you and the ladies, and see you safe down to the ships,' said Winter, and so they went off.

Hereward would gladly have gone with them, as Alfrida piteously entreated him. But he heard his name called on every side in angry tones.

'Who wants Hereward?'

'Earl Asbiorn—Here he is.'

'Those scoundrel monks have hidden all the altar furniture. If you wish to save them from being tortured to death, you had best find it.'

Hereward ran with him into the cathedral. It was a hideous sight, torn books and vestments, broken tabernacle-work, foul savages swarming in and out of every dark aisle and cloister, like wolves in search of prey, five or six ruffians aloft upon the roof-screen, one tearing the golden crown from the head of the crucifix, another the golden footstool from its feet.¹

As Hereward came up, crucifix and man fell together, crashing upon the pavement, amid shouts of brutal laughter.

He hurried past them, shuddering, into the choir. The altar was bare, the golden pallium which covered it gone.

'It may be in the crypt below. I suppose the monks keep their relics there,' said Asbiorn.

'No! Not there. Do not touch the relics! Would you have the curse of all the saints? Stay! I know an old hiding-place. It may be there. Up into the steeple with me.'

And in a chamber in the steeple they found the golden pall, and treasures countless and wonderful.

'We had better keep the knowledge of this to ourselves awhile,' said Earl Asbiorn, looking with greedy eyes on a heap of wealth such as he had never beheld before.

'Not we! Hereward is a man of his word, and we will share and share alike.'

'What will you?' And Asbiorn caught him by the arm. 'This treasure belongs of right to Swoyn the king.'

¹ The crucifix was probably of the Greek pattern, in which the figure stood upon a flat slab projecting from the cross.

'It belongs to St. Peter, who must lend it to-day to save the poor fen-men from robbers and ravishers, and not to any king on earth. Take golf thine hand, jarl, if thou wouldst keep it safe on thy body.'

Ashorn drew back, gnashing his teeth with rage. To strike Hereward was more than he, or any Berserker in his host, dared do and besides, he felt that Hereward's words were just.

'Hither!' shouted Hereward down the stair. 'Up hither, Vikings, Berserkers, and sea cocks all! Here, Jutlanders, Jomsburgers, Letts, Finns, with their sons and devils' sons all! Here is gold, here is the dwarf's work, here is the dragon's hoard! Come up and take your Polakaswarf! You would not get a richer out of the kaiser's treasury. Here, wolves and ravens, eat gold, drink gold, roll in gold, and know that Hereward is a man of his word, and pays his soldiers' wages royally.'

They rushed up the narrow stair, trampling each other to death, and thrust Hereward and the earl, choking, into a corner. The room was so full for a few moments that some died in it. Hereward and Ashorn, protected by their strong armour, forced their way to the narrow window, and breathed through it, looking out upon the sea of flame below.

'I am sorry for you, jarl,' said Hereward. 'But for the poor Englishmen's sake, so it must be.'

'King Sweyn shall judge of that. Why dost hold my wrist, man?'

'Daggers are apt to get loose in such a press as this.'

'Always the Wake,' said Ashorn, with a forced laugh.

'Always the Wake. And as thou saidst, King Sweyn the just shall judge between us.'

Jarl Ashorn swung from him, and into the now thinning press. Soon only a few remained, to watch, by the glare of the flames, for what their fellows might have overlooked.

'Now the play is played out,' said Hereward, 'we may as well go down and to our ships.'

Some drunken ruffians would have leaped the church for mere mischief. But Ashorn, as well as Hereward, stopped that. And gradually they got the men down to the ships, some drunk, some struggling under plunder, some cursing and quarrelling because nothing had fallen to their lot. It was a hideous scene. But one to which Hereward, as well as Ashorn, was too well accustomed to see aught in it save an hour's inevitable trouble in getting the men on board.

The monks had all fled. Only Leofwin the Long was left, and he lay sick in the infirmary. Whether he was burnt therein, or saved by Hereward's men, was not told.

And so was the Golden Borough sacked and burnt. Now then, whither?

The Danes were to go to Ely, and join the army there. Hereward would march on to Stamford; secure the town if he could; then to Huntingdon, to secure it likewise, and on to Ely afterwards.

'You will not leave me among these savages?' said Alfrida.

'Heaven forbid! You shall come with me as far as Stamford, and then I will set you on your way.'

'My way?' said Alfrida, in a bitter and hopeless tone.

Hereward mounted her on a good horse, and rode beside her, looking and he well knew it a very perfect knight. Soon they began to talk. What had brought Alfrida to Peterborough, of all places on earth?

'A woman's lot! Because I am rich—and some say fair. I am a puppet, a slave, a prey. I was going back to my—to Dulfen.'

'Have you been away from him, then?'

'What? Do you not know?'

'How should I know, lady?'

'Yes, most true. How should Hereward know anything about Alfrida? But I will tell you. Maybe you may not care to hear.'

'About you? Anything I have often longed to know how what you were doing?'

'Is it possible? Is there one human being left on earth who cares to hear about Alfrida? Then listen. You know that when Gospatric fled to Scotland his sons went with him— young Gospatric, Waltheof,¹ and he, Dollin. Ethelred's, his girl, went too—and she is to marry, they say, Duncan, Malcolm's eldest son by Ingelborg, so Gospatric will find himself, some day, father-in-law of the King of Scots.'

'I will warrant him to find his nest well lined, wherever he be. But of yourself?'

'I refused to go. I could not face again that bleak black North. But that is no concern of Hereward's—'

Hereward was on the point of saying, 'Can anything concern you, and not be interesting to me?'

But she went on.

'I refused, and—'

'And he unsewed you?' asked he fiercely.

'Better if he had. Better if he had tied me to his stirrup, and scourged me along into Scotland, than have left me to new dangers, and to old temptations.'

'What temptations?'

Alfrida did not answer. But went on—

'He told me in his lofty Scots fashion, that I was free to do what I list. That he had long since seen that I cared not for him, and that he would find many a fairer lady in his own land.'

'There he lied. So you did not care for him? He is a noble knight.'

'What is that to me? Women's hearts are not to be bought and sold with their bodies, as I was sold. Care for him? I care for no creature upon earth. Once I cared for Hereward, like a silly child. Now I care not even for him.'

Hereward was sorry to hear that. Men are vainer than women, just as peacocks are vainer than peahens, and Hereward was—alas for him!—a specially vain man. Of course, for him to fall in love with Alfrida would have been a shameful sin, he would not have committed it for all the treasures of Constantinople; but it was a not unpleasant thought that Alfrida should fall in love with him. But he only said, tenderly and courteously—

'Alas! poor lady!'

'Poor lady! Too true, that last. For whither am I going now? Back to that man once more.'

'To Dolfin?'

'To my master, like a innaway slave. I went down south to Queen Matilda. I knew her well, and she was kind to me, as she is to all things that breathe. But now that Gospatric is come into the king's grace again, and has bought the earldom of Northumbria, from Tesc to Tyne—'

'Bought the earldom?'

'That has he, and paid for it right heavily.'

'Traitor and fool! He will not keep it seven years. The Frenchman will pick a quarrel with him, and cheat him out of earldom and money too.'

'The which William did, within three years.'

'May it be so! But when he came into the king's grace, he must needs demand me back in his son's name.'

'What does Dolfin want with you?'

'His father wants my money, and stipulated for it with the king. And besides, I suppose I am a pretty plaything enough still.'

'You? You are divine, perfect. Dolfin is right. How could a man who had once enjoyed you live without you?'

Alfrida laughed, a laugh full of meaning, but what that meaning was, Hereward could not divine.

'So now,' she said, 'what Hereward has to do, as a true and courteous knight, is to give Alfrida safe conduct, and, if he can, a guard, and to deliver her up loyally and knightly to his old friend and fellow-warrior, Dolfin (his patrimonial earl of whatever he can lay hold of for the current month).'

'Are you in earnest?'

Alfrida laughed one of her strange laughs, looking straight before her. Indeed she had never looked Hereward in the face during the whole ride.

'What are those open holes? Graves?'

'They are Barnack stone quarries, which Waltheof the Wittol has just given away to Crowland. Better that, though, than keep them for his new French cousins to build castles withal.'

'So? That is a pity. I thought they had been graves, and then you might have covered me up in one of them, and left me to sleep in peace.'

'What can I do for you, Alfrida, my old playfellow, Alfrida, whom I saved from the bear?'

'If Alfrida had foreseen the second monster into whose jaws she was to fall, she would have prayed you to hold that terrible hand of yours, which never since, men say, has struck without victory and renown. You won your first honour for my sake. But who am I now, that you should turn out of your glorious path for me?'

'I will do anything—anything. But why unweave this noble prince a monster?'

'If he were fairer than St John, more wise than Solomon, and more valiant than King William, he is to me a monster, for I loathe him, and I know not why. But do your duty as a knight, and convey the lawful wife to her lawful spouse.'

'What cares an outlaw for law, in a land where law is dead and gone? I will do what I—what you like. Come with me to Torfrida at Bourne, and let me see the man who dares try to take you out of my hand.'

Alfrida laughed again.

'No, no. I should interrupt the doves in their nest. Besides, the biding and coming might make me envious. And I, alas! who carry misery with me round the land, might make you Torfrida jealous.'

Hereward was of the same opinion, and rode silent and thoughtful through the great woods which are now the noble park of Brighthelm.

'I have found it!' said he at last. 'Why not go to Gilbert of Ghent, at Lincoln?'

'Gilbert? Why should he befriend me?'

'He will do that or anything else, which is for his own profit.'

'Profit? All the world seems determined to make profit out of me. I presume you would, if I had come with you to Bourne.'

'I do not doubt it. This is a very wild sea to swim in, and a man must be forgiven if he catches at every bit of drift timber.'

'Selfishness, selfishness everywhere,—and I suppose you expect to gain by sending me to Gilbert of Ghent?'

'I shall gain nothing, Alfrida, save the thought that you are not so far from me—from us—but that we can hear of you—and succour to you if you need.'

Alfrida was silent. At last—

'And you think that Gilbert would not be afraid of angering the king?'

'He would not anger the king. Gilbert's friendship is more important to William, at this moment, than that of a dozen Gospatrics. He holds Lincoln town, and with it the key of Waltheof's earldom, and things may happen, Alfrida—I tell you—but if you tell Gilbert, may Hereward's curse be on you!'

'Not that! Any man's curse save yours!' said she in so passionate a voice that a thrill of fire ran through Hereward. And he recollected her scoff at Bruges—'So he could not wait for me!' And a storm of evil thoughts swept through him. 'Would to heaven!' said he to himself, crushing them gallantly down, 'I had never thought of Lincoln. But there is no other plan.'

But he did not tell Alfrida, as he had meant to do, that she might see him soon in Lincoln Castle as its conqueror and lord. If he half hoped that when that day came, Alfrida might be somewhere else.

'Gilbert can say,' he went on, stealing himself again, 'that you feared to go north on account of the disturbed state of the country, and that, as you had given yourself up to him of your own accord, he thought it wisest to detain you, as a hostage for Dolfin's allegiance.'

'He shall say so. I will make him say so.'

'So be it. Now here we are at Stamford town, and I must to my trade. Do you like to see fighting, Alfrida—the man's game, the royal game, the only game worth a thought on earth?' For you are like to see a little in the next ten minutes.

'I should like to see you fight. They tell me none is so swift and terrible in the battle as Hereward. How can you be otherwise, who slew the bear—when we were two happy children together? But shall I be safe?'

'Safe! of course,' said Hereward, who longed, peacock-like, to show off his prowess before a lady who was—there was no denying it—far more beautiful than even Torhild.

But he had no opportunity to show off that prowess. For, as he galloped in over Stamford Bridge, Abbot Thorold galloped out at the opposite end of the town through Casterton, and up the Roman road to Grantham.

After whom Hereward sent Alfrida (for he heard that Thorold was going to Gilbert at Lincoln) with a guard of knights, bidding them do him no harm, but saying that Hereward knew him to be a brave chevalier and lover of fair ladies, that he had sent him a right fair one to bear him company to Lincoln, and hoped that he would sing to her on the way the song of Roland.

And Alfrida, who knew Thorold, went willingly, since it could no better be.

After which, according to custom, Hereward tarried three days at Stamford, laying a heavy tribute on the burghesses for harbouring Thorold and his Normans, and also surprised at a drinking bout a certain special enemy of his, and chased him from room to room sword in hand, till he took refuge shamefully in an out-house, and begged his life. And when his knights came back from Grantham, he marched to Bourne.

'The next night,' says Richard of Ely, or it may be Leofric himself, 'Hereward saw in his dreams a man standing by him of mestimable beauty, old of years, terrible of countenance, in all the raiment of his body more splendid than all things which he had ever seen, or conceived in his mind, who threatened him with a great club which he carried in his hand, and with a fearful doom, that he should take back to his church all that had been carried off the night before, and have them restored utterly, each in its place, if he wished to provide for the salvation of his soul, and escape on the spot a pitiable death. But when awakened, he was seized with a divine terror, and restored in the same hour all that he took away, and so departed, going onward with all his men.'

So says the chronicler, wishing, as may be well believed, to advance the glory of St. Peter, and to purge his hero's name from the stain of sacrilege. Besides, the monks of Peterborough, no doubt, had no wish that the world should spy out their nakedness, and become aware that the Golden Borough was stripped of all its gold.

Nevertheless, truth will out. Golden Borough was Golden Borough no more. The treasures were never restored, they went to sea with the Danes, and were scattered far and wide—to Norway, to Ireland, to Denmark, 'all the spoils,' says the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, 'which reached the latter country being the pallium and some of the shrouds and crosses, and many of the other treasures they brought to one of the king's towers, and laid them up in the church. But one night, through their carelessness and drunkenness, the church was burned, with all that was therein. Thus was theminster of Peterborough burned and pillaged. May Almighty God have pity on it in His great mercy. And thus Abbot Thorold came to Peterborough. When Bishop Egbert heard this, he excommunicated the men who had done this evil. There was a great famine this year.'

Hereward, when blamed for the deed, said always that he did it 'because of his allegiance to the monastery.'

And some of the treasure, at least, he must have surely given back, he so appeased the angry shade of St. Peter. For on that night, when many long past Stamford, he and his lost their way. 'To whom a certain wonder happened, and a miracle, if it can be said that such would be worked in favour of men of blood. For while in the wild night and dark they wandered in the wood, a huge wolf met them, wagging his tail like a tame dog, and went before them on a path. And they, taking the gray beast in the darkness for a white dog, cheered on each other to follow him to his farm, which ought to be hard by. And in the silence of the midnight, that they might see their way, suddenly candles appeared, burning and clinging to the lances of all the knights—not very bright, however, but like those which the folk called candela nupharum—wills of the wisp. But none could pull them off, or altogether extinguish them, or throw them from their hands. And thus they saw their way, and went on, although astonished out of mind, with the wolf leading them until day dawned, and they saw, to their great astonishment, that he was a wolf. And as they questioned among themselves about what had befallen, the wolf and the candles disappeared, and they came whither they had been minded, beyond Stamford town, thanking God, and wondering at what had happened.

After which Hereward took Torfrida, and his child, and all he had, and took ship at Bordeney, and went for Ely. Which when Earl Warrenne heard, he laid wait for him, somnigly near Littleport but got nothing thereby, according to Richard of Ely, but the pleasure of giving and taking a great deal of bad language, and (after his men had refused, reasonably enough, to swim the Onse and attack Hereward) an arrow, which Hereward, multum se inclinans, stooping forward, says the chronicler—who probably saw the deed shot at him across the Onse, as the earl stood cursing on the top of the dyke. Which arrow flew so stout and strong, that though it sprang back from Earl Warrenne's hauberk, it knocked him almost senseless off his horse, and forced him to defer his purpose of avenging Sir Frederick his brother.

After which Hereward threw himself into Ely, and assumed, by consent of all, the command of the English who were therein.

CHAPTER XXVII

HOW THEY HAD A GREAT MEETING IN THE HALL OF ELY

THERE sat round the hall of Ely all the magnates of the east land and east sea. The abbot was on his high seat, and on a seat higher than his, prepared specially, Swegn Olsson, King of Denmark and England. By them sat the bishops, Egelwin the Englishman and Clousterien the Dane, Ashorn the young Earl Edwin and Marcar, and Swegn's two sons, and, it may be, the sons of Tosti Godwinsson, and Arkulf the greatthane, and Sward Barn, and Hereward himself. Below them were knights, Vikings, captains, great holders from Denmark, and the prior and inferior officers of Ely minster. And at the bottom of the misty hall, on the other side of the column of blue vapour which went trembling up from the great heap of burning turf amidst, were lioncavalles, monks, wild men from the Baltic shores, crowded together to hear what was done in that parliament of their betters.

They spoke like free Danes, the better from the upper end of the hall, but every man as he chose. They were well Thang, in parliament, as their forefathers had been wont to be for countless ages. Their House of Lords and their House of Commons were not yet defined from each other but they knew the rules of the house, the courtesies of debate, and, by practice of free speech, had educated themselves to bear and forbear, like gentlemen.

But the speaking was loud and earnest, often angry that day. 'What was to be done?' was the question before the house.

'That depended,' said Swegn, the wise and prudent king, 'on what could be done by the English to co-operate with them.' And what that was has been already told.

'When Tosti Godwinsson, ye bishops, jarls, knights, and holders, came to me five years ago, and bade me take my rights in this land of England, I answered him that I had not wit enough to do the deeds which Canute my uncle did, and so sat still in peace. I little thought that I should have lost in five years so much of those small wits to which I confessed, that I should come after all to take my rightful kingdom of England, and find two kings in it already, both more to the English mind than I am. While William the Frenchman is king by the sword, and Filgar the Englishman king by proclamation of earls and thanes, there seems no room here for Swegn, nephew of Canute, king of kings.'

'We will make room for you! We will make a red road from here to Winchester!' shouted the meeting, with one voice.

'It is too late. What say you, Hereward Teofresson, who go for a wise man among men?'

Hereward rose, and spoke gracefully, earnestly, eloquently. But he could not deny Swegn's plain words.

'The Wake beats about the bush,' said Jarl Ashorn, rising when Hereward sat down. 'None knows better than he that all is over. Earl Edwin and Earl Marcar, who should have helped us along Watling Street, are here fugitives. Earl Gospatric and Earl Walth of are William's men now, soon to raise the landsfolk against us. We had better go home before we have eaten up the monks of Ely.'

Then Hereward rose again, and without an openly insulting word poured forth his scorn and rage upon Ashorn. Why had he not kept to the agreement which he and Countess Gyda had made with him through Tosti's sons? Why had he wasted time and men from Dover to Porwich, instead of coming straight into the fen, and in wading inland to succour Marcar and Edwin? Ashorn had ruined the plan, and he only, if it was ruined.

'And who was I, to obey the Wake?' asked Ashorn fiercely.

'And who wert thou, to disobey me?' asked Swegn in a terrible voice. 'Hereward is right. We shall see what thou sayest to all this, in full Thang at home in Denmark.'

Then Edwin rose, entreating peace. 'They were beaten. The hand of God was against them. Why should they struggle any more? Or, if they struggled on, why should they involve the Danes in their own ruin?'

Then man after man rose, and spoke rough Danish common sense. They had come hither to win England. They had found it won already. Let them take what they had got from Peterborough, and go.

Then Winter sprang up. 'Take the pay, and sail off with it, without having done the work? That would be a noble tale to carry home to your fair wives in Jutland. I shall not call you middeging, being a man of peace, as all know. Whereat all laughed, for the doughty little man had not a hand's breadth on head or arm without its scar. 'But if your ladies call you me, you must have a shrewd answer to give, beside knocking them down.'

Sweyn spoke without rising. 'The good knight forgets that this expedition has cost Denmark already nigh as much as Harold Hardraade's cost Norway. It is hard upon the Danes, if they are to go away empty handed as well as disappointed.'

'The king has right!' cried Hereward. 'Let them take the plunder of Peterborough as pay for what they have done, and what besides they would have done if Ashorn the jarl may, men of England, let us be just!—what Ashorn himself would have done if there had been heart and wit, one mind and one purpose, in England. The Danes have done their best. They have shown themselves what they are, our blood and kin. I know that some talk of treason, of bribes. Let us have no more such vain and foul suspicions. They came as our friends, and as our friends let them go, and leave us to fight out our own quarrel to the last drop of blood.'

'Wohl! God!' said Sweyn, 'thou wouldst go too, thou good knight. Here, earls and gentlemen of England! Sweyn Ulsson offers to every one of you, who will come to Denmark with him, shelter and hospitality till better times shall come.'

Then arose a mixed cry. Some would go, some would not. Some of the Danes took the proposal cordially, some feared bringing among themselves men who would needs want land, of which there was none to give. If the English came, they must go up the Baltic, and conquer fresh lands for themselves from heathen Letts and Finns.

Then Hereward rose again, and spoke so nobly and so well that all ears were cheered.

They were Englishmen, and they would rather die in their own merry England than win new kingdoms in the cold north-east. They were sworn, the leaders of them, to die or conquer, fighting the accursed Frenchman. They were bound to St. Peter and to St. Guthlac, and to St. Felix of Ramsey, and St. Etheldreda the holy virgin beneath whose roof they stood, to defend against Frenchmen the saints of England whom they despised and blasphemed, whose servants they cast out, thrust into prison, and murdered, that they might bring in Frenchmen from Normandy, Italians from the Pope of Rome. Sweyn Ulsson spoke as became him, as a prudent and a generous prince, the man who alone of all kings defied and fought the great Hardraade till neither could fight more, the true nephew of Canute the king of kings: and they thanked him, but they would live and die Englishmen.

And every Englishman shouted, 'Hereward is right! We will live and die fighting the French.'

And Sweyn Ulsson rose again, and said with a great oath, 'That if there had been three such men as Hereward in England, all would have gone well.'

Hereward laughed. 'Thou art wrong for once, wise king. We have failed, just because there were a dozen men in England as good as I, every man wanting his own way, and too many cooks have spoiled the broth. What we wanted is not a dozen men like me, but one like thee, to take us all by the back of the neck and shake us soundly, and say, "Do that or die!"'

And so, after much talk, the meeting broke up. And when it broke up, there came to Hereward in the hall a noble-looking man of his own age, and put his hand within his, and said—

'Do you not know me, Hereward Leofricsson?'

'I know thee not, good knight, more pity, but by thy dress and carriage, thou shouldst be a true Vikingsson.'

'I am Sigtryg Ramaldsson, now king of Waterford. And my wife said to me, "If there be in wherry or saint-leasiness, remember this: that Hereward Leofricsson slew the ogre, and Hannibal of Munster likewise, and brought me safe to thee. And, therefore, if thou provest false to him, murthering thou art, and no murthering is spouse of mine."

'Thou art Sigtryg Ramaldsson!' cried Hereward, clasping him in his arms, as the scenes of his wild youth rushed across his mind. 'Better is old wine than new, and old friends like-wise.'

'And I, and my five ships are thine to do with. Let who will go back.'

'They must go,' said Hereward, half perversely. 'Sweyn has right, and Ashorn too. The game is played out. Sweep the chessmen off the board, as Earl Ul did by Canute the king.'

'And lost his life thereby. I shall stand by, and see thee play the last pawn.'

'And lose thy life in like wise.'

'What matter? I heard thee sing—

'''A bed-death, a priest death,
A stew death, a cow death,
Such death like a cat too.'''

Nor likes it me either, Hereward Leofricsson.'

So the Danes sailed away, but Sigtryg Ramaldsson and his five ships remained.

Hereward went up to the minister tower, and watched the Ouse flashing with countless oars northward toward Southey Fen. And when they were all out of sight, he went back, and lay down on his bed, and wept—once and for all. Then he arose, and went down into the hall to abbots and monks, and earls and knights, and was the boldest, cheeriest, wittiest of them all.

'They say,' quoth he to Torfrida that night, 'that some men have gray heads on green' shoulders. I have a gray heart in a green body.'

'And my heart is growing very gray too,' said Torfrida.

'Certainly not thy heart! And he played with her raven locks.

'That may come, too, and too soon.'

For, indeed, they were in very evil case.

CHAPTER XXVIII

HOW THEY FOUGHT AT ALDRETH

WHEN William heard that the Danes were gone, he marched on Ely, as on an easy prey.

Ivo Taillebois came with him, hungry after those Spalding lands, the rents whereof Hereward had been taking for his men for now twelve months. William de Warrene was there, vowed to revenge the death of Sir Frederick, his brother. Ralph Guader was there, flushed with his success at Norwich. And with them were all the Frenchmen of the east, who had been either expelled from their lands or were in fear of expulsion.

With them, too, was a great army of mercenaries, ruffians from all France and Flanders, hired to fight for a certain term, on the chance of plunder or of fiefs in land. Their brains were all aflame with the tales of monstrous riches hidden in Ely. There were there the jewels of all the monasteries round, there were the treasures of all the fugitive English nobles, there were there—what was there not? And they grumbled when William halted them and huddled them at Cambridge, and began to feel cautiously the strength of the place—which must be strong, or Hereward and the English would not have made it their camp of refuge.

Perhaps he rode up to Madingley windmill, and saw fifteen miles away, clear against the sky, the long line of what seemed nought but a low upland park, with the minster tower among the trees, and between him and them, a rich champaign of grass, over which it was easy enough to march all the armies of Europe, and thought Ely an easy place to take. But men told him that between him and those trees lay a black abyss of mud and peat and reeds, Haddenham fen and Suthly fen, with the deep sullen West water or 'Ald-recho'¹ of the Ouse winding through them. The old Roman road to Strettham was sunk and gone long since under the bog, whether by English neglect, or whether (as some think) by actual and bodily sinking of the whole land. The narrowest space between dry land and dry land was a full half-mile, and how to cross that half mile, no man knew.

¹ I give the supposed etymologies of one of the various spellings of 'Aldreth', now Aldreth. A better is Aldreth, the Alderthore, a better still, perhaps, St. Etheldreda, or Audrey, herself. St. Audrey's Causeway leads to the spot, St. Audrey's well is, or was, on the slope above, and the name of the place may be simply Audrey's Hythe.

What were the approaches on the west? There were none. Beyond Earith, where now run the great washes of the Bedford Level, was a howling wilderness of meres, eas, reed-beds, and floating alder-beds, through which only the few men wandered, with leaping-pole and log-canoes.¹

What in the east? The dry land neared the island on that side. And it may be that William rowed round by Burwell to Fordham and Soham, and thought of attempting the island by way of Burroway, and saw beneath him a labyrinth of islands, meres, fens, with the Cam, increased by the volume of the Ouse, spreading far deeper and broader than now between Burroway and Thetford-in-the-Isle, and saw, too, that a disaster in that labyrinth might be a destruction.²

So he determined on the near and straight path, through Long Stanton and Willingham, down the old bridle-way from Willingham ploughed field,—every village there, and in the isle likewise, had and has still its 'field,' or ancient clearing of ploughed land—and then to try that terrible half mile, with the courage and wit of a general to whom human lives were as those of the gnats under the hedge.

So all his host carried themselves in Willingham field, by the old earthwork which men now call Belar's Hills, and down the bridle-way poured countless men, bearing timber and faggots, out from all the hills, that they might bridge the black half-mile.

They made a narrow firm path through the reeds, and down to the brink of the Ouse, if bank it could be called, where the water, rising and falling a foot or two each tide, covered the floating peat for many yards, before it sank into a brown depth of bottomless slime. They would make a bottom for themselves by driving piles.

The piles would not hold, and they began to make a floating bridge with long beams, say the chronicles, and blown-up cattle-hides to float them.³

Soon they made a floating-sow, and thrust it on before them as they worked across the stream, for they were getting under shot from the island.

Meanwhile the besieged had not been idle. They had thrown up a tuff rampart on the island shore, and antemuralia et propugnacula—doubtless overhanging 'hoardings,' or scaffolds, through the floor of which they could shower down missiles.⁴ And so they awaited the attack.

¹ The 'bridge two miles long,' which the Lib. Eliensis says that William made to the west of the isle, is surely only a traditional exaggeration of his repairs of Aldreth Causeway to the south-west. On the west, the isle must have been utterly unapproachable.

² It may be well to explain to those who do not know the fens, that the Ouse formerly parted at the Isle of Ely, half its waters running eastward by Aldreth into the Cam, half wandering northward to inundate vast morasses to the west of the isle. Through those morasses (now fertile fields), and above their level, the great works of the Bedford Level now convey the Ouse straight to the tide at Denver sluice.

³ Was this 'Hereward's Fort,' which was still shown in the fens in the days of Roger of Wendover?

contenting themselves with gliding in and out of the reeds in their canoes, and annoying the builders with arrows and cross-bow bolts.

At last the bridge was finished, and the sow safe across the Westwater, and thrust in, as far as it would float, among the reeds on the high tide. They in the fort could touch it with a pole.

The English would have destroyed it if they could. But The Wake bade them leave it alone. He had watched all their work, and made up his mind to the event.

'The rats have set a trap for themselves,' he said to his men, 'and we shall be fools to break it up, till the rats are safe inside.'

So there the huge sow lay, black and silent, showing nothing to the enemy but a side of strong plank, covered with hide to prevent its being burned. It lay there for three hours, and The Wake let it lie.

He had never been so cheerful, so confident. 'Play the man this day, every one of you, and ere nightfall you will have taught the Frenchman once more the lesson of York. He seems to have forgotten that. It is time to remind him of it.'

And he looked to his bow and to his arrows, and prepared to play the man himself, as was the fashion in those old days, when a general proved his worth by hitting harder and more surely than any of his men.

At last the army was in motion, and Willingham field opposite was like a crawling ant's nest. Brigade after brigade moved down to the reed beds and the assault began.

And now advanced along the causeway, and along the bridge, a dark column of men, surmounted by glittering steel, knights in complete mail, footmen in leather coats and jerkins, at first orderly enough, each under the banner of his lord, but more and more mingled and crowded, as each hurried forward, eager for his selfish share of the inestimable treasures of Ely. They pushed along the bridge. The mass became more and more crowded, men stumbled over each other, and fell off into the mire and water, calling vainly for help, but their comrades hurried on unheeding, in the mad thirst for spoil.

On they came in thousands, and fresh thousands streamed out of the fields, as if the whole army intended to pour itself into the isle at once.

'They are numberless,' said Torfrida, in a serious and astonished voice, as she stood by Hereward's side.

'Would they were!' said Hereward. 'Let them come on, thick and threefold. The more their numbers, the fatter will the fish below be, before to-morrow morning. Look there, already!'

And already the bridge was awaying and sinking beneath their weight. The men, in places, were ankle deep in water. They rushed on all the more eagerly, filled the sow, and swarmed up to its roof.

Then, what with its own weight, what with the weight of the laden bridge which dragged upon it from behind, the huge sow began to tilt backwards, and slide down the slimy bank.

The men on the top tried vainly to keep their footing, to hurl grapnels into the rampart, to shoot off their quarrels and arrows.

'You must be quick, Frenchmen,' shouted Hereward in derision, 'if you mean to come on board here.'

The French knew that well, and as Hereward spoke, two panels in the front of the sow creaked on their hinges, and dropped landward, forming two drawbridges, over which reeled to the attack a close body of knights, mingled with soldiers bearing scaling ladders.

They reeled between the ends of the drawbridges and the foot of the rampart was some two fathoms' breadth of black ooze. The catastrophe which The Wake had foreseen was come, and a shout of derision arose from the unseen defenders above.

'Come on, leap it like men! Send back for your horses, knights, and ride them at it like bold huntsmen!'

The front rank could not but push on, for the pressure behind forced them forward, whether they would or not. In a moment they were wallowing waist deep, trampled on, disappearing under their struggling comrades, who disengaged in their turn.

'Look, Torfrida! If they plant their scaling ladders, it will be on a foundation of their comrades' corpses.'

To the rear, through the openings of the drawbridges, a withering mass below, and turned away in horror. The men were not so merciful. Down between the boarding beams rained stones, javelins, arrows, increasing the agony and death. The scaling ladders would not stand in the mire, if they had stood a moment, the struggles of the dying would have thrown them down. And still fresh victims passed on from behind, shouting 'Dex Ave! On to the gold of Ely!' and still the sow, under the weight, slipped farther and farther back into the stream, and the foul gulf widened between besiegers and besegged.

At last one scaling ladder was planted upon the bodies of the dead, and hooked firmly on the gunwale of the boarding. Ere it could be hauled off again by the English, it was so crowded with men that even Hereward's strength was insufficient to hit it off. He stood at the top, ready to hew down the first comer, and he hewed him down.

But the French were not to be daunted. Man after man dropped dead from the ladder top,—man after man took his place, sometimes scrambling over each other's backs.

The English, even in the insolence of victory, cheered them with honest admiration. 'You are fellows worth fighting, you French!'

'So we are,' shouted a knight, the first and last who crossed that parapet, for, thrusting Hereward back with a blow of his sword-hilt, he staggered past him over the hoarding, and fell on his knees.

A dozen men were upon him but he was up again and shouting—

'To me, men-at-arms! A Deda! A Deda!'

But no man answered.

'Yield!' quoth Hereward.

Sir Deda answered by a blow on Hereward's helmet, which felled The Wake to his knees, and broke the sword into twenty splinters.

'Well hit!' said Hereward, as he rose. 'Don't touch him, men! this is my quarrel now. Yield, sir! you have done enough for your honour. It is madness to throw away your life.'

The knight looked round on the fierce ring of faces, in the midst of which he stood alone.

'To none but The Wake.'

'The Wake am I.'

'Ah,' said the knight, 'had I but hit a little harder!'

'You would have broke your sword into more splinters. My weapon is enchanted. So yield like a reasonable and valiant man.'

'What care I?' said the knight, stopping on to the earthwork, and sitting down quietly. 'I vowed to St. Mary and King William that into Ely I would get this day, and on Ely I am, so I have done my work.'

'And now you shall taste—as such a gallant knight deserves—the hospitality of Ely.'

It was Thurfrida who spoke.

'My husband's prisoners are mine, and I, when I had them such gallant knights as you are, have no lighter chains for them than that which a lady's power can afford.'

Sir Deda was going to make an equally courteous answer, when over and above the shouts and curses of the combatants rose a yell so keen, so dreadful, as made all hurry forward to the rampart.

That which The Wake had foreseen was come at last. The bridge, strained more and more by its living burden, and by the falling tide, had parted,—not at the Ely end, where the sliding of the sow took off the pressure, but at the end nearest the camp. One skyline roll it gave, and then, turning over, engulfed in that foul stream the flower of Norman chivalry, leaving a line—a full quarter of a mile in length—of wretches drowning in the dark water, or, more hideous still, in the bottomless slime of peat and mud.

Thousands are said to have perished. Their armour and weapons were found at times by delvers and dykers's adventures after; are found at times unto this day, beneath the rich drained cornfields which now fill up that black half-mile, or in the bed of the narrow brook to which the Westwater, robbed of its streams by the Bedford Level, has dwindled down at last.

William, they say, struck his tents and departed forthwith, 'groaning from deep grief of heart.' Eastward he went, and encamped the remains of his army at Brandon, where he seems to have begun that castle, the ruins of which still exist in Westing Park hard by. He put a line of sentinels along the Reach-lyke, which men now call the Devil's Ditch, and did his best to blockade the isle, as he could not storm it. And so ended the first battle of Aldreth.

CHAPTER XXIX

HOW SIR DEDA BROUGHT NEWS FROM ELY.

A MONTH after the fight, there came into the camp at Brandon riding on an ambling palfrey, himself fat and well-looking, none other than Sir Deda.

Boisterously he was received, as one alive from the dead, and questioned as to his adventures and sufferings.

'Adventures I have had, and strange ones, but as for sufferings instead of fetter-galls, I bring back, as you see, a new suit of clothes, instead of an empty and starved stomach, a surfeit from good victuals and good liquor, and whereas I went into Ely on foot, I came out on a fast hackney.'

So into William's tent he went, and there he told his tale.

'So, Deda, my friend?' quoth the duke in high good humour, for he loved Deda. 'You seem to have been in good company.'

'Never in better, sir, save in your presence. Of the earls and knights in Ely, all I can say is, God's pity that they are rebels, for more gallant and courteous knights or more perfect warriors never saw I either in Normandy or at Constantinople, among the Varangers themselves.'

'Eh? and what are the names of these gallants, for you have used your eyes and ears, of course?'

'Edwin and Morcar, the earls—two fine young lads.'

'I know it. Go on,' and a shade passed over William's brow as he thought of his own falsehood, and of his fair daughter, weeping in vain for the fair bridegroom whom he had promised to her.

'Sward Barn, as they call him, the boy Orsur, and Thurkil Barn. Those are the knights. Egolwin, Bishop of Durham, is there too, and besides them all, and above them all, Hereward the Wake. The like of that knight I may have seen. His better I saw I never.'

'Sir fool!' said Earl Warraine, who had not yet small blame to him for forgotten his brother's death. 'They have soured thy brains with their muddy ale, till thou knowest not friend from foe. What, hast thou to come hither praising up to the king's majesty such an outlawed villain as that, with whom no honest knight would keep company?'

'If you, Earl Warraine, ever found Deda drunk or lying, it is more than the king here has done.'

'Let him speak, earl,' said William. 'I have not an honest man in my camp, and he speaks for my information, not for yours.'

'Then for yours will I speak, sir king. These men treated me knightly, and sent me away without ransom.'

'They had an eye to their own profit, it seems,' grumbled the earl.

'But force me they did to swear on the holy Gospels that I should tell your majesty the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. And I keep my oath,' quoth Deda.

'Go on, then, without fear or favour. Are there any other men of note in the island?'

'No.'

'Are they in want of provisions?'

'Look how they have fattened me.'

'What do they complain of?'

'I will tell you, sir king. The monks, like many more, took fright at the coming over of our French men of God to set right all their filthy barbarous ways, and that is why they threw Ely open to the rebels.'

'I will be even with the sats,' quoth William.

'However, they think that danger blown over just now, for they have a story among them, which, as my lord the king never heard before, he may as well hear now.'

'Eh?'

'How your majesty should have sent across the sea a whole shipload of French monks.'

'That have I, and will more, till I reduce these swine into something like obedience to his Holiness of Rome.'

'Ah, but your majesty has not heard how one Bruman, a valiant English knight, was sailing on the sea and caught those monks. Whereon he tied a great sack to the ship's head, and cut the bottom out, and made every one of those monks get into that sack and so fall through into the sea, whereby he rid the monks of Ely of their rivals.'

'Fish! why tell me such an old wives' fable, knight?'

'Because the monks believe that old wives' fable, and are stout-hearted and stiff-necked accordingly.'

'The blood of martyrs is the seed of the Church,' said William's chaplain, a pupil and friend of Lanfranc. 'and if these men of Belial drowned every man of God in Normandy, ten would spring up in their places to convert this blighted and besotted land of Simontes and Balaamites, whose priests, like the brutes which perish, scruple not to defile themselves, and the service of the altar, with things which they unjudiciously call their wives.'

'We know that, good chaplain,' quoth William impatiently. He had enough of that language from Lanfranc himself, and, moreover, was thinking more of the Isle of Ely than of the celibacy of the clergy.

'Well, Sir Deda?'

'So they have got together all their kin, for among these monks every one is kin to a thano, or knight, or even an earl, and there they are, brother by brother, cousin by cousin, kins to knee, and back to back, like a pack of wolves, and that in a hold which you will not enter yet awhile.'

'Does my friend Deda doubt his duke's skill at last?'

'Sir duke—sir king I mean now, for king you are and deserve to be—I know what you can do. I remember how we took England at one blow on Senlac field. But see you here, sir king, how will you take an island with four such saints to guard it as St. Etheldreda, St. Wiltberga, St. Sexberga, and St. Ermenilda?'

'By promising the holy ladies,' said William, with a smile, 'to honour them better than ever did yet an English swine.'

'Amien! but again, how will you take an island where four kings such as you (if the world would hold four such at once) could not stop one churl from ploughing the land, or one bird-catcher from setting lime-twigs?'

'And what if I cannot stop the lardcatchers? Do they expect to lime Frenchmen as easily as sparrows?'

'Sparrows! It is not sparrows that I have been fattening on this last month. I tell you, sire, I have seen wild fowl alone in that island enough to feed them all the year round. I was there in the moulting time, and saw them take—one day one hundred, one two hundred, and once, as I am a belted knight, a thousand duck out of one single mere. There is a wood there, with herons spawning about the tree-tops. I did not think there were so many in the world, otters and weasels, ermines and pole-cats, for the robes, and fish for Lent and Fridays in every puddle and lot, pike and perch, roach and eels, on every old wife's table, while the knights think scorn of anything worse than snail and burbot.'

'Splendour Dex!' quoth William, who, Norman-like, did not dislike a good dunce. 'I must keep Lent in Ely before I die.'

'Then you had best make peace with the burbot-eating knights, my lord.'

'But have they flesh meat?'

'The island is half of it a garden—rich land, they say, is none in these realms, and I believe it. But besides that, there is a deer-park there with a thousand head in it, red and fallow, beside hares, and plenty of swine and goats in woods, and sheep and cattle, and if they fail there are plenty more to be got, they know where.'

² Medula (hecaton), by which the good monk means wheatears and such small birds, coots, divers, 'water-crows,' cranes and ducks.

³ 'Innumerable eels, great water wolves and pickerel, perches, roach, burbot, and murrenas, which we call water-serpents.' (These last seem to be on threat, unless the sturnus glanis still lingered as it may have done, in the waters of the Ouse.) 'Sometimes also well' (amplified), I presume, as they are still abundant in the Ouse, 'and the royal fish rambus' (turbot) surely a misnomer for the sturgeon.

⁴ That the goat as well as the stag was common in the fens the horns found in peat and gravel testify.

'They know where? Do you, sir knight?' asked William keenly.

'Out of every little island in their fens, for forty miles on end. There are the herds fattening themselves on the richest pastures in the land, and no man willing to herd them, for they are all safe among dykes and meres.'

'I will make my boats sweep their fens clean of every head—'

'Take care, my lord king, lest never a boat come back from that errand! With their narrow flat-bottomed punts, cut out of a single log, and their leaping poles, wherewith they fly over dykes of thirty feet in width—they can ambuscade in those reed-beds and alder-beds, kill whom they will, and then flee away through the marsh, like so many horse flies. And if not, one trick have they left, which they never try save when driven into a corner—but from that may all saints save us!'

'What then?'

'Killing the reeds.'

'And destroying their own cover?'

'True; therefore they will only do it in the spare.'

'Then to despair will I drive them, and try their worst. So these monks are as stout rebels as the earls?'

'I only say what I saw. At the hall-table there dined each day maybe some fifty belted knights, with every one a monk next to him, and at the high table the abbot, and the cul, and Herward and his lady. And behind each knight, and each monk likewise, hung against the wall lance and shield, helmet and hauberk, sword and axe.'

'To monk as well as knight?'

'As I am a knight myself, and were as well used, too, for aught I saw. The monks took turns with the knights as sentries, and as buskers likewise, and the knights themselves told me openly, the monks were as good men as they.'

'As wicked, you mean,' growled the chaplain, 'O accursed and bloodthirsty race, why does not the earth open and swallow you, with Korah, Dathan, and Abiram?'

'They would not care,' quoth Deda. 'They are born and bred in the bottomless pit already. They would jump over, or flounder out, as they do to their own legs every day.'

'You speak irreverently, my friend,' quoth William.

'Ask those who are in camp, and not me. As for whether they went, or how, the English were not likely to tell me. All that I know is, that I saw fresh cattle come in every few days, and fresh farns burnt, too, on the Norfolk side. There were farns burning only last night, between here and Cambridge. Ask your sentinels on the Rech-dyke how that came about!'

¹ See § 23 of the De Gestis Herewardi, presumed to be by Richard of Ely. 'And while he had hardly finished his speech, etc.' Those who love to investigate the growth of myths, may profitably amuse themselves by comparing that account with § 106 of the Liut Ellensis. The omissions will be as instructive as the insertions.

'I can answer that,' quoth a voice from the other end of the tent. 'I was on the Rech-dyke last night, close down to the fen—worse luck and shame for me.'

'Answer, then!'

quoth William, with one of his fiercest oaths, glad to have some one on whom he could turn his rage and disappointment.

'There came seven men in a boat up from Ely yestereven, and five of them were monks, they came up from Burwell fen, and plundered and burnt Burwell town.'

'And where were all your mighty men of war?'

'Ten of ours ran down to stop them, with Richard, Viscount Osbert's nephew, at their head. The villains came at a foot's pace up the Rech-dyke, and attacked them at lance-point, and before we could get to them—'

'They men had run, of course.'

'They were every one dead or wounded, save Richard, and he was fighting single-handed with an Englishman, while the other six stood around, and looked on.'

'Then they fought fairly?'

'As fairly, to do them justice, as if they had been Frenchmen, and not English churls. As we came down along the dyke, a little man of them steps between the two, and strikes up their swords as if they had been two reeds. "Come!" cries he, "enough of this. You are two stout knights well matched, and you can fight out this any other day," and away he and his men go down the dyke end to the water.'

'Leaving Richard safe?'

'Wounded a little—but safe enough.'

'And then?'

'We followed them to the boat as hard as we could, killed one of their boatmen with a javelin, and caught another.'

'Knightly done,' and William swore an awful oath, 'and worthy of valiant Frenchmen. These English set you the example of chivalry by letting your comrade fight his own battle fairly, instead of setting on him all together, and you repay them by hunting them down with darts, because you dare not go within sword's-stroke of better men than yourselves. Go! I am ashamed of you. No, stay. Where is your prisoner? For, Splendeur Dex, I will send him back safe and sound in return for Deda, to tell the knights of Ely that if they know so well the courtesies of war, William of Rennes does too.'

'The prisoner, sir,' quoth the knight, trembling, 'is—'

'You have not murdered him?'

'Heaven forbid! But—'

'He broke his bonds and escaped?'

'Gnawed them through, sir, as we supposed, and escaped through the mire in the dark, after the fashion of these accursed frogs of Girians.'

'But did he tell you nought ere he had you good murning?'

'He told us the names of all the seven. He that beat down the sword was Herward himself.'

'I thought as much. When shall I have that fellow at my side?'

'He that fought Richard was one Wenoch.'

'I have heard of him.'

'He that we took was Azer the Hardy, a monk of Nicole-Jacole. And the rest were Turstan the Younger, one Sward, another monk, Leufin the deacon, Hereward's minstrel, and Biter, the traitor monk of St. Edmund's.'

'And if I catch them,' quoth Wilham, 'I will make an abbot of every one of them.'

'Sure!' quoth the chaplain, in a deprecating tone.

CHAPTER XXV

HOW HEReward PLAYED THE POTTER, AND HOW HE CHAINED THE KING

THEY of Ely were now much straitened, being shut in both by land and water, and what was to be done, either by themselves or by the king, they knew not. Would Wilham simply starve them, or at least inflict on them so perpetual a Lent—for of fish there could be no lack, even if they ate or drove away all the fowl—as would tame down their proud spirits, which a diet of fish and vegetables, from some ludicrous theory of monastic physicians, was supposed to do? Or was he gathering vast armies, from they knew not whence, to try, once and for all, another assault on the island—it might be from several points at once?

'They must send out a spy, and find out news from the outer world, if news were to be gotten. But who would go?'

So asked the bishop, and the abbot, and the earls, in council in the abbot's lodging.

Torfrida was among them. She was always among them now. She was then Ahnna-wife, their wise woman, whose counsels all received as more than human.

'I will go,' said she, rising up like a goddess on Olympus. 'I will cut off my hair, and put on boy's clothes, and smutch myself brown with walnut leaves, and I will go. I can talk their French tongue. I know their French ways, and as for a story to cover my journey, and my doings, trust a woman's wit to invent that.'

They looked at her, with delight in her courage, but with doubt.

'If Wilham's French grooms get hold of you, Torfrida, it would not be a little walnut brown which would hide you,' said Hereward. 'But it is like you to offer—worthy of you, who have no peer.'

'That she has not,' quoth churchmen and soldiers alike.

'Nevertheless—to send you would be to send The Wake's praying half, and that would be bad religion. The Wake's fighting half is going, while you pray here as well as watch.'

¹ The Cornish—the stoutest, tallest, and most prolific race of the South—live on hardly anything else but fish and vegetables.

'Uncle, uncle!' said the young earls, 'send Winter, Gery, Leofwin Prat, any of your good men—but not yourself. If we lose you, we lose our head and our king.'

And all begged Hereward to let any man go, rather than himself.

'I am going, lords and knights; and what Hereward says he does. It is one day to Brandon. It may be two days back, for if I miscarry—as I most likely shall—I must come home round about. On the fourth day, you shall hear of me or from me. Come with me, Torfrida.'

And he strode out.

He cropped his golden locks, he cropped his golden beard, and Torfrida wept, as she cropped them, half with fear for him, half for sorrow over his stormy glories.

'I am no Samson, my lady, my strength lieth not in my locks. Now for some rascal's clothes—as little dirty as you can get me for fear of company.'

And Hereward put on filthy garments, and taking mare Swallow with him, got into a barge and went across the river to Soham.

He could not go down the Great Ouse, and up the Little Ouse, which was his easiest way, for the French held all the river below the isle, and, besides, to have come straight from Ely might cause suspicion. So he went down to Fordham, and crossed the Lark at Mildenhall, and just before he got to Mildenhall, he met a pouter carrying pots upon a pony.

'Halt, my stout churl,' quoth he, 'and put thy pots on my mare's back.'

'The man who wants them must fight for them,' quoth that stout churl, raising a heavy stall.

'Then here is he that wilt,' quoth Hereward, and, jumping off his mare, he twisted the stall out of the pouter's hands, and knocked him down therewith.

'That will teach thee to know an Englishman when thou seest him.'

'I have met my master,' quoth the churl, rubbing his head. 'But dog does not eat dog, and it is hard to be robbed by an Englishman, after being robbed a dozen times by the French.'

'I will not rob thee. There is a silver penny for thy pots and thy coat—for that I must have likewise. And if thou tellest to mortal man aught about this, I will find those who will cut thee up for dogs' meat, but if not, then turn thy horse's head and ride back to Ely, if thou canst cross the water, and say what has befallen thee, and thou wilt find there an abbot who will give thee another penny for thy news.'

So Hereward took the pots, and the pouter's clay-greased coat, and went on through Mildenhall, 'crying,' with the chronicler, 'after the manner of pouters, in the English tongue, "Pots! pots! good pots and pans!"'

But when he got through Mildenhall, and well into the rabbit-warrens, he gave mare Swallow a kick, and went over the heath so fast northward, that his pots danced such a dance as broke half of them before he got to Brandon.

'Never mind,' quoth he, 'they will think that I have sold them.' And when he neared Brandon he pulled up, sorted his pots, kept the whole ones, threw the shreds at the rabbits, and walked on into Brandon solemnly, leading the mare, and crying 'Pots!'

So 'seniper macula et deformis aspectu' lean and ill-looking—was that famous mare, says the chronicler, that no one would suspect her splendid powers, or take her for anything but a potter's nag, when she was caparisoned in proper character. Hereward felt thoroughly at home in his part, as able to play the Englishman which he was by rearing, as the Frenchman which he was by education. He was full of heart and happy. He enjoyed the keen fresh air of the warrens, he enjoyed the ramble out of the mile, in which he had been cooped up so long, he enjoyed the jest of the thing—disguise, stratagem, adventure, danger. And so did the English, who adored him. None of The Wake's crafty deeds is told so carefully and lovingly, and none, doubt it not, was so often sung in after years by farm-house hearths, or in the outlaws' lodge, as this. Robin Hood himself may have troiled out many a time, in doggerel strain, how Hereward played the potter.

And he came to Brandon, to the 'king's court,' from which William could command the streams of Wissey and Little Ouse, with all their fens, and saw with a curse the new buildings of Weeting Castle—like the rest, of which Sir F. Palgrave eloquently says—'New, and strong, and cruel in their strength—how the Englishman must have loathed the damp smell of the fresh mortar, and the sight of the heaps of rubble, and the chippings of the stone, and the blurring of the lime upon the green sward, and how hopeless he must have felt when the great gates opened, and the wains were drawn in, heavily laden with the salted beaves, and the sacks of corn and meal furnished by the royal demesnes, the manors which had belonged to Edward the Confessor, now the spoil of the stranger and when he looked into the castle court, thronged by the soldiers in bright mail, and heard the carpenters working upon the ordnance—every blow and stroke, even of the hammer or mallet, speaking the language of defiance.'

These things The Wake saw and felt, like others, hopeless for the moment. And there rang in his ears his own message to William: 'When thou art king of all England, I will put my hands between thine, and be thy man.'

'He is not king of all England yet!' thought he again, and drew himself up so proudly, that one passing by jeered him—

'There goes a bold swaggoner enough, to be selling pots abroad.' The Wake slouched his shoulder, and looked as mean a clown as ever. Next he cast about for a night's lodging, for it was dark.

Outside the town was a wretched cabin of mud and turf—such a one as Irish folk live in to this day, and Hereward said to himself, 'This is bad enough to be good enough for me.'

So he knocked at the door, and knocked till it was opened and a hideous old crone put out her head.

'Who wants to see me at this time of night?'

'Any one would, who had heard how beautiful you are. Do you want any pots?'

'Pots? What have I to do with pots, thou saucy fellow? I thought it was some one wanting a charm.' And she shut the door.

'A charm?' thought Hereward. 'Maybe she can tell me news, if she be a witch. They are shrewd souls, these witches, and know more than they tell. And if I can get any news, I care not if Satan brings it in person.'

So he knocked again, till the old woman looked out once more, and bade him angrily be off.

'But I am belated here, good dame, and afraid of the French. And I will give thee the best bit of clay on my mare's back—pot—pan—panshin—rux—jug, or what thou wilt, for a night's lodging.'

'Have you any little jars, jars no longer than my hand?' asked she, for she used them in her trade, and had broken one of late but to pay for one, she had neither money nor mind. So she agreed to let Hereward sleep there, for the value of two jars—'But what of that ugly brute of a horse of thine?'

'She will do well enough in the turf-shed.'

'Then thou must pay with a panshin.'

'Ugh!' groaned Hereward, 'thou drivest a hard bargain, for an Englishman, with a poor Englishman.'

'How knowest thou that I am English?'

'So much the better if thou art not,' thought Hereward, and bargained with her for a panshin against a lodging for the horse in the turf-house, and a bottle of bad hay.

Then he went in, bringing his panniers with him with ostentatious care.

'Thou canst sleep there on the rushes. I have nought to give thee to eat.'

'Nought needs nought,' said Hereward, threw himself down on a bundle of rush, and in a few minutes snored loudly.

But he was never less asleep. He looked round the whole place, and he listened to every word.

The devil, as usual, was a bad paymaster, for the witch's cabin seemed only somewhat more miserable than that of other old women. The floor was mud, the rafters unceiled, the stars shone through the turf roof. The only hint of her trade was a hanging shelf, on which stood five or six little earthen jars, and a few packets of leaves. A parchment, scrawled with characters which the owner herself probably did not understand, hung against the cob wall, and a human skull probably used only to frighten her patients—dangled from the roof-tree.

But in a corner, stuck against the wall, was something which chilled Hereward's blood a little,—a dried human hand, which he knew must have been stolen off the gallows, gripping in its fleshless fingers a candle, which he knew was made of human fat. That candle, he knew, duly lighted and carried, would enable the witch to walk unseen into any house on earth, yea, through the court of King William himself, while it drowned all men in preternatural slumber.

Hereward was very much frightened. He believed devoutly in the powers of a witch.

So he trembled on his rushes, and wished himself safe through that adventure, without being turned into a hare or a wolf.

'I would sooner be a wolf than a hare, of course—but—who comes here?'

And to the first old crone, who sat winking her bleared eyes, and waving her bleared hands over a little heap of peat in the middle of the cabin, entered another crone, if possible uglier.

'Two of them! If I am not roasted and eaten this night, I am a lucky man.'

And Hereward crossed himself devoutly, and invoked St. Ethelfrida of Ely, St. Guthlac of Crowland, St. Felix of Ramsey—to which last saint, he recollected, he had been somewhat remiss; but above all, St. Peter of Peterborough, whose treasures he had given to the Danes. And he argued stoutly with St. Peter and with his own conscience, that the means sanctify the end, and that he had done it all for the best.

'If thou wilt help me out of this strait, and the rest, blessed apostle, I will give thee. I will go to Constantinople but what I will win it—a golden table, twice as fine as those villains carried off, and one of the Bourne manors—Witham—or Toft or Malthorpe whichever pleases thee best, in full fee, and a—and a—'

But while Hereward was casting in his mind what gewgaw further might suffice to appease the apostle, he was recalled to business and common sense by hearing the two old hags talk to each other in French.

'His heart leaped for joy, and he forgot St. Peter utterly.'

'Well, how have you speed? Have you seen the king?'

'No, but Ivo Taillebois. Eh? Who the foul fiend have you lying there?'

'Only an English brute. He cannot understand us. Talk on only don't wake the hog. Have you got the gold?'

'Never mind.'

Then there was a grumbling and a quarrelling, from which Hereward understood that the gold was to be shared between them.

'But it is a bit of a chain. To cut it will spoil it.'

The other insisted, and he heard them clasp the gold chain in two.

'And is this all?'

'I had work enough to get that. He said, no play no pay, and he would give it me after the Isle was taken. But I told him my spirit was a Jewish spirit, that used to serve Solomon the Wise, and he would not serve me, much less come over the sea from Normandy, unless he smelt gold, for he loved it like any Jew.'

'And what did you tell him then?'

'That the king must go back to Aldreth again, for only from thence would he take the Isle, for—and that was true enough—I dreamt I saw all the water of Aldreth full of wolves, clambering over into the island on each other's backs.'

'That means that some of them will be drowned.'

'Let them drown. I left him to find out that part of the dream himself. Then I told him how he must make another causeway, bigger and stronger than the last, and a tower on which I could stand and curse the English. And I promised him to bring a storm right in the faces of the English, so that they could neither fight nor see.'

'But if the storm does not come?'

'It will come. I know the signs of the sky who better?—and the weather will break up in a week. Therefore I told him he must begin his works at once, before the rain came on, and that we would go and ask the guardian of the well¹ to tell us the fortunate day for attacking.'

'That is my business, and the other, and my spirit likes the smell of gold as well as yours. Little you would have got from me, if you had not given me half the chain.'

Then the two rose.

'Let us see whether the English hog is asleep.'

One of them came and listened to Hereward's breathings, and put her hand upon his chest. His hair stood on end, a cold sweat came over him. But he snored more loudly than ever.

The two old crones went out satisfied. Then Hereward rose, and glided after them.

They went down a meadow to a little well, which Hereward had marked as he rode thither, hung round with bits of rag and flowers, as similar 'holy wells' are decorated in Ireland to this day.

He hid behind a hedge, and watched them stooping over the well, mumbling he knew not what of canting.

Then there was a silence, and a tinkling sound as of water.

'Once—twice—thrice,' counted the witches. Nine times he counted the tinkling sound.

'The ninth day—the ninth day, and the king shall take Ely,' said one in a cracked scream, rising and shaking her fist towards the Isle.

Hereward was more than half-minded to have put his dagger—the only weapon which he had into the two old beldames. But the fear of an outcry kept him still. He had found out already so much, that he was determined to find out more. So to-morrow he would go up to the court itself, and take what luck sent.

He slipped back to the cabin, and lay down again, and as soon as he had seen the two old crones safe asleep, fell asleep himself, and was so tired that he laid till the sun was high.

'Get up!' screamed the old dame at last, kicking him, 'or I shall make you give me another cruck for a double night's rest.'

He paid his lodging, put the panniers on the mare, and went on crying pots.

When he came to the outer gateway of the court, he tied up the mare, and carried the crockery in on his own back boldly. The scullions saw him, and called him into the kitchen to see his crockery, without the least intention of paying for what they took.

A man of rank belonging to the court came in, and stared fixedly at Hereward.

'You are mightily like that villain Hereward, man,' quoth he.

'Aun?' asked Hereward, looking as stupid as he could.

'If it were not for this brown face and his short hair, he is as like the fellow as a churl can be to a knight.'

'Bring him into the hall,' quoth another, 'and let us see if any man knows him.'

Into the great hall he was brought, and stared at by knights and squires. He bent his knees, rounded his shoulders, and made himself look as mean as he could.

Ivo Taillebois and Earl Warrenne came down and had a look at him.

'Hereward!' said Ivo. 'I will warrant that little slouching cur is not he. Hereward must be half as big again, if it be true that he can kill a man with one blow of his fist.'

'You may try the truth of that for yourself some day,' thought Hereward.

'Does any one here talk English? Let us question the fellow,' said Earl Warrenne.

'Hereward! Hereward! Who wants to know about that villain?' answered the potter, as soon as he was asked in English. 'Would to heaven he were here, and I could see some of you noble knights and earls paying him for me, for I owe him more than ever I shall pay myself.'

'What does he mean?'

'He came out of the isle ten days ago, nigh on to evening, and drove off a cow of mine and four sheep, which was all my living, noble knights, save these pots.'

'And where is he since?'

'In the isle, my lords, well-nigh starved, and his folk falling away from him daily, from hunger and ague-fits. I doubt if there be a hundred sound men left in Ely.'

'Have you been in thither, then, villain?'

'Heaven forbid! I in Ely! I in the wolf's den! If I went in with naught but my skin, they would have it off me before I got out again. Ah, if your lordships would but come down, and make an end of him once for all, for he is a great tyrant, and terrible, and devours us poor folk like so many mites in his cheese.'

'Take this babbling into the kitchen, and feed him,' quoth Earl Warrenne, and so the colloquy ended.

Into the kitchen again the potter went. The king's luncheon was preparing, so he listened to the chatter; and picked up this, at least, which was valuable to him—that the witches' story was true, that a great attack would be made from Aldreth that boats had been ordered up the river to Cottinglade,¹ and pioneers and entrenching tools were to be sent on that day to the old causeway.

But soon he had to take care of himself. Earl Warrenne's commands to feed him were construed by the cook-boys and scullions into a command to make him drunk likewise. To make a laughing-stock of an Englishman was too tempting a jest to be resisted, and Hereward was drenched (says the chronicler) with wine and beer, and sorely baited and badgered. At last one rascal hit upon a notable plan.

'Pluck out the English hog's hair and beard, and put him blindfold in the midst of his pots, and see what a smash we shall have.'

Hereward pretended not to understand the words, which were spoken in French, but when they were interpreted to him, he grew somewhat red about the ears.

Submit he would not. But if he defended himself, and made an uproar in the king's court, he might very likely find himself riding Odin's horse before the hour was out. However, haply for him, the wine and beer had made him stout of heart, and when one fellow laid hold of his beard, he resisted sturdily.

The man struck him, and that hard Hereward, hot of temper, and careless of life, struck him again, right under the ear.

The fellow dropped for dead.

Up leapt cook-boys, scullions, 'k'cheurs' (who hung about the kitchen to 'k'chee,' i.e. the platters), and all the foul mouthed rascality of a great medieval household, and attacked Hereward 'cum turris et tridentibus,' with forks and flesh hooks.

Then was Hereward aware of a great broach, or spit, before the fire, and recollecting how he had used such an one as a boy against the monks of Peterborough, was minded to use it against the cooks of Brandon, which he did so heartily, that in a few moments he had killed one, and driven the others backward in a heap.

But his case was hopeless. He was soon overpowered by numbers from outside, and dragged into the hall, to receive judgment for the mortal crime of slaying a man within the precincts of the court.

He kept up heart. He knew that the king was there, he knew that he should most likely get justice from the king. If not, he could but discover himself, and so save his life, for that William would kill him willingly, he did not believe.

So he went in boldly and willingly, and up the hall, where, on the dais, stood William the Norman.

William had finished his luncheon, and was standing at the board-side. A page held water in a silver basin, in which he was washing his hands. Two more knelt, and laced his long boots, for he was, as always, going a-hunting.

¹ Seemingly a lake, but, or canal through-Cottenham Fen to the Westwater, probably a Roman work, now obliterated.

Then Hereward looked at the face of the great man, and felt at once that it was the face of the greatest man whom he had ever met.

'I am not that man's match,' said he to himself. 'Perhaps it will all end in being his man, and he my master.'

'Silence, knaves!' said William, 'and speak one of you at a time. How came this?'

'A likely story, forsooth!' said he, when he had heard. 'A poor English potter comes into my court, and murders my men under my very eyes for mere sport. I do not believe you, rascal! You, churl,' and he spoke through an English interpreter, 'tell me your tale, and justice you shall have or take, as you deserve. I am the king of England, man, and I know your tongue, though I speak it not yet, more fully.'

Hereward fell on his knees.

'If you are indeed my lord the king, then I am safe, for there is justice in you—at least so all men say.' And he told his tale manfully.

'Splendeur Dex!' but this is a far likelier story, and I believe it. Hark you, you ruffians! Here am I, trying to conciliate these English by justice and mercy, whenever they will let me, and here are you outraging them, and driving them mad and desperate, just that you may get a handle against them, and thus rob the poor wretches and drive them into the forest from the lowest to the highest—from Ivo Taillebois there, down to your cook boys—you are all at the same game. And I will stop it! The next time I hear of outrage to married man or harmless woman, I will hang that culprit, were he Odo my brother himself!

This excellent speech was enforced with oaths so strange and terrible, that Ivo Taillebois shook in his boots, and the chaplain prayed fervently that the roof might not fall in on their heads.

'Thou sorest, man!' said William quickly, to the kneeling Hereward. 'So thou understandest French?'

'A few words only, most gracious king, which we potters pick up, wandering everywhere with our wares,' said Hereward, speaking in French, for so soon was William's eye, that he thought it safer to play no tricks with him.

Nevertheless, he made his French so execrable, that the very scullions grinned, in spite of their fear.

'Look you,' said William, 'you are no common churl, you have fought too well for that. Let me see your arm.'

Hereward drew up his sleeve.

'Potters do not carry sword scars like those, neither are they tattooed like English thanes. Hold up thy head, man, and let us see thy throat.'

Hereward, who had carefully hung down his head to prevent his throat-palms being seen, was forced to lift it up.

'Aha! So I expected. There is fair ladies' work there. Is not this he who was said to be so like Hereward? Very good. Put him in ward till I come back from hunting. But do him no harm. For' and William fixed on Hereward eyes of the most intense intelligence—'were he Hereward himself, I should be right glad to see Hereward safe and sound, my man at last, and earl of all between Humber and the fens.'

But Hereward did not rise at the hint. With a face of stupid and ludicrous terror, he made reply in broken French.

'Have mercy, mercy, lord king! Make not that head sail over us. Even Ivo Taillebois there would be better than he. Send him to be earl over the mips in hell, or over the wild Welsh who are worse still—but not over us, good lord king, whom he hath pulled and peeled till we are—'

'Silence!' said William, laughing, as did all round him. 'Thou art a cunning rogue enough, whoever thou art. Go into limbo, and behave thyself till I come back.'

'All saints send you grace good sport, and thereby men good deliverance,' quoth Hereward, who knew that his life might depend on the temper in which William returned. So he was thrust into an outhouse, and there lucked up.

He sat on an empty barrel, meditating on the chances of his submitting to the king after all, when the door opened, and in strode one with a drawn sword in one hand, and a pair of leg-shackles in the other.

'Hold out thy shins, fellow! Thou art not going to sit at thine ease there like an abbot, after killing one of us grooms, and bringing the rest of us into disgrace. Hold out thy legs, I say!'

'Nothing ensue,' quoth Hereward cheerfully, and held out a leg. But when the man stooped to put on the fetters, he received a kick which sent him staggering.

After which he recollected very little, at least in this world. For Hereward cut off his head with his own sword.

After which (says the chronicler) he broke away out of the house, and over garden walls and palings, by lung and running, till he got to the front gate, and leaped upon mure Swallow.

And none saw him, save one unlucky groom-boy, who stood yelling and cursing in front of the mure's head, and went to seize her huddle.

Whereon, between the imminent danger and the bad language, Hereward's blood rose, and he smote that unlucky groom-boy—but whether he slew him or not, the chronicler had rather not say.

Then he shook up mure Swallow, and with one great shout of 'A Wake! A Wake!' rode for his life, with knights and squires (for the hue and cry was raised) galloping at her heels.

Who then were astonished but those knights, as they saw the ugly potter's garzon gaining on them, length after length, till she and her rider had left them far behind!

Who then was proud but Hereward, as the mare tucked her great thighs under her, and swept on over heath and rabbit-hurrow, over rush and fen, sound ground and rotten all alike to that enormous stride, to that keen bright eye which foresaw every footfall, to that raking shoulder which picked her up again at every stagger?

Herward laid the bridle on his neck, and let her go. Fall she could not, and tire she could not, and he half wished she might go on for ever. Where could a man be better than on a good horse, with all the cares of this life blown away out of his brains by the keen air which rushed round his temples? And he galloped on, as cheery as a boy, shouting at the rabbits as they scuttled from under his feet, and laughing at the doctrel as they postured and anticked on the mole hills.

But when he got through Mildenhall, he began to think how he should get home to Ely.

The linc and cry would be out against him. The ports and ferries to the east of the isle as far south as Cambridge would be guarded, and all the more surely, on account of the approaching attack. True, he knew many a path and ford which the French could not know, but he feared to trust himself in the labyrinth of fens and meres, with a mob of pursuers at his heels. A single mistake might pound him among morasses, and force him, even if he escaped himself through the reeds, to leave the mare behind. And to do that was shame and loss intolerable. No! Mare Swallow, for her own sake, must do a deed that day.

He would go south by the Roman roads. He would go right round the fens, round Cum-bulge itself, into the western forests. There he could he hid till some friend at Summersham or Earth should ferry him over to the western side of the isle. The distance was great, well-nigh fifty miles, but the land was light and sound, and the going safe and good. It must be done. It should be done.

He gathered the mare together, as he rose the slope of Kennet Heath. She was going steadily and soundly, breathing like a sleeping child. His pursuers were two miles behind, black dots among the barrows on Barton Hill. He had time to rest her, and trotted on steadily, keeping to the uplands and the high road, from whence he could see far and wide over the land.

On by Newmarket Heath—nameless and desert then—over smooth chalk soil, through glades of fern and thorn, past barrows where slept the heroes of old times, Briton, Roman, Saxon, Dane, forefathers of his own, perhaps, among them. Ay—that was the place for a hero to sleep in. Not choked in a minster charnel-house, amid green damp and drowning monks, but out under the free sky, with his weapons round him, his horse, his dog, the antlers of his game, where he might come up out of his barrow on moonlight nights, and stare at the flying clouds, and scent the rushing breeze. Ah, that he could be buried there, but then Torfrida—he should like to be by her.

He was at the Rech-dyke now, and warily he looked eastward, as he led the mare up the steep bank, for French scouts between him and the fens, but none were within sight.

He paused upon the top of that great earth-work. Dangerous as it was to stop in that exposed height, making himself a beacon against the sky, he could not but look down, and back, at all which remained of free English soil.

He looked down over Swaffham, Quy, and Waterleach, and the rest of the tree-embowered hamlets which fringed the fen, green knolls on the shore of a boundless sea of pale-blue mist, and above that sea, to the far north, a line of darker blue, which was the sacred isle. As the sun sank lower, higher rose the mist, and the isle grew more and more faint, vaporous, dreamy, as fen-distances are wont to be. Was it not about to fade away in reality, to become a vapour, and a dream, and leave him alone and free? Earls, knights, housecarles, monks, seemed all becoming phantoms, fading with their fading cause. Was it worth while to fight, to die, for them, for anything? What was William to him? What was England? Why play out the lost game to the last? Why not leave all behind, and ride down south—to the sea—the free sea, and the wild joys of the Viking's life? And he led the mare down the Rech-dyke, and up again on to the down, faltering, stopping, his head sunken on his breast, his heart sunken within.

But Torfrida—Torfrida and the little girl. They at least were not phantoms. They could not vanish, could not even die—to him. His they were for ever. What hand had been putting boy's dreams into his head?

And he sprang hastily into the saddle, as one that flees from a temptation. 'Home, mare! Home to prison again! We have been out far too long, old lass! too long!'

He held on over the Fleam-dyke, but he feared to turn downwards into the Cambridge flats, and kept his vantage-ground upon the downs, till, on the top of the Gogmagog, he struck the old Roman road, which men call 'Wort's Causeway' at this day. Down that he turned, short to the right, toward the green meadows, and the long line of mighty elms, and the little village which clustered, unconscious of its coming glories, beneath the new French keep, beside the Roman bridge.

The setting sun gilded the white fints of the keep, and Hereward looked on them with a curse. But it gilded, too, the tree-tops of the great forest beyond, and Hereward uttered something like a prayer to St. Etheldreda and her ladies three. For if he could but reach that forest, he was safe.

The Wake was, of course, too wise to go through Cambridge street, under the eyes of the French garrison. But he saw that the Roman road led straight to a hamlet some mile above the town, and at the road end, he guessed, there must be either a bridge or a ford. There he could cross the Cam. And he rode slowly downward, longing for it to grow dark, and saving the mare, in case she should be needed for a sudden rush.

And a rush was soon needed. For on the hill behind him he saw armour glitter in the red light, and a brace of knights. They paused for a moment, and then espied him. One galloped down the road toward him, the other spurred to the right, straight for Cambridge.

'I shall have the whole pack of wolves out, and on me, in half an hour,' thought Hereward, and struck spurs into the mare.

Into the ford—by Chaucer's after famous mill—he dashed, making more splash than ever did ~~grooms~~ in Shelford Fen, and out again, and on to the clay wold, and away for Coton and Madingley rise, and the black wall of oak, and ash, and elm.

And as he entered the forest at Madingley, he rose in his stirrups, with a shout of 'A Wako! A Wako!' which was heard, for aught he cared, in Cambridge Castle, and then rode on leisurely toward the Drytoons, and the ferry over the Ouse at Holywell, for well he knew that they who could not catch The Wake in the held, were still less like to catch him in the wood.

And so through the forest, by a clean moonlight (says the chronicler), he came in the early morning to the Isle Somersham, which was then all deep wood (as the names of Woodlunst and Somersham Parks still testify), and was fenced over at Earith by one of his many friends into the Isle of Ely.

And of all those knights that followed him, none ever saw or heard sign of him, save one, and his horse came to a standstill in 'the aforesaid wood,' and he rolled off and lay breathless under a tree, looking up at his horse's heaving flanks and wagging tail, and wondering how he should get out of that place before the English found him and made an end of him.

Then there came up to him a ragged Churl, and asked him who he was, and offered to help him.

'For the sake of God and courtesy,' quoth he, his French pride being well-nigh beat out of him, 'if thou hast seen or heard anything of Hereward the Wako, good fellow, tell me, and I will repay thee well.'

'As thou hast asked me for the sake of God and of courtesy, sir knight, I will tell thee. I am The Wake. And in token thereof, thou shalt give me thy lance and sword, and take instead this sword which I earned off from the king's court at Brandon, and promise me, on the faith of a knight, to bear it back to King William; and tell him, that Hereward and he have met at last, and that he had best beware of the day when they shall meet again.'

So that knight, not having recovered his wind, was fain to submit, and go home a sadder and a wiser man. And King William laughed a royal laugh, and commanded his knights that they should in no wise harm The Wake, but take him alive, and bring him in, and they should have great rewards.

Which seemed to them more easily said than done.

CHAPTER XXXI

HOW THEY FOUGHT AGAIN AT ALDRETH

HERWARD came back in fear and trembling after all. He believed in the magic powers of the witch of Brandon, and he asked Torfrida, in his simplicity, whether she was not cunning enough to defeat her spells by counter spells.

Torfrida smiled and shook her head.

'My knight, I have long since given up such vanities. Let us not fight evil with evil, but rather with good. Bitten are payers than chains, for the former are heard in heaven above, and the latter only in the pit below. Let us and all the women of Ely go rather in procession to St. Etheldreda's well, there above the fens at Aldreth, and pray St. Etheldreda to be with us when the day shall come, and defend her own Isle, and the honour of us women who have taken refuge in her holy arms.'

So all the women of Ely walked out barefoot to St. Etheldreda's well, with Torfrida at their head, clothed in sackcloth, and with letters on her wrists, and waist, and ankles, which she viewed, after the strange, sudden, earnest fashion of those times, never to take off again till she saw the French host flee from Aldreth before the Lac of St. Etheldreda. So they prayed, while Hereward and his men worked at the fens below. And when they came back, and Torfrida was washing her feet, sore and bleeding from her pilgrimage, Hereward came in.

'You have numbed your poor soft feet, and taken nothing thereby, I fear.'

'I have. If I had walked on sharp razors all the way, I would have done it gladly, to know what I know now. As I prayed I looked out over the fen, and St. Etheldreda put a thought into my heart. But it is so terrible a one, that I fear to tell it to you. And yet it seems our only chance.'

Hereward threw himself at her feet, and prayed her to tell. At last she spoke, as one half afraid of her own words.

'Will the reeds burn, Hereward?'

Hereward kissed her feet again and again, calling her his prophetic, his saviour.

'Burn! yes, like tinder, in this March wind, if the drought only holds. Pray that the drought may hold, Torfrida.'

'There, there, say no more. How hard-hearted war makes even us women! There, help me to take off this rough sackcloth, and dress myself again.'

Meanwhile William had moved his army again to Cambridge, and on to Willingham-field, and there he began to throw up those 'globes and montans,' of which Leofric's paraphraser talks, but of which now no trace remains. Then he began to rebuild his causeway, broader and stronger, and commanded all the fishermen of the Ouse to bring their boats to Cottinglade, and ferry over his materials. 'Among whom came Hereward in a very narrow canoe, with head and head shaven lest he should be known, and worked diligently among the rest. But the sun did not set that day without mischief, for before Hereward went off, he finished his work by setting the whole on fire, so that it was all burnt, and some of the French killed and drowned.'

And so The Wake went on, with stratagems and ambushes, till 'after seven days' continual fighting, they had hardly done one day's work, save ten globes of wood, in which they intended to put their artillery. But on the eighth day they determined to attack the isle, putting in the midst of them that pythoness woman on a high place, where she might be safe freely to exercise her art.'

It was not Hereward alone who had entreated Torfrida to exercise her magic in their behalf. But she steadily refused, and made good Abbot Thurstan support her refusal by a strict declaration that he would have no fiends' games played in Ely, as long as he was abbot alive on land.

Torfrida, meanwhile, grew utterly wild. Her conscience smote her, in spite of her belief that St. Etheldreda had inspired her, at the terrible resource which she had hunted to her husband, and which she knew well he would carry out with terrible success. Pictures of agony and death floated before her eyes, and kept her awake at night. She watched long hours in the church in prayer, she fasted, she disciplined her tender body with sharp pains, she tried, after the fashion of those times, to atone for her sin, if sin it was. At last she had worked herself up into a religious frenzy. She saw St. Etheldreda in the clouds, towering over the isle, menning the French host with her virgin palm-branch. She uttered wild prophecies of ruin and defeat to the French, and then, when her frenzy collapsed, moaned secretly of ruin and defeat hereafter to themselves. But she would be bold, she would play her part, she would encourage the heroes who looked to her as one inspired, wiser and bolder than themselves.

And so it befell, that when the men marched down to Haddenham that afternoon, Torfrida rode at their head on a white charger, robed from throat to ankle in sackcloth, her fetters clanking on her limbs. But she called on the English to see in her the emblem of England captive yet unconquered, and to break her fetters and the worse fetters of every woman in England who was the toil and slave of the brutal invaders, and so fierce a triumph sparkled from her wild hawk-eyes that the Englishmen looked up to her weird beauty as to that of an inspired saint, and when the French came on to the assault there stood on the grassy mound behind the English fort a figure clothed in sackcloth, barefooted and bareheaded, with fetters shining on waist, and wrist, and ankle—her long black locks streaming in the wind, her long white arms stretched cross-wise toward heaven, in imitation of Moses of old above the battle with Amalek, invoking St. Etheldreda and all the powers of heaven, and chanting doom and defiance to the invaders.

And the English looked on her, and cried, 'She is a prophetess! We will surely do some great deed this day, or die around her feet like heroes!'

And opposite to her, upon the French tower, the old hag of Brandon howled and gibbered with filthy gestures, calling for the thunder-storm which did not come, for all above the sky was cloudless blue.

And the English saw and felt, though they could not speak it, dumb nation as they were, the contrast between the spirit of cruelty and darkness, and the spirit of freedom and light.

So strong was the new bridge that William trusted himself upon it on horseback, with Ivo Taillebois at his side.

William doubted the powers of the witch, and felt rather ashamed of his new helpmate, but he was confident in his bridge, and in the heavy artillery which he had placed in his sun tower.

Ivo Taillebois was utterly confident in his witch, and in the bridge likewise.

William waited for the rising of the tide, and when the tide was near its height, he commanded the artillery to open, and clear the fort opposite of the English. Then with crash and twang, the balistas and catapults went off, and great stones and heavy lances hurtled through the air.

'Back!' shouted Torfrida, raised almost to madness by fasting, self-torture, and religious frenzy. 'Out of you fort, every man! Why waste your lives under that artillery? Stand still this day, and see how the saints of heaven shall fight for you.'

So utter was the reverence which she commanded for the moment, that every man threw back, and crowded round her feet outside the fort.

'The cowards are fleeing already. Let you men go, sir king!' shouted Taillebois.

'On to the assault! Strike for Normandy!' shouted William.

'I fear much,' said he to himself, 'that this is some stratagem of that Wake's. But compelled they must be.'

The evening breeze curled up the reach. The great pike splashed out from the weedy shores, sending the whitefish flying in shoals into the low glare of the setting sun, and heedful not, stupid things, the barges packed with mailed men, which swarmed in the reeds on either side the bridge, and began to push out into the river.

The stailings swung in thousands round the reed-ronds, looking to settle in their wonted place but dare not, and rose and swung round again, telling each other, in their manifold pipings, how all the reed-ronds teemed with mailed men. And all above the sky was cloudless blue.

And then came a trample, a roll of many feet on the soft spongy peat, a low murmur which rose into wild shouts of 'Dex Aie!' as a human tide poured along the causeway, and past the witch of Brandon Heath.

'Dex Aie!' quoth William, with a sneer. 'Debbles Aie!' would fit better.

'If, sire, the powers above would have helped us, we should have been happy enough to. But if they will not, it is not our fault if we try below,' said Ivo Taillebois.

William laughed. 'It is well to have two strings to one's bow, sir. Forward, men! forward!' shouted he, riding out to the bridge-end, under the tower.

'Forward!' shouted Ivo Taillebois.

'Forward!' shouted the hideous hag overhead. 'The spirit of the well fights for you.'

'Fight for yourselves,' said William.

There were fifty yards of deep clear water between Frenchman and Englishman. Only fifty yards. Not only the arrows and atlast quarrels, but heavy hand-javelins, flew across every moment, every now and then a man toppled forward, and plunged into the blue depth among the eels and pike, to find his comrades of the summer before, and then the stream was still once more. The eels and water-lilies swam in and out of the reeds, and wondered what it was all about. The water-lilies flapped upon the ripple, as lonely as in the loneliest mere. But their floats were soon broken, their white cups stained with human gore. Fifty yards of deep clear water. And treasure unestimable to win by crossing it.

They thrust out barks, canoes, pontoons, they crawled upon them like ants, and thrust out more yet beyond, heedless of their comrades, who slipped, and splashed, and sank, holding out vain hands to hands too busy to seize them. And always the old witch jabbered overhead with her canting, pointing, mumbling, jaying for the storm, while all above, the sky was cloudless blue.

And always on the mound opposite, while darts and quarrels whizzed round her head, stood Torfrida, pointing with outstretched scornful finger at the strugglers in the river, and chanting loudly what the Frenchmen could not tell, but it made their hearts, as it was meant to do, melt like wax within them.

'They have a counter witch to yours, Ivo, it seems, and a fairer one. I am afraid the devils, especially if Anglo-Saxons be at hand, are more likely to listen to her than to that old brown-stick-rider aloft.'

'Fair is, that fair cause has, sir king.'

'A good argument for honest men, but none for fiends. What is the fair fiend pointing at so earnestly there?'

'Somewhat among the reeds. Hawk to her now! She is singing, somewhat more like an angel than a fiend, I will say for her.'

And Torfrida's song, coming clear and sweet across the water, rose louder and shriller till it almost drowned the jabbering of the witch.

'She sees more than we do.'

'But I see!' cried William, snatching his hand upon his thigh. 'Par le splendour Dex! She has been showing them where to fire the reeds, and they have done it.'

A puff of smoke, a wisp of flame, and then another and another, and a canoe shot out from the reeds on the French shore, and glided into the reeds of the island.

'The reeds are on her, men! Have a care,' shouted Ivo.

'Silence, fool! Frighten them once, and they will leap like sheep into that gulf. Men! right about! draw off—slowly and in order. We will attack again to-morrow.'

The cool voice of the great captain arose too late. A line of flame was leaping above the red bed, crackling and howling before the evening breeze. The column on the causeway had seen their danger but too soon, and fled, but whither?

A shower of arrows, quarrels, javelins, fell upon the head of the column as it tried to turn about and retreat, reinforcing it more and more. One arrow, shot by no common arm, went clean through William's shield, and pinned it to the mailed flesh. He could not stifle a cry of pain.

'You are wounded, sire. Ride for your life! It is worth that of a thousand of these churls,' and Ivo seized William's bridle and dragged him, in spite of himself, through the cowering, shrieking, struggling crowd.

On came the flame, leaping and crackling, laughing and shrieking, like a live head. The archers and slingers in the boats covered before it, and fell, scorched corpses, as it swept on. It reached the causeway, surged up, recoiled from the mass of human beings, then sprang over their heads and passed onwards, guarding them with flame.

The reeds were burning around them; the timbers of the bridge caught fire; the peat and faggots smouldered beneath their feet. They sprang from the burning footway, and plunged into the fathomless bog, covering their faces and eyes with scorched hands, and then sank in the black gurgling slush.

Ivo dragged William on, regardless of curses and prayers from his soldiery, and they reached the shore just in time to see between them and the water a long black smouldering withering line the morass to right and left, which had been a mound before deep reed, an open stinky pool, dotted with boatsful of shrieking and cursing men, and at the causeway end the tower, with the flame climbing up its posts, and the witch of Brandon throwing herself desperately from the top, and falling dead upon the embers, a motionless heap of rage.

'Fool that thou art! Fool that I was!' cried the great king, as he rolled off his horse at his tent door, cursing with rage and pain.

Ivo Taillebois sneaked off, sent over to Brandon for the second witch, and hanged her, as some small comfort to his son! Neither did he forget to search the cabin, till he found buried in a crock the bits of his own gold chain, and various other treasures, for which the wretched old women had bartered their souls. All which he contrived to his own use, as a much-injured man.

The next day William withdrew his army. The men refused to face again that blood-stained pass. The English spells, they said, were stronger than theirs, and than the daring of brave men. Let William take Torfrida and burn her, as she had burned them, with reeks out of Willingham fen, then might they try to storm Ely again.

Torfrida saw them turn, flee, die in agony. Her work was done; her passion exhausted, her self-torture, and the mere weight of her fetters, which she had sustained during her passion, weighed her down, she dropped senseless on the turf, and lay in a trance for many hours.

Then she arose, and, casting off her fetters and her sackcloth, was herself again—but a sadder woman till her dying day.

CHAPTER XXXII

HOW KING WILLIAM TOOK COUNSEL OF A CATHOLIC

If Torfrida was exhausted, so was Hereward likewise. He knew well that a repulse was not a defeat. He knew well the indomitable persistence, the boundless resources, of the man-triumph whom he defied, and he knew well that another attempt would be made, and then another, till—though it took seven years in the doing—Ely would be won at last. To hold out doggedly as he could was his plan to obtain the best terms he could for his comrades. And he might obtain good terms at last. William might be glad to pay a fair price in order to escape such a thorn in his side, as the camp of refuge, and might deal—or, at least, promise to deal—mercifully and generously with the last remnant of the English gentry. For himself, yield he would not when all was over, he would flee to the sea, with Torfrida and his own housecarles, and turn Viking, or go to Sweyn Ulfsen in Denmark, and die a free man.

The English did not foresee these things. Their hearts were lifted up with their victory, and they laughed at William and his French, and drank Torfrida's health much too often for their own good. Hereward did not care to undecieve them. But he could not help speaking his mind in the abbot's chamber, to Thurstan, Egelwin, and his nephews, and to Sigtryg Ragnaldson, who was still in Ely, not only because he had promised to stay there, but because he could not get out if he would.

Blockaded they were utterly, by land and water. The isle furnished a fair supply of food, and what was wanting they obtained by foraging. But they had laid the land waste for so many miles round, that their plundering raids brought them in less than of old, and if they went far, they fell in with the French, and lost good men, even though they were generally successful. So provisions were running somewhat short, and would run shorter still.

Moreover, there was a great cause of anxiety. Bishop Egelwin, Abbot of Hurstan, and the monks of Ely were in rebellion, not only against King William, but more or less against the Pope of Rome. They might be excommunicated. The minister lands might be taken away.

Bishop Egelwin set his face like a flint. He expected no mercy. All he had ever done for the French was to warn Robert Cornyn that if he stayed in Durham, evil would befall him. But that was as little worth to him as it was to the mad Robert. And no mercy he craved. The less a man had, the more fit he was for heaven. He could but die, and that he had known ever since he was a chanter-boy. Whether he died in Ely or in prison mattered little to him, provided they did not refuse him the sacraments, and that they would hardly do. But call the Duke of Normandy his rightful sovereign he would not, because he was not—nor anybody else just now, as far as he could see.

Valiant likewise was Abbot Thurstan, for himself. But he had—unlike Bishop Egelwin, whose diocese had been given to a Frenchman—an abbey, monks, and broad lands, whereof he was father and steward. And he must do what was best for the abbey, and also what the monks would let him do. For severe as was the discipline of a monastery in time of peace, yet in time of war, when life and death were in question, monks had ere now turned valiant from very far, like Cato's monks, and minted and so taught the monks of Ely.

And Edwin and Morcar!

No man knows what they said or thought, perhaps no man cared much, even in their own days. No hint does any chronicler give of what manner of men they were, or what manner of deeds they did. Fair, gentle, noble, beloved even by William, they are mere names, and nothing more, in history, and it is to be supposed, therefore, that they were nothing more in fact. The race of Leofric and Godiva had worn itself out.

One night the confederates had sat late, talking over the future more earnestly than usual. Edwin, usually sad enough, was especially sad that night.

Hereward jested with him, tried to cheer him—but he was silent, would not drink, and went away before the rest.

The next morning he was gone, and with him half a dozen of his private housecarles.

Hereward was terrified. If defections once began, they would be endless. The camp would fall to pieces, and every man among them would be hanged, mutilated, or imprisoned, one by one, helplessly. They must stand or fall together.

He went raging to Morcar. Morcar knew nought of it. On the faith and honour of a knight, he knew nought. Only his brother had said to him a day or two before that he must see his betrothed before he died.

'He is gone to William, then? Does he think to win her now—an outcast and a beggar—when he was refused her with broad lands and a thousand men at his back? Fool! See that then play not the fool likewise, nephew, or—'

'Or what?' said Morcar defiantly.

'Or thou wilt go, whither Edwin is gone—to betrayal and ruin.'

'Why so? He has been kind enough to Waltheof and Gospatric, why not to Edwin?'

'Because,' laughed Hereward, 'he wanted Waltheof, and he does not want you and Edwin. He can keep Mercia quiet without your help. Northumbria and the fens he cannot without Waltheof's. They are a rougher set as you go east and north, as you should know already, and must have one of themselves over them to keep them in good humour for a while. When he has used Waltheof as his stalking horse long enough to build a castle every ten miles, he will throw him away like a worn bowstring. Earl Morcar, nephew mine.'

Morcar shook his head.

In a week more he was gone likewise. He came to William at Brandon.

'You are come in at last, young earl?' said William sternly. 'You are come too late.'

'I throw myself on your knightly faith,' said Morcar. But he had come in an angry and unlucky hour.

'How well have you kept your own, twice a rebel, that you should appeal to mine? Take him away.'

'And hang him?' asked Ivo Taillebois.

'Fish! No—thou old butcher! Put him in irons, and send him into Normandy.'

'Send him to Roger de Beaumont, knave! Roger's son is safe in Morcar's castle at Warwick, so it is but fair that Morcar should be safe in Roger's.'

And to Roger de Beaumont he was sent, while young Roger was Lord of Warwick, and all around that once was Leofric and Godiva's.

Morcar lay in a Norman keep till the day of William's death. On his deathbed the tyrant's heart smote him, and he sent orders to release him. For a few short days, or hours, he breathed free air again. Then Rufus shut him up once more, and for ever.

And that was the end of Earl Morcar.

A few weeks after, three men came to the camp at Brandon, and they brought a head to the king. And when William looked upon it, it was the head of Edwin.

The human heart must have burst up again in the tyrant as he looked on the fair face of him he had so loved, and so wronged for they say he wept.

The knights and earls stood round, amazed and awed, as they saw iron-tears run down Pluto's cheek.

'How came this here, knaves?' thundered he at last.

They told a rambling story, how Edwin always would needs go to Winchester to see the queen, for she would stand his friend, and do him right. And how they could not get to Winchester for fear of the French, and wandered in woods and walds, and how they were set upon, and hunted, and how Edwin still was mad to go to Winchester. But when he could not, he would go to Brethwallon and his Welsh, and how Earl Randal of Chester set upon them, and how they got between a stream and the tide-way of the Dee, and were cut off. And how Edwin would not yield. And how then they slew him in self defence, and Randal let them bring the head to the king.

Thus, or something like it, was their story. But who could believe traitors? Where Edwin wandered, what he did during those months, no man knows. All that is known is, three men brought his head to William, and told some such tale. And so the old nobility of England died up and down the mts and sloughs, like wounded birds, and, as of wounded birds, none knew or cared how far they had run, or how their broken bones had ached before they died.

'Out of their own mouths they are condemned,' says Holy Writ,' thundered William. 'Hang them on high.'

And hanged on high they were, on Brandon heath.

Then the king turned on his courtiers, glad to ease his own conscience by cursing them.

'This is your doing, sirs! If I had not listened to your base counsels, Edwin might have been now my faithful hegemon and my son-in-law, and I had had one more Englishman left in power, and one sin less upon my soul.'

'And one thou less in thy side,' quoth Ivo Taillebois.

'Who spoke to thee? Ralph Guader, thou gavest me the counsel thou wilt answer it to God and His saints.'

That did I not. It was Earl Roger, because he wanted the man's Shropshire lands.'

Whereon high words ensued and the king gave the earl the lie in his teeth, which the earl did not forget.

'I think,' said the rough wharfed voice of Ivo, 'that instead of crying over spilt milk,—for milk the lad was, and never would have grown to good beef, had he lived to my age—'

'Who spoke to thee?'

'No man, and for that reason I spake myself. I have lands in Spalding, by your royal grace, and wish to enjoy them in peace, leaving worked for them hard enough—and how can I do that, as long as Hereward sits in Ely?'

'Splendour Dex!' said William, 'thou art right, old butcher.'

So they laid their heads together to slay Hereward. And after they had talked a while, then spoke William's chaplain for the nonce, an Italian, a friend and pupil of Lanfranc of Pavia, an Italian also, then Archbishop of Canterbury, scourging and imprisoning English monks in the south. And he spoke like an Italian of those times, who knew the ways of Rome.

'If his majesty will allow my humility to suggest—'

'What? Thy humility is proud enough under the rose, I will warrant. But it has a Roman wit under the rose likewise. Speak!'

'That when the secular and carnal arm has failed, as it is written—'He poureth contempt upon princes, and letteth them wander out of the way in the wildness, or fens,—for the Latin word, and I doubt not the Hebrew, has both meanings.'

'Splendeur Dex!' cried William bitterly, 'that hath he done with a vengeance! Thou art right so far, clerk!'

'Yet helpeth He the poor, vilest, His church and the religious, who are vowed to holy poverty, out of misery, vilest, the oppression of barbarous customs, and maketh them households like a flock of sheep.'

'They do that for themselves already, here in England,' said William, with a sneer at the faunted morals of the English monks and clergy.

'But Heaven and the Church do it for the true poor, whom your majesty is bringing in, to your endless glory.'

'But what has all this to do with taking Ely?' asked William impatiently. 'I asked thee for reason, and not sermons.'

'Thus. That it is in the power of the Holy Father—and that power he would doubtless allow you, as his dear son and most faithful servant, to enjoy for yourself, without sending to Rome, which might cause painful delays to—'

It might seem strange that William, Taillebois, Proot, Guader, Warwinc, short spoken, hard-headed, hard-swearing warrior, could allow complacently a smooth churchman to dawdle on thus, counting his periods on his fingers, and seemingly never coming to the point.

But they knew well that the churchman was a far cunninger, as well as a more learned, man than themselves. They knew well that they could not hurry him, and that they need not, that he would make his point at last, hunting it out step by step, and letting them see how he got thither, like a practised hound. They knew that if he spoke, he had thought long and craftily, till he had made up his mind, and that therefore he would very probably make up then minds likewise. It was the conquest—not of a heavenly spirit, though it boasted itself such—but of a cultivated mind over brute flesh.

¹ I do not laugh at Holy Scripture myself, I only insist on this as a specimen of the usual medieval 'cant'—a name and a practice, which are both derived, not from Prynne, but from monks.

They might have said all this aloud, and yet the churchman would have gone on, as he did, where he left off, with unaltered blandness of tone.

'To convert to other uses the goods of the Church. To convert them to profane uses would, I need not say, be a sacrilege as horrible to heaven, as impossible to so pious a monarch.'

Ivo Taillebois winced. He had just stolen a man from the monks at Crowland, and meant to keep it.

'To convert, I say, church lands belonging to abbays or sees, whose abbots or bishops are continuously disobedient to the Holy See, or to their lawful monarch, he being in the communion of the Church and at peace with the said Holy See. If, therefore, to come to that point at which my incapacity, through the devious windings of my simplicity, has been tending, but with halting steps, from the moment that your majesty deigned to hear—'

'Put in the spur, man!' said Ivo, tired at last, 'and run the deer to soil.'

'Hurry in man's cattle, especially thine own,' answered the churchman, with so shrewd a wink, and so cheery a voice, that Ivo, when he recovered from his surprise, cried

'Why thou art a good huntsman thyself, I believe now.'

'All things to all men, in by any means. But to return. If your majesty should think fit to proceed to the requisitions of Ely, that unless they submit themselves to your royal grace—and to that, of course, of His Holiness our Father—within a certain day, you will convert to other uses, premising, to avoid scandal, that those uses shall be for the benefit of Holy Church—all lands and manors of theirs lying without the precincts of the Isle of Ely—those lands being, as is known, large and of great value. Quid plura? Why burden your exalted intellect by detailing to you consequences which it has long ere now foreseen?'

quoth William, who was nearly as sharp as the Italian, and had seen it all. 'I will make thee a bishop!'

'Spare to burden my weakness,' said the chaplain, and slipped away into the shade.

'You will take his advice?', asked Ivo.

'I will.'

'Then I shall see that Torfrida burn at last.'

'Burn her!' and William swore.

'I promised my soldiers to burn the witch with reeds out of Haddenham fen, as she had burned them, and I must keep my knightly word.

William swore yet more. Ivo Taillebois was a butcher and a churl.

'Call me not churl and butcher too often, lord king, ere thou hast found whether thou needest me or not. Rough I may be, false was I never.'

'That thou wert not,' said William, who needed Taillebois much, and feared him somewhat, and remarked something meaning in his voice, which made him calm himself, diplomat as he was, instantly. 'But burn Torfrida thou shalt not.'

'Well, I care not. I have seen a woman burnt ere now, and had no fancy for the screeching. Besides, they say she is a very fair dame—and has a fair daughter, too, coming on—and she may very well make a wife for a Frenchman.'

'Hurry her thyself!'

'I shall have to kill this Wake first.'

'Then do it, and I will give thee his lands.'

'I may have to kill others before The Wake.'

'You may!'

And so the matter dropped. But William caught Ivo alone after an hour, and asked him what he meant.

'No pay, no play. Lord king, I have served thee well, rough and smooth.'

'Thou hast, and hast been well paid. But if I have said aught hasty—'

'Pish, king. I am a plain-spoken man, and like a plain-spoken master. But instead of marrying Torfrida or her daughter, I have more mind to her niece, who is younger, and has no Hereward to be killed first.'

'Her niece? Who?'

'Lucia, as we call her, Edwin and Morcar's sister, Hereward's niece, Torfrida's niece.'

'No pay, no play, sudsst thou? so say I. What meant you by having to kill others before Hereward?'

'Beware of Waltheof,' said Ivo.

'Waltheof? Pish. This is one of thy inventions for making me hunt every Englishman to death, that thou mayest know their bones.'

'Is it? Then thus I say more. Beware of Ralph Guader.'

'Pish!'

'Pish on, lord king.' Etiquette was not yet discovered by Norman barons and earls, who thought themselves all but as good as their king, gave him then advice when they thought fit, and if he did not take it, attacked him with all their might. 'Pish on, but listen. Beware of Roger.'

'And what more?'

'And give me Lucia. I want her. I will have her.'

William laughed. 'Thou of all men? To mix that ditch-water with that wine?'

'They were mixed in thy blood, lord king, and thou art the better man for it, so says the world. Old wine and old blood throw any lees to the bottom of the cask, and we shall have a son worthy to ride behind—'

'Take care!' quoth William.

'The greatest captain upon earth.'

William laughed again, like Odin's self.

'Thou shalt have Lucia, for that word.'

'And thou shalt have the plot on it breaks. As it will.'

'To this have I come at last,' said William to himself. 'To murder these English nobles, to marry their daughters to my groom. Heaven forgive me! They have brought it upon themselves, by contumacy to Holy Church. Call my secretary, some one.'

The Italian re-entered.

'The valiant and honorable and illustrious knight, Ivo Taillebois, Lord of Holland and Kisteven, wedd Lucia, sister of the late Eadulf Edwin and Morcar, now with the queen, and with her, her maids. You will prepare the papers.'

'I am yours to death,' said Ivo.

'To do thee justice, I think thou wert that already. Stay—here, sir priest, do you know any man who knows this Torfrida?'

'I do, king,' said Ivo. 'There is one Sir Asehu, a man of Gilling's, in the camp.'

'Send for him.'

'His Torfrida,' said William, 'haunts me.'

'Pity heaven she have not bewitched your grace.'

'Tut, I am too old a campaigner to take much harm by woman's sharpshooting, at fifteen score yards off, beside a deep stream between. No. The woman has courage and beauty too, you say.'

'What of that, O prince?' said the Italian. 'Who more beautiful shapshot be true—than those lost women who slange nightly in the forests with Venas and Herodias, as it may be this Torfrida has done many a time.'

'You priests are apt to be hard upon poor women.'

'The fox found that the grapes were sour,' said the Italian, laughing at himself and his cloth—or at anything else, by which he could curry favour.

'And this woman was no vulgar witch. That sort of personage suits Taillebois's taste, rather than Hereward's.'

'Hungry dogs eat dirty pudding,' said Ivo pertinently.

'The woman believed herself in the right. She believed that the saints of heaven were on her side. I saw it in her attitude, in her gestures. Perhaps she was right.'

'Sire!' said both by standards in astonishment.

'I would I saw that woman, and see her husband too. They are folks after my own heart. I would give them an earldom to win them.'

'I hope that in that day you will allow your faithful servant Ivo to retire to his ancestral manors in Angou, for England will be too hot for him. Sire, you know not this man—a har, a bully, a robber, a swash-buckling ruffian, who —' and Ivo ran on with furious invective, after the fashion of the Normans, who considered no name too bad for an English rebel.

'Sir Ascelin,' said William, as Ascelin came in, 'you know Hereward.'

Ascelin bowed assent.

'Are these things true which Ivo alleges?'

'The Lord Taillebois may know best what manner of man Sir Hereward has become since he himself came into this English an, which changes some folks mightily, with a hardly disguised sneer at Ivo, 'but in Flanders he was a very perfect knight, beloved and honoured of all men, and especially of your father-in-law, the great marquis.'

'He is a friend of yours, then?'

'No man less. I owe him more than one grudge, though all in fair quarrel, and one at least, which can only be wiped out in blood.'

'Eh? What?'

Ascelin hesitated.

'Tell me, sir,' thundered William, 'unless you have aught to be ashamed of.'

'It is no shame, as far as I know, to confess that I was once a sutor, as were all knights for miles round, for the hand of the once peerless Torfrida. And no shame to confess, that when Hereward knew thereof, he sought me out at a tournament, and served me as he has served many a better man before and since.'

'Over thy horse's croup, eh?'

'I am not a bad horseman, as all know, Lord King. But heaven save me, and all I love, from that Hereward. They say he has seven men's strength, and I verily can testify to the truth thereof.'

'That may be by enchantment,' interposed the Italian.

'True, sir priest. Thus I know, that he wears enchanted armour, which Torfrida gave him before she married him.'

'Enchantments again,' said the secretary.

'Tell me now about Torfrida,' said William.

Ascelin told him all about her, not forgetting to say — what, according to the chronicler, was a common report — that she had compassed Hereward's love by magic arts. She used to practise sorcery, he said, with her sorceress mistress, Richilda of Hamault. All men knew it. Arnoul, Richilda's son, was as a brother to her. And after old Baldwin died, and Baldwin of Mons and Richilda came to Bruges, Torfrida was always with her, while Hereward was at the wars.

'The woman is a manifest and notorious witch,' said the secretary.

'It seems so indeed,' said William, with something like a sigh. And so were Torfrida's early follies visited on her, as all early follies are. 'But Hereward, you say, is a good knight and true?'

'Doubtless. Even when he committed that great crime at Peterborough—'

'For which he and all his are duly excommunicated by the bishop,' said the secretary.

'He did a very courteous and honourable thing.' And Ascelin told how he had saved Alfrida, and instead of putting her to ransom, had sent her safe to Gilbert.

'A very knightly deed! He should be rewarded for it.'

'Why not burn the witch, and reward him with Alfrida instead, since your majesty is in so gracious a humour?' said Ivo.

'Alfrida? Who is she? Ay, I recollect her. Young Dolfin's wife. Why, she has a husband already.'

'Ay, but his Holiness at Rome can set that right. What is there that he cannot do?'

'There are limits, I fear, even to his power. Eh, priest?'

'What his Holiness's powers as the viceroy of Divinity on earth might be, did he so choose, it were reverent to inquire. But as he condescends to use that power only for the good of mankind, he condescends, like Divinity, to be bound by the very laws which he has promulgated for the benefit of his subjects, and to make himself only a life-giving sun, when he might be a destructive thunderbolt.'

'He is very kind, and we all owe him thanks,' said Ivo, who had a confused notion that the Pope might strike him dead with lightning, but was good-natured enough not to do so. 'Still, he might think of this plan, for they say that the lady is an old friend of Hereward's, and not over fond of her Scotch husband.'

'That I know well,' said William.

'And besides — it aught untoward should happen to Dolfin and his kin —'

'She might, with her broad lands, be a fine bait for Hereward. I see. Now, do this, by my command. Send a trusty monk into Ely. Let him tell the monks that we have determined to seize all their outlying lands, unless they surrender within the week. And let him tell Hereward, by the faith and oath of William of Normandy, that if he will surrender himself to my grace, he shall have his lands in Bourne, and a free parson for himself and all his comrades.'

The men assented, much against their will, and went out on their errand.

'You have played me a scurvy trick, sir,' said Ascelin to Ivo, 'in advising the king to give the Lady Alfrida to Hereward.'

'What? Did you want her yourself? On my honour I knew not of it. But have patience. You shall have her yet, and all her lands, if you will hear my counsel, and keep it.'

'But you would give her to Hereward?'

'And to you too. It is a poor bait, say these frugs of sun-men, that will not take two pike running. Listen to me. I must kill this accursed fox of a Wake. I hate him. I cannot eat my meat for thinking of him. Kill him I must.'

'And so must I.'

'Then we are both agreed. Let us work together, and never mind if one's blood be old and the other's new. I am neither fool nor weakly, as thou knowest.'

Ascelin could not but assent.

'Then here. We must send the king's message. But we must add to it.'

'That is dangerous.'

'So is war, so is eating, drinking; so is everything. But we must not let The Wake come in. We must drive him to despair. Make the messenger add but one word—that the king exempts from the amnesty Torfrida on account of—You can put it into more scholarly shape than I can.'

'On account of her abominable and notorious sorceries, and demands that she shall be given up forthwith, to be judged as she deserves.'

'Just so. And then for a load of reeds out of Haddenham fen!'

'Heaven forbid!' said Ascelin, who had loved her once. Would not perpetual imprisonment suffice?'

'What care I? That is the king's affair, not ours. But I fear we shall not get her. Even so Hereward will flee with her—mayhe escape to Flanders or Denmark. He can escape through a rat's hole if he will. However, then we are at peace. I had sooner kill him and have done with it, but out of the way he must be put.'

So they sent a monk in with the message, and commanded him to tell the article about the Lady Torfrida, not only to Hereward, but to the abbot and all the monks.

A curt and herce answer came back, not from Hereward, but from Torfrida herself—that William of Normandy was no knight himself, or he would not offer a knight his life, on condition of leaving his lady.

William swore horribly. 'What is all this about?' They told him—as much as they chose to tell. He was very wroth. Who was Ivo Taillebois, to add to his message? He had said that Torfrida should not burn. Taillebois was stout, for he had won the secretary over to his side meanwhile. He had said nothing about burning. He had merely supplied an oversight of the king's. The woman, as the secretary knew, could not, with all deference to his majesty, be included in an amnesty. She was liable to ecclesiastical censure, and the ecclesiastical courts.

'Ecclesiastical courts? What is this new doctrine, churchman?' asked William.

'The superstitious of sorcery, my lord king, is neither more nor less than that of heresy itself, seeing that the demons whom it invokes are none other than the old Pagan gods—and as heresy—'

William exploded with fearful oaths. He was always jealous (and wroth) for his own prerogatives. And the doctrine was novel, at least in England. Witches were here considered as offenders against the private person enchanted, rather than against the Church, and executions for witchcraft rarely, if ever, took place, unless when the witch was supposed to have injured life or property.

'Have I not given you churchmen enough already, that you must assume my king's power of life and death? Do I not shyn and torment enough, heaven forgive me! without needing you to help me?'

H. T. W.

The Italian saw that he had gone too far. 'Heaven forbid,' he said, 'that the Church should stain her hands with the blood of the worst of sinners. All she could do was, having proved guilt, to deliver the offender over to the secular arm, doubtless with merciful entreaties that there might be no shedding of blood.'

'There is none, I presume, when folks are burned alive,' quoth William with a sneer. 'So you are to be the judges, and me your executioner, eh? An honorable office, truly. Beware, an clerk! Beware!'

'If the fire of my zeal has for a moment too rashly melted the ice of my modesty—'

'Of thy craft, say—'

'My humility humbly entreats forgiveness. I do not press the matter. Only it seemed it seemed at least to me, that after the slight scandal—forgive my indecity the world to the faithful caused by your highness's unhappy employment of the witch of Bandon—'

William cursed under his breath.

'Your highness might nobly atone therefor by executing justice on a far more flagitious offender, who has openly compassed and effected the death of hundreds of your highness's otherwise invincible warriors—'

'And throw good money after bad,' said William, laughing. 'I tell thee, priest, she is too pretty to burn, were she the witch of Endor herself.'

'Be it so. Your royal clemency can always remit her sentence, even so far as to pardon her entirely, if your mercurial temper should so incline you. But meanwhile, what better could we have done, than to remind the monks of Ely that she was a sorceress, that she had committed grave crimes, and was liable to punishment herself, and they to punishment also, as her shelterers and accomplices?'

'What your highness wanted,' quoth Taillebois, 'was to bring over the monks, and I believe that message had been a good stroke toward that. As for Hereward, you need not think of him. He never will come in alive. He has sworn an oath, and he will keep it.'

And so the matter ended.

CHAPTER XXVIII

HOW THE MONKS OF ELY DID AFTER THEIR KIND

WILLIAM's bolt, or rather meeting with the Greek fire, could not have fallen into Ely at a more propitious moment.

Hereward was away, with a large body of men and many ships, foraging in the north-eastern fens. He might not be back for a week.

Ablot Thurstan—for what cause is not said—had lost heart a little while before, and fled to

K

'Angerhale, taking with him the ornaments and treasure of the church.'

Hereward had discovered his flight with deadly fear but provisions he must have, and forth he must go, leaving Ely in charge of half a dozen independent English gentlemen, each of whom would needs have his own way, just because it was his own.

Only Torfrida he took, and put her hand into the hand of Sigtryg Raulderson, and said, 'Thou true comrade and perfect knight, as I did by thy wife, do thou by mine, if aught befall.'

And Sigtryg swore first by the white Christ, and then by the head of Sleipnir, Odin's horse, that he would stand by Torfrida till the last, and then, if need was, slay her.

'You will not need, King Sigtryg. I can slay myself,' said she, as she took the Ost-Dane's hard honest hand.

And Hereward went, seemingly by Mepal or Sutton. Then came the message, and all men in Ely knew it.

Torfrida stormed down to the monks, in honest indignation, to demand that they should send to William, and purge her of the calumny. She found the chapter-door barred and bolted. They were all gabbling inside, like starlings on a foggy morning, and would not let her in. She hurried back to Sigtryg, fearing treason, and foreseeing the effect of the message upon the monks.

But what could Sigtryg do? To find out their counsels was impossible for him, or any man in Ely. For the monks could talk Latin, and the men could not. Torfrida alone knew the sacred tongue.

If Torfrida could but listen at the keyhole. Well—all was fair in war. And to the chapter-house door she went, guarded by Sigtryg and some of his housecarles and listened, with a beating heart. She heard words now incomprehensible. That men who most of them lived no better than their own sorfs, who could have no amount of wealth, not even the hope of leaving that wealth to their children—that such men should cling to wealth, strangle, forge, lie, do anything for wealth, to be used almost entirely not for themselves, but for the honour and glory of the convent—indicates an intensity of corporate feeling unknown in the outer world then or now.

The monastery would be ruined. Without this manor, without that wood, without that stone quarry, that fishery—what would become of them?

But mingled with those words were other words, unfortunately more intelligible to this day—those of superstition.

What would St. Etheldreda say? What St. Sexburga, St. Withburga, St. Ermeulda? How dare they provoke their wrath? Would they submit to lose their lands? They might do—what might they not do? Their bones would refuse ever to work a miracle again. They had been but too slack in miracle-working for many years. They might strike the isle with barrenness, the minster with lightning. They might send a flood up the fens. They might—

William the Norman, to do them justice, those valiant monks feared not, for he was man, and could but kill the body. But St. Etheldreda, a virgin goddess, with her three maidens, and indeed, all the host of heaven to back her—might she not, by intercession with powers still higher than her own, destroy both body and soul in hell?

'We are betrayed. They are going to send for the abbot from Angerhale,' said Torfrida at last, reeling from the door. 'All is lost.'

'Shall we burst open the door and kill them all?' asked Sigtryg simply.

'No, king—no. They are God's men; and we have blood enough on our souls.'

'We can keep the gates, lest any go out to the king.'

'Impossible. They know the isle better than we, and have a thousand arts.'

So all they could do was to wait in fear and trembling for Hereward's return, and send Martin Lightfoot off to warn him, wherever he might be.

The monks remained perfectly quiet. The organ droned, the chants wailed as usual, nothing interrupted the stated order of the services, and in the hall, each day, they met the knights as cheerfully as ever. Greed and superstition had made cowards of them—and now traitors.

It was whispered that Abbot Thurstan had returned to the minster but no man saw him and so three or four days went on.

Martin found Hereward after incredible labours, and told him all, clearly and shrewdly. The man's manifest insanity only seemed to quicken his wit, and increase his powers of bodily endurance.

Hereward was already on his way home, and never did he and his good men row harder than they rowed that day back to Sutton. 'Ho landed, and hurried on with half his men, leaving the rest to disembark the booty. He was anxious as to the temper of the monks. He foresaw all that Torfrida had foreseen. And as for Torfrida herself, he was half mad. Ivo Taillebois's addition to William's message had had its due effect. He vowed even deadlier hate against the Frenchman than he had ever felt before. He ascended the heights to Sutton. It was his shortest way to Ely. He could not see Aldreth from thence, but he could see Willingham field and Belsar's hills, round the corner of Haddenham Hill.

The sun was setting long before they reached Ely: but just as he sank into the western fen, Winter stopped, pointing.—Was that the flash of arms? There, far away, just below Willingham town. Or was it the setting sun upon the ripples of some long water?

'There is not wind enough for such a ripple,' said one. But ere they could satisfy themselves, the sun was down, and all the fen was gray.

Hereward was still more uneasy. If that had been the flash of arms, it must have come off a very large body of men, moving in column, on the road between Cambridge and Ely. He hastened on his men. But ere they were within sight of the minster-tower, they were aware of a horse galloping violently towards them through the dusk. Hereward called a halt. He heard his own heart beat as he stopped. The horse was pulled up short among them. On its back was a lad, with a smaller boy behind him, clasping his waist.

'Hereward! Thank God, I am in tune! And the child is safe too. Thanks, thanks, dear saints!' a voice sobbed out.

It was the voice of Torfrida.

'Treason!' she gasped.

'I knew it.'

The French are in the island. They have got Aldreth. The whole army is marching from Cambridge. The whole fleet is coming up from Southrey. And you have time——'

'To burn Ely over the monks' heads. Men! Get bogwood out of yon cottage, make yourselves torches, and onward!'

Then rose a babel of questions, which Torfrida answered as she could. But she had nothing to tell. 'Clerks' cunning,' she said bitterly, 'was an overmatch for woman's wit.' She had sent out a spy, but he had not returned till an hour since. Then he came back breathless, with the news that the French army was on the march from Cambridge, and that, as he came over the water at Aldreth, he found a party of French knights in the fort on the Ely side, talking peaceably with the monks on guard.

She had run up to the borough hill—which men call Cherry Hill at this day—and one look to the north-east had shown her the river swarming with ships. She had rushed home, put boys' clothes on herself and her child, hid a few jewels in her bosom, saddled Swallow, and ridden for her life thither.

'And King Sigtryg!'

He and his men had gone desperately out towards Haddenham, with what English they could muster, but all were in confusion. Some were getting the women and children into boats, to hide them in the reeds, others baiting the minster gates, vowing vengeance on the monks.

'Then Sigtryg will be cut off! Alas for the day that ever brought his brave heart hither!'

And when the men heard that, a yell of fury and despair burst from all throats.

Should they go back to their boats?

'No! onward,' cried Hereward. 'Revenge first, and safety after. Let us leave nothing for the accursed Frenchmen but smoking ruins, and then gather our comrades, and cut our way back to the north.'

'Good counsel,' cried Winter. 'We know the roads, and they do not, and in such a dark night as is coming, we can march out of the island without their being able to follow us a mile.'

They hurried on, but stopped once more, at the galloping of another horse.

'Who comes, friend or foe?'

'Alwyn, son of Orgar!' cried a voice under breath. 'Don't make such a noise, men! The French are within half a mile of you.'

'Then one traitor monk shall die ere I retreat,' cried Hereward, seizing him by the throat.

'For heaven's sake, hold!' cried Torfrida, seizing his arm. 'You know not what he may have to say.'

'I am no traitor, Hereward, I have fought by your side as well as the best, and if any but you had called Alwyn——'

'A curse on your boasting. Tell us the truth.'

'The abbot has made peace with the king. He would give up the island, and St. Etheldreda should keep all her lands and honours. I said what I could, but who was I to resist the whole chapter? Could I alone brave St. Etheldreda's wrath?'

'Alwyn, the valiant, afraid of a dead girl!'

'Blaspheme not, Hereward! She may lead you at this moment! Look there!' and pointing up, the monk covered in terror, as a meteor flashed through the sky.

'That's St. Etheldreda shooting at us, eh? Then all I can say is, she is a very bad marksman. And the French are in the island!'

'They are.'

'Then forward, men, for one half-hour's pleasure, and then to die like Englishmen.'

'On!' cried Alwyn. 'You cannot go on. The king is at Whichford at this moment with all his army, half a mile off! Right across the road to Ely!'

Hereward grew bolder. 'On! men!' shouted he, 'we shall kill a few Frenchmen apiece before we die!'

'Hereward,' cried Torfrida, 'you shall not go on! If you go, I shall be taken. And if I am taken, I shall be burned. And I cannot burn—I cannot! I shall go mad with terror before I come to the stake. I cannot go strip to my smock before those Frenchmen. I cannot be roasted piecemeal! Hereward, take me away! Take me away! or kill me, now and here!'

He paused. He had never seen Torfrida thus overcoining.

'Let us flee! The stars are against us. God is against us! Let us hide—escape abroad, beg our bread, go on pilgrimage to Jerusalem together—for together it must be always—but take me away!'

'We will go back to the boats, men,' said Hereward.

But they did not go. They stood there, irresolute, looking towards Ely.

The sky was pitchy dark. The minster-roofs, lying north-east, were utterly invisible against the blackness.

'We may at least save some who escape out,' said Hereward. 'March on quickly to the left, under the hill to the plough-field.'

'They did so.'

'Lao down, mon. There are the French, close on our right. Down among the bushes.'

And they heard the heavy tramp of men within a quarter of a mile.

'Cover the mare's eyes, and hold her mouth lest she neigh,' said Winter.

Hereward and Torfrida lay side by side upon the heath. She was shivering with cold and horror. He laid his cloak over her, put his arm round her.

'Your stars did not foretell you this, Torfrida.' He spoke not bitterly, but in utter sadness.

She burst into an agony of weeping.

'My stars at least foretold me nothing but woe, since first I saw your face.'

'Why did you marry me then?' asked he, half angrily.

'Because I loved you. Because I love you still.'

'Then you do not regret?'

'Never, never, never! I am quite happy—quite happy. Why not?'

A low murmur from the men made them look up. They were near enough to the town to hear—only too much. They heard the tramp of men, shouts and yells. Then the shrill cries of women. All dull and muffled the sounds came to them through the still night, and they lay there spell bound, as in a nightmare, as men assisting at some horrible tragedy, which they had no power to prevent. Then there was a glare, and a wisp of smoke against the black sky, and then a house began burning brightly, and then another.

'This is the Frenchman's faith!'

And all the while, as the sack raged in the town below, the minister stood above, glowing in the firelight, silent and safe. The church had provided for herself by sacrificing the children beneath her fostering shadow.

They waited nearly an hour, but no fugitives came out.

'Come, men,' said Hereward wearily, 'we may as well to the boats.'

And so they went, walking on like men in a dream, as yet too stunned to realise to themselves the hopeless horror of their situation. Only Hereward and Torfrida saw it all, looking back on the splendid past—the splendid hopes for the future—glory, honour, an emulum, a free Danish England—and this was all that was left!

'No, it is not!' cried Torfrida suddenly, as if answering her own unspoken thoughts, and his. 'Love is still left. The gallows and the stake cannot take that away.' And she clung closer to her husband's side, and he again to hers.

They reached the shore, and told then tale to their comrades. 'Whither now?'

To Well. To the wide mere,¹ said Hereward.

¹ Probably near Upwell and Outwell, in the direction of Wisbeach. There the old Mere and the old Welney Rivers, joining, formed vast inclosures, now laid dry by the Middle Level and Marshland Drains. The burning of

'But their ships will hunt us out there.'

'We shall need no hunting. We must pick up the men at Cussham. You would not leave them to be murdered, too, as we have left the Ely men?'

No, they would go to Well. And then?

'The Brunsewald, and the merry greenwood,' said Hereward.

'Hey for the merry greenwood!' shouted Leof to the dead on. And the men, in the sudden delight of finding any place, any purpose, any sacred with a lusty cheer.

'Brave hearts!' said Hereward. 'We will live and die together like Englishmen.'

'We will, we will, Viking.'

'Where shall we stow the mare?' asked Gery, 'the boats are full already.'

'Leave her to me. On board, Torfrida.'

He got on board last, leading the mare by the bridle.

'Swim, good lass!' said he, as they pushed off, and the good lass, who had done it many a time before, waded in, and was soon swimming behind. Hereward turned, and bent over the side in the darkness. There was a strange gurgle, a splash, and a swirl. He turned round, and sat upright again. They rowed on.

'That mare will never swim all the way to Well,' said one.

'She will not need it,' said Hereward.

'Why?' said Torfrida, feeling in the darkness, 'she is loose. What is this in your hand? Your dagger? and wet?'

'Mare Swallow is at the bottom of the reach. We could never have got her to Well.'

'And you have—' cried a dozen voices.

'Do you think that I would let a cursed Frenchman—ay, even William's self—say that he had bestridlen Hereward's mare?'

None answered, but Torfrida, as she laid her head upon her husband's bosom, felt the great tears running down from his cheek on to her own.

None spoke a word. The men were awe-stricken. There was something despairing and all ominous in the deed. And yet there was a savage grandeur in it, which bound their savage hearts still closer to their chief. And so mare Swallow's bones lie somewhere in the peat unto this day.

They got to Well. They sent out spies to find the men who had been 'wasting Cussham with fire and sword' and at last brought them in. Ill news, as usual, had travelled fast. They had heard of the fall of Ely, and hidden themselves 'in a certain very small island which is called Stumtuch,'—where, thinking that the friends in search of them were Frenchmen in pursuit, they hid themselves amongst the high reeds. There two of them—one Starkwulf by name, the other Brolier—lying near each other, of the Middle Level Sluice in the year 1861 restored for a while a vast tract in these fens to its primeval state of 'the Wide Mere.' From this point, Hereward could escape north into Lincolnshire, either by Wisbeach and the Wash, or by Crowland and Bourne.

'thought that, as they were monks, it might conduce to their safety if they had shaven crowns, and set to work with their swords to shave each other's heads as well as they could. But at last, by their war-cries and their speech, recognising each other, they left off fighting, and went after Hereward.

So jokes, grimly enough, the old chronicler, who may have seen them come in the next morning with bleeding carcasses, and could laugh over the thing in after years. But he was in no humour for jesting in the days in which they lay at Well. Nor was he in jesting humour when, a week afterwards, limited by the French from Well, and forced to take to mires and waterways known only to them, and too shallow and narrow for the French ships, they found their way across into the old Fen, and so on toward Crowland, leaving Peterborough far on the left. Far as they neared Crowland, they saw before them, rowing slowly, a huge full of men. And as they neared that huge, behold, all they who rowed were blind of both their eyes, and all they who sat and guided them were lame of both their hands. And as they came alongside, there was not a man in all that ghostly crew but was an ancient friend, by whose side they had fought full many a day, and with whom they had drunk deep full many a night. They were the firstfruits of William's vengeance, thrust into that boat, to tell the rest of the ten-men what those had to expect who dared oppose the Norman. And they were going to Crowland, to the sanctuary of the Danish fen men, that they might cast themselves down before St. Guthlac, and ask of him that mercy for their souls which the Conqueror had denied to their bodies. Alas for them! They were but a handful among hundreds, perhaps thousands, of mutilated cripples, who swarmed all over England, and especially in the north and east, throughout the reign of the Norman conquerors. They told their comrades' fate, slaughtered in the first attack, or hanged afterwards as rebels and traitors to a foreigner whom they had never seen, and to whom they owed no fealty by law of God or man.

'And Sigtryg Randalsson!

None knew aught of him. He never got home again to his Irish princess.

'And the poor women?' asked Timfrida.

But she received no answer.

And the men swore a great oath, and kept it never to give quarter to a Frenchman, as long as there was one left on English ground.

Neither were the monks of Ely in jesting humour, when they came to count up the price of their own baseness. They had obeyed the apostolic injunction, 'to submit to the powers that be because they are ordained,' etc. But they found their return (as the Book of Ely calls it) to 'a more wholesome counsel' beset with thorns. The king barred them out of the monastery, lest the monks should come out with crosses and relics to implore his mercy. Going into the minster, he stood afar off from the holy body of St. Etheldreda, and cast a mark of gold on the altar, as a peace-offering to that terrible lady, and then retired to Whitheld, leaving his soldiers to work their wicked will. So terrified were the poor monks, that no mass was celebrated that day—but as the hours wore on, they needs must eat. And as they ate, there entered to them into the refectory Gilbert of Clare—

'Ye English swine, could ye had no other time to feed? The king is in the minster.'

Out hurried the monks, but too late. The king was gone, and hardly, by humbling themselves to their old enemy Gilbert, did they obtain grace of the king for seven hundred marks of silver. The which money they took as they had promised, to protect the Viscount of Cambridge. He weighed it and finding it an ounce short, accused them of cheating the king, and sentenced them to pay three hundred marks more. Then was lost all the gold and silver which was left in Ely—the image of St. Mary with her child, sitting on a throne, wrought with wondrous skill, which Ely the abbot had made of gold and silver, was broken up, and the images of the guardian virgins stripped of their precious ornaments. After which the royal commissioners came, plundered the abbey of all that was left of those treasures which had been brought hom every quarter into the camp of refuge, of which a curious inventory remains to this day.

Thurstan, the trustee abbot, died in a few months. Egelwin, the Bishop of Dunham, was taken in the abbey. He was a bishop, and they dared not kill him. But he was a patriot, and must have no mercy. They accused him of stealing the treasures of Dunham, which he had brought to Ely, for the service of his country, and shut him up in Alvington. A few months after, the brave man was found slain and dead, 'whether of his own will, or untold,' and so ended another patriot prelate. But we do not read that the Normans gave back the treasures to Dunham. And so, yielding an immense mass of booty, and many a fair woman, as the Normans' prey, ended the camp of refuge, and the glory of the isle of Ely.

But not the wrath of St. Etheldreda. What ever she might have done when on earth, she was not inclined, as patroness of Ely, to obey the apostolic injunction, and 'take joyfully the spoiling of her goods', and she fell upon those who had robbed her of her gay garments and rich manors, and left her to go in russet for many a year, with such strokes as proved that the monks had chosen the less of two evils, when they preferred falling into the hands of an angry king to falling into those of an angry saint. Terrible was the fate of Roger Pient's man (Gervase, who dared to harry and bind St. Etheldreda's men, who even brought an action at law against the abbot himself. The very night before the trial, St. Etheldreda, and her two sisters St. Withburga and Sexburga, stabbed him to the heart with the spikes of their pastoral staves, and he died, to the terror of all bystanders.

Worse, even, was the fate of Roger Picot himself, the hungry lion, the prowling wolf, the crafty fox, the filthy swine, the shameless dog, who had said, 'Who is this Etheldreda, whose lands ye say that I have taken? I know not Etheldreda, and I will not give up her lands.'

'Listen, ye isles, and attend, ye people from afar off, what her spouse hath done for the Lady of Ely. His sin, saith Scripture, is sought, and shall not be found. By whom is it sought? By Him from whom nothing is hidden. By whom shall it be found? By no man, since none know His day. Whither he is gone, why he fled, or how he has died, whether he has descended alive into the pit with Dathan and Abiyrom, or become a beast with Nabuchadonossor, hath vanished utterly, or by any other mode hath perished, to be damned without end. But one thing we know for certain, that in our bounds he has appeared no more, but has disappeared for ever to day. Glory to Him who has given us the victory over our enemy.'

Worse again (according to those of Ely) was the fate of Earl William de Warrenne, who violently withheld some farms from St. Etheldreda. For on the night on which he died, the then abbot heard his soul carried off by demons, crying in vain to heaven for mercy. Therefore when his lady, Gundreda (William the Conqueror's stepdaughter), a few days after, sent a hundred shillings for his soul to the minster at Ely, the abbot and his monks sent them back, neither designing nor daring to take the money of a damned man. So there is no hope for Earl Warrenne, were it not that the Chuniac monks, whom he had established at Lewes, holding naturally a different opinion of him and his deeds, buried him there in splendour, and put up over his tomb a white marble slab, on which were set forth his virtues, and the present protection and future rewards which St. Pancras was to procure for him in return for the minster which he had raised in honour of that mighty avenger of perjury.¹

After which—whether St. Pancras did or did not deliver Earl William from the wrath of St. Etheldreda—the Lady of Ely was appeased, and when almost all the monks were either sick or dying (possibly from one of those fevers which so often devastated the fens), she was seen, after long fastings and vigils, by a holy man named Goderic, staying the hand of some mighty being, who was in act to shoot an arrow from heaven against the doomed borough. After which, watching and praying still more fervently, he beheld St. Etheldreda and her maidens rise from their tombs by night, and walk majestic through choir and cloister, and so to the sick-house and the dying monks. And there the Lady of Ely went round to every bed, and laid her pure hand upon the throbbing forehead and wiped the typhus-gore from the faded lips with her sacred sleeve, and gave the sufferers sudden health and strength, and signified to Goderic, who had followed her trembling afar off, that all was forgiven and forgotten.¹

CHAPTER XXXIV

HOW HERWARD WENT TO THE GREENWOOD

AND now is Hereward to the greenwood gone, to be a bold outlaw, and not only an outlaw himself, but the father of all outlaws, who held those forests for two hundred years, from the fens to the Scottish border. Utlages, forestiers, lastrunculi, sicarii, sanvages, who prided themselves upon sleeping on the bare ground—they were accursed by the conquerors, and beloved by the conquered. The Norman viscount or sheriff commanded to hunt them from hundred to hundred with hue and cry, horse and blood hound. The English yeoman left for them a keg of ale, or a basket of loaves, beneath the hollyus green, as sauce for their meal of 'nombles of the dero.'

'For hart and hind, and doe and roe,
Were in that forest greet plentie,'

and

'Swannes and fasantes they had full good,
And foules of the riverse
There fayled never so lytell a byrde,
That ever was bred on brene.'

With the same friendly yeoman 'that was a good felawe,' they would lodge by twos and threes during the sharp frosts of mid-winter, in the lonely farmhouse which stood in the 'field' or forest-clearing, but for the greater part of the year their 'lodging was on the cold ground' in the holly thickets, or under the hanging rock, or in a lodge of boughs.

And then, after a while, the life which began in terror, and despair, and poverty, and loss of land and kin, became not only tolerable, but pleasant. Bold men and hardy, they cared less and less for

'The thornie wayes, the deep valleys,
The snowe, the frost, the rayne,
The colde the hete, for dry or wete
We must lodge on the plaine,
And us above, none other rooffe
But a brake bushe, or twayne.'

And they found fair lasses, too, in time, who, like Torfrida and Maid Marian, would answer with the nut-brown maid, to their warnings against the outlaw life, that—

'Amonge the wild dero, such an archere
As men say that ye be,
He may not fayne of good vitayle,
Where is so greet plentie.
And water cleare of the riverse,
Shall be full swete to me,
With which in helle, I shall right wele,
Endure, as ye may see.'

Then called they themselves 'merry men'; and the forest the 'merry greenwood'; and sang, with Robin Hood, ¹ For all these tales (the last is told with much pathos), see the Liber Eliensis, book ii. §§ 119-123.

'A merrier man than I, belyve
There lives not in Christgentle.'

They were coaxed back, at times, to civilised life, they got their grace of the king, and entered the king's service, but the craving after the greenwood was upon them. They dreaded and hated the four stone walls of a Norman castle, and, like Robin Hood, slipped back to the forest and the deer.

Gradually, too, law and order arose among them, lawless as they were, that instinct of discipline and self-government side by side with that of personal independence, which is the peculiar mark and peculiar strength of the English character. Who knows not how, in the 'Lytell Geste of Robin Hood,' they shot at 'pluck-buffot,' the king among them disguised as an abbot, and every man who missed the rose-garland, 'his tackle he should tynce',

'And bore a buffet on his head,
I wys ryght all here,
And all that fell on Robyn's lode,
He smote them wonder sair

'Till Robyn fayled of the garlande
Three fyngers and mai'

Then good Gilbert bids him in his turn

"Stand forth and take his pay"

"If it be so," sayd Robyn,
"That may no better be,
Syr Abbot, I delyver thee myn arrowe,
I pray thee, Syr, serve thou me"

"It falleth not for myne orler," saith the kynge,
"Robyn, by thy leve,
For to smyte no good yeman,
For doute I should hym greve"

"Smyte on boldly" sayd Robyn,
"I give thee large leve.
Anou our kynge, with that word,
He folde up his leve"

'And such a buffet he gave Robyn,
To grounde he yode full nere.
"I make myno avowe," sayd Robyn,
"Thou art a stalwarke frere."

"There is pyth in thyn arme," sayd Robyn,
"I trowe thou canst well shoote"
*Thus our kynge and Robyn Holde Together they are met.

Hard knocks in good humour, strict rules, fair play, and equal justice for high and low, this was the old outlaw spirit, which has descended to their unlawed descendants, and makes, to this day, the life and marrow of an English public school.

One fixed idea the outlaw had—hatred of the invader. If 'his herd were the king's deer,' 'his treasure was the earl's purse', and still oftener the purse of the foreign churchman, Frenchman or Italian, who, had expelled the outlaw's English cousins from their convents, scourged and imprisoned them, as the blessed Archbishop Lanfrano did at Canterbury, because they would not own allegiance to a French abbot, or murdered them at the high altar, as did the new Abbot of Glastonbury, because they would not change their old Gregorian chant for that of William of Pécamp.¹

On these mitred tyrants the outlaw had no mercy as far as their purses were concerned. Their persons, as consecrated, were even to him sacred and inviolable—at least, from wounds and death, and one may suppose Hereward himself to have been the first author of the laws afterwards attributed to Robin Hood. As for 'robbing and reveng, beting and bynding,' free warren was allowed against the Norman.

"Thereof no fers," said Robyn,
"We shall do well enow
But look ye do no housebonde harme,
That tytleth wyth his plough"

"No more ye shall no good yemau,
That walketh by grene wood shawe,
No no knyght, no no squyer,
That will be good felawe"

"These byshoppes, and theke archbyshoppes,
Ye shall them lete and laude,
The hys sheryff of Nottingham
Hysn holde in your mynde"

'Robyn loved our dear Ladye,
For doubt of dedely synur,
Wolds he never do company harme
That any woman was ynnur'

And even so it was with 'The Wake' when he was in the Brunsewald, if the old chroniclers are to be believed.

And now Torfrida was astonished. She had given way utterly at Ely, from woman's fear and woman's disappointment. All was over. All was lost. What was left, save to die?

But—and it was a new and unexpected fact to one of her exorable southern blood, easily raised, and easily depressed—she discovered that neither her husband, nor Winter, nor Gery, nor Wonech, nor Ranald of Ramsey, nor even the romancing harping Leofric, thought that all was lost. She argued it with them, not to persuade them into base submission, but to satisfy her own surprise.

'But what will you do?'

'Live in the greenwood'

'And what then?'

'Burn every town which a Frenchman holds, and kill every Frenchman we meet.'

'But what plan have you?'

'Who wants a plan, as you call it, while he has the green hollock overhead, the dun deer on the lawn, bow in his hand, and sword by his side?'

'But what will be the end of it all?'

'We shall live till we die'

'But Wilham is master of all England'

'What is that to us? He is not our master'

'But he must be some day. You will grow fewer and fewer. His government will grow stronger and stronger'

'What is that to us? When we are dead, there will be brave yeomen in plenty to take our place. You would not turn traitor?'

'I! never! never! I will live and die with you in your greenwood, as you call it. Only—I did not understand you English'

Torfrida did not. She was discovering the fact, which her nation have more than once discovered since, that the stupid valor of the Englishman never knows when it is beaten, and sometimes, by that self-satisfied ignorance, succeeds in not being beaten after all.

So The Wake—if the chroniclers speak truth—assembled a formidable force, well-nigh, at last, four hundred men. Winter, Gery, Wenoch, Grogan, one of the Azors of Lincoln, were still with him. Ruald the Seneschal still carried his standard. Of Dut and Outi, the famous brothers, no more is heard. A valiant Matelgar takes their place. Alfrie and Sexwold and many another gallant fugitive cast up, like scattered hounds, at the sound of 'The Wake's' war-horn. There were those among them (says Gannar) who scorned to fight single-handed less than three Frenchmen. As for The Wake, he would fight seven,

'*Les quatre occist, les trois furent,
Vaffrez, sanglant, cil a en partement
En plusurs lius mal avint.
K encontre sont tres bien se tuit.
De seit hommes avint vertu,
Un plus hardi ne fu veu*

They ranged up the Bruneswald, dashing out in the war cry of 'A Wake! A Wake!' and laying all waste with fire and sword, that is, such towns as were in the hands of Frenchmen. A noble range they must have had, for gallant sportsmen. Away south, between the Nene and Welland, stretched from Stamford and Peterborough the still vast forests of Rockingham, nigh twenty miles in length as the crow flies, down beyond Rockingham town, and Geddington Chase. To the west, they had the range of the 'hunting counties,' dotted still, in the more eastern part, with innumerable coyses and shaghs, the remnants of the great forest out of which, as our of Rockinghamshire, have been cut those fair parks and past which the Lord of Burghley led his Welsh bride to that Burghley House by Stamford town, well-nigh the noblest of them all, which was in Hereward's time deep wood and freestone down Round Exton, and Normanton, and that other Burley on the Hill on through those Moikery woods, which still retain the name of Hereward's ill-fated nephew, north by Iritham and Corby, on to Belton and Syston (par noble), and southwest again to those still wooded heights, whence all-but royal Belvoir looks out over the rich green vale below, did Hereward and his men range far and wide, harrying the Frenchman, and hunting the dun deer. Stags and fallow deer there were in plenty. There remain to this day, in Grims-thorpe Park by Bourne, the descendants of the very deer which Earl Isoufre and Karl Algar, and after them Hereward the outlaw, hunted in the Bruneswald.

'*Haudsome houses,
Wher the wealthy nobles dwell*

Deep tangled forest filled the lower claylands, swarming with pheasant, roe, badger, and more wolves than were needed. Broken park-like glades covered the upper freestones, where the red deer came out from harbour for their evening graze, and the partridges and plovers whirled up, and the hares loped away, innumerable, and where hollies and ferns always gave dry lying for the night. What did men need more, whose bodies were as stout as their hearts?

They were poachers and robbers—and why not? The deer had once been theirs, the game, the land, the serfs, and if Godric of Corby slew the Iritham deer, and burned Iritham hall over the head of the new French lord, and thought no harm, he did but what he would with that which had been once his own.

Easy it was to dash out by night, and make a raid, to harry the places which they once had owned themselves, in the vale of Belvoir to the west, or to the east in the strip of fertile land which sloped down into the fen, and levy blackmail in Folkingham, or Aslackby, or Sleasford, or any other of the 'Vills' (now thriving villages) which still remain in Domesday-book, and written against them the ugly and significant

'In Tatenai habuerunt Turgale et Suen IIII carrucas terre,' etc. 'Hoc Ivo Tailleboze in habet in dommo'—all, that is, that the wars had left of them.

The said Turgale (Torkill or Tarketil nusspelt by Frenchmen) and Sweyn, and many a good man more—for Ivo's possessions were enormous—were thorns in the sides of Ivo and his men, which must be extracted, and the Bruneswald a nest of hornets which must be smoked out at any cost.

Wherefore it befell, that once upon a day, there came riding to Hereward in the Bruneswald, a horseman all alone.

And meeting with Hereward and his men, he made signs of amity, and bowed himself low, and pulled out of his purse a letter, protesting that he was an Englishman, and a 'good fellow,' and that though he came from Lincoln town, a friend to the English had sent him.

That was believable enough, for Hereward had his friends, and his spies, far and wide.

And when he opened the letter, and looked first, like a wary man, at the signature—a sudden thrill went through him.

It was Alfrida's.

If he was interested in her, considering what had passed between them from her childhood, it was nothing to be ashamed of. And yet, somehow, he felt ashamed of that same sudden thrill.

And Hereward had reason to be ashamed. He had been faithful to Torfrida—a virtue most rare in those days. Few were faithful then, save, it may be, Baldwin of Mons to his tyrant and idol, the sorceress Richilda, and William of Normandy—whatever were his other sins—to his wise, and sweet, and beautiful Matilda. The stories of his coldness and cruelty to her seem to rest on no foundation. One need believe them as little as one does the myth of one chronicler, that when she tried to stop him from some expedition, and clung to him as he sat upon his horse, he smote his spur so deep into her breast that she fell dead. The man had self-control, and feared God, in his own wild way therefore it was, perhaps, that he conquered!

And Hereward had been faithful likewise to Torfrida, and loved her with an overwhelming adoration—as all true men love. And for that very reason he was the more aware, that his feeling for Alfrida was strangely like his feeling for Torfrida, and yet strangely different.

There was nothing in the letter that he should not have read. She called him her best and dearest friend, twice the saviour of her life. What could she do in return, but, at any risk to herself, try and save his life? The French were upon him. The posse comitatus of seven counties was raising. ‘Northampton, Cambridge, Lincoln, Holland, Leicester, Huntingdon, Warwick,’ were coming to the Brunescwald to root him out.

‘Lincoln?’ thought Hereward. ‘That must be Gilbert of Ghent, and Oger the Breton. No! Gilbert is not coming, Sir Ascelin is coming for him. Holland? That is my friend Ivo Taillebois. Well, we shall have the chance of paying off old scores. Northampton? The earl thereof just now is the pious and loyal Walthof, as he is of Huntingdon and Cambridge. Is he going to join young Fitz-Osbern from Warwick and Leicester, to root out the last Englishman? Why not? That would be a deed worthy of the man who married Judith, and believes in the powers that be, and eats dirt daily at William’s table.’

Then he read on.

Ascelin had been mentioned, he remarked, three or four times in the letter, which was long, as from one lingering over the paper, wishing to say more than she dared. At the end was a hint of the reason.

‘Oh, that having saved me twice, you could save me once more. Know you that Gospatric has been driven from his earldom on charge of treason, and that Walthof has Northumbria in his place, as well as the parts round you? And that Gospatric is fled to Scotland again, with his sons—my man among them? And now the report comes, that my man is slain in battle on the Border, and that I am to be given away—as I have been given away twice before—to Ascelin. This I know, as I know all, not only from him of Ghent, but from him of Peterborough, Ascelin’s uncle.’

Hereward laughed a laugh of cynical triumph, pardonable enough in a broken man.

‘Gospatric! the wittol! the woodcock! looking at the springs, and then coolly putting his head therein. Throwing the hatchet after the helve, selling his soul, and never getting the price of it! I foresaw it, foretold it, I believe to Alfrida herself—foretold that he would not keep his bought earldom three years. What a people we are, we English, if Gospatric is—as he is—the shrewdest man among us, with a dash of canny Scots blood too. “Among the blind, the one-eyed is king,” says Torfrida, out of her wise ancestors, and blind we are, if he is our best. No. There is one better man left, I trust, one that will never be sleepy enough to put his head into the wolf’s mouth, and trust the Frenchman, and that is, I The Wako.’

And Hereward boasted to himself, at Gospatric’s expense, of his own superior wisdom, till his eye caught a hue or two, which finished the letter.

‘Oh, that you would change your mind, much as I honour you for it. Oh, that you would come in to the king, who loves and trusts you, having seen your constancy and faith proved by so many years of affliction. Great things are open to you, and great joys, I dare not tell you what. But I know them, if you would come in. You, to waste yourself in the forest, an outlaw and a savage! Opportunity once lost, never returns, time flies fast, Hereward, my friend, and we shall all grow old—I think at times that I shall soon grow old. And the joy of life will be impossible, and nothing left but vain regrets.’

‘Hey?’ said Hereward, ‘a very cloying letter I did not think she was so good a scholar. Almost as good a one as Torfrida.’

That was all he said, and as for thinking, he had the posse comitatus of seven counties to think of. But what could those great fortunes and joys be, which Alfrida did not dare to describe?

She growing old, too? Impossible that was woman’s vanity. It was but two years since she was as fair as a saint in a window. ‘She shall not marry Ascelin. I will cut his head off. She shall have her own choice for once, poor child.’

And Hereward found himself worked up to a great height of paternal solicitude for Alfrida, and righteous indignation against Ascelin. He did not confess to himself that he disliked much, in his selfish vanity, the notion of Alfrida’s marrying any one at all. He did not want to marry her himself, of course not. But there is no dog in the manger so churlish on such points as a vain man. There are those who will not willingly let their own sisters, their own daughters, their own servants marry. Why should a woman wish to marry any one but them?

But Hereward, however vain, was no dreamer or sluggard. He set to work, joyfully, cheerfully, scouting battle afar off, like Job’s war-horse, and plying for the battle. He sent back Alfrida’s messenger, with this answer—

‘Tell your lady that I kiss her hands and feet. That I cannot write, for outlaws carry no pen and ink. But that what she has commanded, that will I perform.’

It is noteworthy, that when Hereward showed Torfrida (which he did frankly) Alfrida’s letter, he did not tell her the exact words of his answer, and stumbled and varied much, vexing her thereby, when she, naturally, wished to hear their word for word.

Then he sent out spies to the four airs of heaven. And his spies, finding a friend and a meal in every hovel, brought home all the news he needed.

He withdrew Torfrida and his men into the heart of the forest—no hint of the place is given by the chronicler—out down trees, formed an abatis of trunks and branches, and awaited the enemy.

CHAPTER XXXV

HOW ANNOI THOROLD WAS PUT TO RANSOM

THOUGH Hereward had as yet no feud against 'bysschoppes and archbysschoppes,' save Egelsin of Selsey, who had excommunicated him, but who was at the other end of England, he had feud, as may be supposed, against Thorold, Abbot of Peterborough, and Thorold feud likewise against him. When Thorold had entered the 'Gordon Borough,' hoping to fatten himself with all its treasures, he had found it a smoking ruin, and its treasures gone to Ely to pay Swoyn and his Daues. And such a sacrilege, especially when he was the loser thereby, was the unpardonable sin itself in the eyes of Thorold, as he hoped it might be in the eyes of St. Peter. Joyfully therefore he joined his friend Ivo Taillebois, when 'with his usual pompous verbosity,' saith Peter of Blois, writing on this very matter, he asked him to join in destroying Hereward.

Nevertheless, with all the French chivalry at their back, it behoved them to move with caution, for (so says the chronicler) 'Hereward had in these days very many foreigners, as well as landfolk, who had come to him to practise and learn war, and fled from their masters and friends when they heard of his fame, some of them even the king's courtiers, who had come to see whether those things which they heard were true, whom Hereward nevertheless received cautiously, on pledged troth and oath.'

So Ivo Taillebois summoned all his men, and all other men's men who would join him, and rode forth through Spalding and Bourne, having announced to Lucia, his bride, that he was going to slay her one remaining relative, and when she wept, cursed and kicked her, as he did once a week. After which he came to Thorold of Peterborough.

So on the two worthies rode from Peterborough to Stamford, and from Stamford into the wilderness, no man knows whither

'And far they rode by bush and abagh,
And far by moss and mire'

but never found a track of The Wake or his men. And Ivo Taillebois left off boasting how he would burn Torfrida over a slow fire, and confined himself to cursing, and Abbot Thorold left off warbling the song of Roland as if he had been going to a second battle of Hastings, and washed himself in warm bed at Peterborough.

But at the last they struck upon a great horse-track, and followed it at their best pace for several miles, and yet no sign of Hereward.

'Catch an Englishman,' quoth the abbot.

But that was not so easy. The poor folk had hidden themselves, like Israel of old, in thickets, and dens, and caves of rocks, at the far-off sight of the foreign tyrants, and not a living soul had appeared for twenty miles. At last they caught a ragged wretch herding swine, and hailed him up to Ivo.

'Have you seen Hertward, villain!' asked he, through an interpreter.

'Nay.'

'You lie. These are his fresh horse-tracks, and you must have seen him pass.'

'Nay!'

'Thrust out one of his eyes, and he will hnd his tongue.'

It was done.

'Will you answer now?'

The poor wretch only howled.

'Thrust out the other.'

'No, not that! Mercy I will tell. He has gone by this four hours. How have you not met him?'

'Fool! The hoofs point onward there.'

'Ay'—and the fellow could hardly hide a grin—'but he had shod all his horses backwards.'

A storm of execration followed. They might be thrown twenty miles out of their right road by the stratagem.

'So you had seen Hereward, and would not tell! Put out his other eye,' said Taillebois, as he went to his own feelings.

And they turned their horses' heads, and rode back, leaving the man blind in the forest.

The day was waning now. The fog hung heavy on the tree-tops, and dripped upon their heads. The horses were getting tired, and slipped and tumbled in the deep clay paths. The footmen were more tired still, and, cold and hungry, straggled more and more. The horse-tracks led over an open lawn of grass and fern, with here and there an ancient thorn, and round it on three sides thick wood of oak and beech, with under copse of holly and hazel. Into that wood the horse-tracks led, by a path on which there was but room for one horse at a time.

'Here they are at last!' cried Ivo. 'I see the fresh footmarks of men, as well as horses. Push on, knights and men-at-arms.'

The abbot looked at the dark, dripping wood, and meditated.

'I think that it will be as well for some of us to remain here; and, spreading our men along the wood-side, prevent the escape of the villains. A moi, hommes d'armes!'

'As you like. I will go in, and bolt the rabbit, and you shall snap him as he comes out.'

And Ivo, who was as brave as a bull-dog, thrust his horse into the path, while the abbot sat shivering outside. 'Certain nobles of higher rank,' says Peter de Blois, 'followed his example, not wishing to rust their armour, or tear their fine clothes, in the damp copse.'

The knights and men-at-arms straggled slowly into the forest, some by the path, some elsewhere, grumbling audibly at the black work before them. At last the crashing of the branches died away, and all was still.

Abbot Thorold sat there upon his shivering horse, shivering himself as the cold pierced through his wet mail, and as near an hour passed, and no sign of foe or friend appeared, he cursed the hour in which he took off the beautiful garments of the sanctuary to endure those of the battlefield. He thought of a warm chamber, warm bath, warm footcloths, warm phasant, and warm wine. He kicked his freezing iron feet in the freezing iron stirrup. He tried to blow his nose with his freezing iron hand, but dropt his handkerchief (an almost unique luxury in those days) into the mud, and his horse trod on it. He tried to warble the song of Roland but the words exploded in a cough and a sneeze. And so dragged on the weary hours, says the chronicler, nearly all day, till the ninth hour. But never did they see coming out of the forest the men who had gone in.

A shout from his nephew, Sir Ascelin, made all turn their heads. Behind them, on the open lawn, in the throat between the woods by which they had entered, were some forty knights, galloping towards them.

'Ivo!'

'No!' almost shrieked the abbot. 'There is the Wake banner. It is Hereward.'

'There is Winter on his left,' cried one. 'And there, with the standard, is the accursed monk, Ranald of Ramsey.'

And on they came, having debouched from the wood some two hundred yards off, behind a roll in the lawn, just far enough off to charge as soon as they were in line.

On they came, two deep, with lances high over their shoulders, heads and heels well down, while the green tufts flew behind them. 'A moi, hommes d'armes!' shouted the abbot. But too late. The French turned right and left. To form was impossible, ere the human whirlwind would be upon them.

Another half minute, and with a shout of 'A Wake! A Wake!' they were struck, ridden through, hurled over, and trampled in the mud.

'I yield. Grace! I yield!' cried Thorold, struggling from under his horse but there was no one to whom to yield. The knights' backs were fifty yards off, their right arms high in the air, striking and stabbing.

The battle was a fourrance. There was no quarter given that day.

'And he that came live out thereof
Was he that ran away'

The abbot tried to make for the wood but ere he could gain it, the knights had turned, and one rode straight at him, throwing away a broken lance, and drawing his sword.

Abbot Thorold may not have been the coward which Peter of Blois would have him, over and above being the bully which all men would have him, but if so, even a worm will turn, and so did the abbot. He drew sword from thigh, got well under his shield, his left foot forward, and struck one blow for his life, at the right place—his foe's bare knee.

But he had to do with a warier man than himself. There was a quick jerk of the rein, the horse swerved round right upon him, and knocked him head over heels, while his blow went into empty air.

'Yield, or die!' cried the knight, leaping from his horse, and kneeling on his head.

'I am a man of God, an abbot, churchman, Thorold.'

'Man of all the devils!' and the knight lunged him up, and bound his arms behind him with the abbot's own belt.

'Ahoi! Here! I have caught a fish. I have got the Golden Borough in my purse!' roared he. 'How much has St. Peter gained since we borrowed of him last, abbot? He will have to pay out the silver pennies bonnily, if he wishes to get back thee.'

'Blaspheme not, godless barbarian!' Whereat the knight kicked him.

'And you have Thorold the soundrel, Winter!' cried Hereward, galloping up. 'And we have three or more dainty French knights, and a viscount of I know not where among them. This is a good day's work. Now for Ivo and his tail.'

And the abbot, with four or five more prisoners, were hoisted on to their own horses, tied firmly, and led away into the forest path.

'Do not leave a wounded man to die,' cried a knight who lay on the lawn.

'Never we. I will come back and put you out of your pain,' quoth some one.

'Siward! Siward Le Blanc! Are you in this mornie?' cried the knight in French.

'That am I. Who calls?'

'For God's sake save him!' cried Thorold. 'He is my own nephew, and I will pay—'

'You will need all your money for yourself,' said Siward the White, riding back.

'Are you Sir Ascelin of Ghent?'

'That am I, your host of old.'

'I wish I had met you in better company. But friends we are, and friends must be.'

And he dismounted, and did his best for the wounded man, promising him to return and fetch him off before night, or send yeomen to do so.

As he pushed on through the wood, the abbot began to see signs of a fight, riderless horses crashing through the copse, wounded men straggling back, to be cut down without mercy by the English. The war had been a fourrance for a long while. None gave or asked quarter. The knights might be kept for ransom, they had money. The wretched men of the lower classes, who had none, were slain: as they would have slain the English.

Soon they heard the noise of battle, and saw horsemen and footmen pell-mell, tangled in an abattis, from behind which archers and cross-bowmen shot them down in safety.

Hereward dashed forward with a shout, and at that the French, taken in the flank, fled, and were smitten as they fled, hip and thigh.

Hereward bade them spare a fugitive, and bring him to him.

'I give you your life, so run, and carry my message. That is Taillebois's banner there forward, is it not?'

'Yes.'

'Then go after him, and tell him, - Hereward has the Abbot of Burgh, and half a dozen knights, safe by the heels. And unless Ivo clears the wood of his men by nightfall, I will hang every one of them up for the crows before morning.'

Ivo got the message, and having had enough fighting for the day, drew off, says the chronicler, for the sake of the abbot and his fellow-captives.

Two hours after the abbot and the other prisoners were sitting, unbound but unarmed, in the forest on campment, waiting for a right good meal, with Torfrida bustling about them, after bunding up the very few wounded amongst their own men.

Every courtesy was shown them; and then hearts were lifted up, as they beheld approaching among the trees great caldrons of good soup, forest salads, red deer and roe roasted on the wood embers, spits of pheasants and partridges, larks and buntings, thrust off one by one by fair hands into the hard-baked loaves which served as platters, and last but not least, jacks of ale and wine, appearing mysteriously from a cool old stone quarry. Abbot Thorold ate to his heart's content, complimented every one, vowed he would forswear all French cooks and take to the greenwood himself, and was as gracious and courteously as if he had been at the new palace at Winchester.

And all the more for this reason - that he had intended to overawe the English barbarians by his polished French manners. He found those of Hereward and Torfrida, at least, as polished as his own.

'I am glad you are content, lord abbot,' said Torfrida, 'I trust you prefer dining with me to burning me, as you meant to do.'

'I burn such peerless beauty! I injure a form made only for the courts of kings! Heaven and all saints, knighthood and all chivalry, forbid! What Taillebois may have said, I know not! I am no more answerable for his intentions than for his parentage, - or his success this day. Let churls be churls, and wood-cutters wood-cutters. I at least, thanks to my ancestors, am a gentleman.'

'And as a gentleman, will of course contribute to the pleasure of your hosts. It will surely please you to gratify us with one stave at least of that song which has made you famous among all knights,' holding out a harp.

'I blush but obey. A harp in the greenwood! A court in the wilderness! What joy!'

And the vain abbot took the harp, and said - 'Those, if you will allow my modesty to choose, are the staves on which I especially pride myself. The staves which Taillebois - you will pardon my mentioning him -'

'Why pardon? A noble minstrel he was, and a brave warrior, though our foe. And often have I longed to hear him, little thinking that I should hear instead the maker himself.'

So said Hereward, and the abbot sang - those wondrous staves, where Roland, left alone of all the Paladins, finds death on him fast. And on the Pyrenean peak, beneath the pine, he lays himself, 'his face toward the ground, and under him his sword and magic horn, that Charles his lord may say, and all his folk, the gentle count he died a conqueror,' and then 'turns his eyes southward toward Spain, betakes himself to remember many things, of so many lands which he conquered valiantly, of pleasant France, of the men of his lineage, of Charlemagne his lord, who brought him up. He could not help to weep and sigh, but yet himself he would not forget. He bewailed his sins, and prayed God's mercy - True Father, who never yet didst he, who raised St. Lazarus from death and guarded Daniel from the lions. Guard my soul from all perils, for the sins which in my life I did. His right glove then he offered to God, St. Gabriel took it from his hand, on his arm the chiel bowed down, with joined hands he went unto his end. God sent down his angel Cherubim, and St. Michael whom men call "del peril." Together with them St. Gabriel he came, the soul of the count they bore to Paradise.'

And the abbot ended, sadly and gently, without that wild 'Aoi!' the war-cry with which he usually ends his staves. And the wild men of the woods were softened and saddened by the melody, and as many as understood French said, when he finished - 'Amen! so may all good knights die!'

'Thou art a great maker, abbot! They told truths of thee. Sing us more of thy great courtesy.'

And he sang them the staves of the Olifant, the magic horn - How Roland would not sound it in his pride, and sounded it at Turpin's bidding, but too late, and how his temples burst with that great blast, and Charles and all his peers heard it through the gorges, leagues away in France. And then his 'Aoi!' rang forth so loud and clear, like any trumpet blast, under the oaken glades, that the wild men leaped to their feet, and shouted 'Health to the gleeman! Health to the Abbot Thorold!'

'I have won them,' thought the abbot to himself. Strange mixture that man must have been, if all which is told of him is true, a very typical Norman, compact of cunning and ferocity, chivalry and poetry, vanity and superstition, and yet able enough to help to conquer England for the Pope.

Then he pressed Hereward to sing, with many compliments; and Hereward sang, and sang again, and all his men crowded round him as the outlaws of Judaea may have crowded round David in Carmel or Hebron, to hear, like children, old ditties which they loved the better the oftener they heard them.

'No wonder that you can keep these knights together, if you can charm them thus with song. Would that I could hear you singing thus in William's hall.'

'No more of that, sir abbot. The only music which I have for William is the music of steel on steel.'

Hereward answered sharply, because he was half of Thorold's mind.

'Now,' said Torfrida, as it grew late, 'we must ask our noble guest for what he can give us as easily and well as he can sing—and that is news. We hear nought here in the green-wood, and must throw oneself on the kindness of a chance visitor.'

The abbot leapt at the bait, and told them news, court gossip, bringing in great folks' names and his own, as often and as familiarly mingled as he could.

'What of Richilda?' asked Torfrida.

'Ever since young Arnoul was killed at Cassel—'

'Arnoul killed?' shrieked Torfrida.

'Is it possible that you do not know?'

'How should I know, shut up in Ely for years as it seems.'

'But they fought at Cassel three months before you went to Ely.'

'He it so. Only tell me Arnoul killed!'

Then the abbot told, not without itching, a fearful story.

Robert the Frison and Richilda had come to open war, and Gerhoh the Fleming, Earl of Chester, had gone over from England to help Robert. William had sent Fitz-Osborn, Earl of Hereford, the scourge and tyrant of the Welsh, to help Richilda. Fitz-Osborn had married her, there and then. She had asked help of her liege lord, the King of France, and he had sent her troops. Robert and Richilda had fought on St. Peter's Day, 1071—nearly two years before—at Ravinchoven, by Cassel.

Richilda had played the heroine, and routed Robert's left wing, taken him prisoner, and sent him off to St. Omer. Men said that she had done it by her enchantments. But her enchantments betrayed her nevertheless. Fitz-Osborn, her bridegroom, fell dead. Young Arnoul had two horses killed under him. Then Gerhoh smote him to the ground, and Richilda and her troops fled in horror. Richilda was taken, and exchanged for the Frison, at which the King of France, being enraged, had come down and burnt St. Omer. Then Richilda, undaunted, had raised fresh troops to avenge her son. Then Robert had met them at Broquerius by Mons, and smote them with a dreadful slaughter.¹ Then Richilda had turned and fled wildly into a convent, and, so men said, tortured herself night and day with fearful penances, if by any means she might atone for her great sins.

Torfrida heard, and laid her head upon her knees, and wept so bitterly, that the abbot entreated pardon for having pained her so much.

The news had a deep and lasting effect on her. The thought of Richilda shivering and starving in the squalid darkness of a convent alone by her thimblecloth. Should she ever find herself atoning in like wise for her sorceries—harsh as they had been, for her ambitions—just as they had been, for her crimes? But she had committed none. No, she had sinned in many things, but she was not as Richilda. And yet in the loneliness and sadness of the forest, she could not put Richilda from before the eyes of her mind.

It saddened Hereward likewise. For Richilda he cared little. But that boy—How he had loved him! How he had taught him to ride, and sing, and joust, and handle sword, and all the art of war. How his own rough soul had been the better for that love. How he had looked forward to the day when Arnoul should be a great prince, and requite him with love. Now he was gone. Gone? Who was not gone, or going? He seemed to himself the last tree in the forest. When should his time come, and the lightning strike him down to rot beside the rest? But he tost the sad thoughts aside. He could not afford to nourish them. It was his only chance of life, to be merry and desperate.

'Well!' said Hereward, ere they bade themselves up for the night. 'We owe you thanks, Abbot Thorold, for an evening worthy of a king's court rather than a solitary bush.'

'I have won him over,' thought the abbot.

'So charming a courtier—so sweet a minstrel—so agreeable a newsmonger—could I keep you in a cage for ever, and hang you on a bough, I were but too happy—but you are too fine a bird to sing in captivity. So you must go, I fear, and leave us to the nightingales. And I will take for your ransom—'

Abbot Thorold's heart beat high.

'Thirty thousand silver mark!'

'Thirty thousand fends!'

'My beau sire, will you undervalue yourself? Will you degrade yourself? I took Abbot Thorold, from his talk to be a man who set even a higher value on himself than other men set on him. What higher compliment can I pay to your vast worth, than making your ransom high accordingly, after the spirit of our ancient English laws? Take it as it is meant, beau sire, be proud to pay the money, and we will throw you Sir Ascelin into the bargain, as he seems a friend of Sward's.'

Thorold hoped that Hereward was drunk, and might forget, or relent—but he was so sore at heart that he slept not a wink that night.

But in the morning he found, to his sorrow, that Hereward had been as sober as himself.

In fine, he had to pay the money, and was a poor man all his days.

'Aha! Sir Ascelin,' said Hereward apart, as he bade them all farewell with many courtesies. 'I think I have put a spoke in your wheel about the fair Alfrida.'

'Eh! How! Most courteous victor!'

'Sir Ascelin is not a very wealthy gentleman.'

Ascelin laughed assent.

'Nodus intravi, nodus exeo—England, and I fear now, this mortal life likewise.'

'But he looked to his rich uncle the abbot, to further a certain marriage-project of his. And of course neither my friend Gilbert of Ghent, nor my enemy William of Normandy, is likely to give away so rich an heiress without some gratification in return.'

'Sir Hereward knows the world, it seems.'

'So he has been told before. And therefore, having no intention that Sir Ascelin—however worthy of any and every fair lady—should marry this one, he took care to cut off the stream at the fountain head. If he hears that the suit is still pushed, he may cut off another head beside the fountain's.'

'There will be no need,' said Ascelin, laughing again. 'You have very sufficiently ruined my uncle and my hopes.'

'My head!' said he, as soon as Hereward was out of hearing. 'If I do not cut off thy head ere all is over, there is no other luck nor craft left among Frenchmen. I shall catch The Wake sleeping some day, let him be never so Wakoful.'

CHAPTER XXXVI

HOW ALFRIDA WROTE TO HEReward

THE weary months ran on, from summer into winter, and winter into summer again, for two years and more, and neither Torfrida nor Hereward was the better for them. Hope deferred maketh the heart sick, and a sick heart is but too apt to be a peevish one. So there were fits of despondency, jars, mutual recriminations. 'If I had not taken your advice, I should not have been here.' 'If I had not loved you so well, I might have been very differently off.' And so forth. The words were wiped away the next hour, perhaps the next minute, by sacred kisses; but they had been said, and would be recollected, and perhaps said again.

Then, again, the 'merry greenwood' was merry enough in the summer tide, when shafts were green, and

'The woodwits sang, and would not cease,
Sitting upon the spray,
So loud, it wakened Robin Hood
In the greenwood where he lay.'

But it was a sad place enough, when the autumn fog crawled round the gorse, and dripped off the hollies, and choked alike the breath and the eyesight, when the air sickened with the graveyard smell of rotting leaves, and the rain-water stood in the clay holes over the poached and sloppy lawns.

It was merry enough, too, when they were in winter quarters in friendly farmhouses, as long as the bright sharp frosts lasted, and they tracked the hares and deer merrily over the frozen snows but it was doleful enough in those same farmhouses in the howling wet weather, when wind and rain lashed in through the unglazed window and ill-made roof, and there were coughs and colds and rheumatisms, and Torfrida ached from head to foot, and once could not stand upright for a whole month together, and every cranny was stuffed up with bits of board and rage, keeping out light and air as well as wind and water, and there was little difference between the short day and the long night, and the men gambled and wrangled amid clouds of peat reek, over draught-boards and chessmen which they had carved for themselves, and Torfrida sat stitching and sewing, making and mending, her eyes bleared with peat smoke, her hands sore and coarse from continued labour, her cheek bronzed, her face thin and hollow, and all her beauty worn away for very trouble. Then sometimes there was not enough to eat, and every one grumbled at her, or some one's clothes were not mended, and she was grumbled at again. And sometimes a foraging party brought home liquor, and all who could got drunk to drive dull care away, and Hereward, forgetful of all her warnings, got more than was good for him likewise, and at night she coiled herself up in her furs, cold and contemptuous, and Hereward coiled himself up, guilty and defiant, and woke her again and again with startings and wild words in his sleep. And she felt that her beauty was gone, and that he saw it, and she fancied him (perhaps it was only fancy) less tender than of yore, and then in very pride declined to take any care of her person, and said to herself, though she dare not say it to him, that if he only loved her for her face, he did not love her at all. And because she fancied him cold at times, she was cold likewise, and grew less and less caressing, when for his sake, as well as her own, she should have grown more so day by day.

Alas! for them. There are many excuses. Sorrow may be a softening medicine at last, but at first it is apt to be a hardening one, and that savage outlaw life which they were leading can never have been a wholesome one for any soul of man, and its graces must have existed only in the brains of harpists and gleemen. Away from law, from self-restraint, from refinement, from elegance, from the very sound of a church-going bell, they were sinking gradually down to the level of the coarse men and women whom they saw, the worse and not the better parts of both their characters were getting the upper hand, and it was but too possible that after a while the hero might sink into the ruffian, the lady into a slattern and a shrew.

But in justice to them be it said, that neither of them had complained of the other to any living soul. Their love had been as yet too perfect, too sacred, for them to confess to another (and thereby confess to themselves) that it could in any wise fail. They had each idolised the other, and been too proud of their idolatry to allow that their idol could crumble or decay.

And yet at last that point too was reached. One day they were wrangling about somewhat, as they too often wrangled, and Hereward in his temper let fall the words, 'As I said to Winter the other day, you grow harder and harder upon me.'

Torfrida started and fixed on him wide, terrible, scornful eyes. 'So you complain of me to your boon companions!'

And she turned and went away without a word. A gulf had opened between them. They hardly spoke to each other for a week.

Hereward complained of Torfrida! What if Torfrida should complain of Hereward! But to whom? Not to the coarse women round her! her pride revolted from that thought—and yet she longed for counsel, for sympathy—to open her heart but to one fellow-woman. She would go to the Lady Godiva at Crowland, and take counsel of her, whether there was any method (for she put it to herself) of saving Hereward, for she saw but too clearly that he was fast forgetting all her teaching, and falling back to a point lower than that even from which she had raised him up.

To go to Crowland was not difficult. It was mid-winter. The dykes were all frozen. Hereward was out foraging in the Lincolnshire folds. So Torfrida, taking advantage of his absence, proposed another foraging party to Crowland itself. She wanted stuff for clothes, needles, thread, what not. A dozen stout fellows volunteered at once to take her. The friendly monks of Crowland would feast them royally, and send them home heaped with all manner of good things, while as for meeting Ivo Taillebois's men, if they had but three to one against them, there was a fair chance of killing a few, and carrying off their clothes and weapons, which would be useful. So they made a sledge, tied beef bones underneath it, put Torfrida and the girl thereon, well wrapped in deer and fox and badger skin, and then putting on their ekates, swept them over the fen to Crowland, singing like larks along the dykes.

And Torfrida went in to Godiva, and wept upon her knees, and Godiva wept likewise, and gave her such counsel as she could—how if the woman will keep the man heroic, she must keep herself not heroic only but devout likewise, how she herself, by that one deed which had rendered her name famous then, and famous (though she never dreamt thereof) now and it may be to the end of time—had once for all tamed, chained, and, as it were, converted the heart of her fierce young lord, and enabled her to train him in good time into the most wise, most just, most pious, of all King Edward's earls.

And Torfrida said yes, and yes, and yes, and felt in her heart that she knew all that already. Had not she too taught, entreated, softened, civilised! Had not she too spent her life upon a man, and that man a wolf's head and a landless outlaw, more utterly than Godiva could ever have spent hers on one who lived lapped in luxury, and wealth, and power! Torfrida had done her best, and she had failed—or at least fancied in her haste that she had failed.

What she wanted was not counsel, but love. And she clung round the Lady Godiva, till the broken and ruined widow opened all her heart to her, and took her in her arms, and fondled her as if she had been a babe. And the two women spoke few words after that, for indeed there was nothing to be said. Only at last, 'My child, my child,' cried Godiva, 'better for thee, body and soul, to be here with me in the house of God, than there amid evil spirits and deeds of darkness in the wild woods.'

'Not a cloister, not a cloister,' cried Torfrida, shuddering, and half struggling to get away.

'It is the only place, poor wilful child, the only place this side the grave, in which we wretched creatures, who to our woe are women born, can find aught of rest or peace. By us sin came into the world, and Eve's curse has heavy on us to this day, and our desire is to our lords, and they rule over us, and when the slave can work for her master no more, what better than to crawl into the house of God, and lay down our crosses at the foot of His cross, and die! You too will come here, Torfrida, some day, I know it well. You too will come here to rest.'

'Never, never,' shrieked Torfrida, 'never to these horrid vaults. I will die in the fresh air. I will be buried under the green holms, and the nightingales, as they wander up from my own Provence, shall build and sing over my grave. Never, never!' murmured she to herself all the more eagerly, because something within her said that it would come to pass.

The two women went into the church to matins, and prayed long and fervently. And at the early daybreak the party went back laden with good things and hearty blessings, and caught one of Ivo Taillebois's men by the way, and slew him, and got off him a new suit of clothes in which the poor fellow was going courting, and so they got home safe into the Bruneswald.

But Torfrida had not found rest unto her soul. For the first time in her life since she became the bride of Hereward, she had had a confidence concerning him and unknown to him. It was to his own mother—true. And yet she felt as if she had betrayed him, but then had he not betrayed her! And to Winter of all men!

It might have been two months afterwards that Martin Lightfoot put a letter into Torfrida's hand.

The letter was addressed to Hereward: but there was nothing strange in Martin's bringing it to his mistress. Ever since their marriage, she had opened and generally answered the very few epistles with which her husband was troubled.

She was going to open this one as a matter of course, when glancing at the superscription she saw, or fancied she saw, that it was in a woman's hand. She looked at it again. It was sealed plainly with a woman's seal, and she looked up at Martin Lightfoot. She had remarked as he gave her the letter a sly significant look in his face.

'What dost thou know of this letter?' she inquired sharply.

'That it is from the Countess Alfrida, who-soever she may be.'

A chill struck through her heart. True, Alfrida had written before only to warn Hereward of danger to his life—and here. She might be writing again, only for the same purpose. But still, she did not wish that either Hereward or she should owe Alfrida then lives, or anything. They had struggled on through weal and woe without her for many a year. Let them do so without her still. That Alfrida had once loved Hereward she knew well. Why should she not? The wonder was to her that every woman did not love him. But she had long since gauged Alfrida's character, and seen in it a persistence like her own, yet, as she proudly hoped, of a lower temper, the persistence of the base weasel, not of the noble hound: yet the creeping weasel might endure, and win, when the hound was tired out by his own gallant pace. And there was a something in the tone of Alfrida's last letter, which seemed to tell her that the weasel was still upon the scent of its game. But she was too proud to mistrust Hereward, or rather to seem to mistrust him. And yet—how dangerous Alfrida might be as a rival, if rival she chose to be. She was up in the world now, free, rich, gay, beautiful, a favourite at Queen Matilda's court, while she—

'How came this letter into thy hands?' asked she as carelessly as she could.

'I was in Peterborough last night,' said Martin, 'concerning little matters of my own, and there came to me in the street a bonny young page with smart jacket on his back, smart cap on his head, and smiles and bows, and "You are one of Hereward's men," quoth he. "Say that again, young jackanapes," said I, "and I'll cut your tounge out," whereat he took fright and all but cried. He was very sorry, and meant no harm, but he had a letter for my master, and he heard I was one of his men. "Who told him that?" Well, one of the monks, he could not justly say which, or wouldn't, and I thinking the letter of more importance than my own neck, ask him quietly into my friend's house. There he pulls out this and five silver pennies, and I shall have five more if I bring an answer back—but to none than Hereward must I give it. With that I, calling my friend, who is an honest woman, and nigh as strong in the arms as I am, ask her to clap her back against the door, and pull out my axe. "Now," said I, "I must know a little more about this letter. Tell me, knave, who gave it thee, or I'll split thy skull." The young man cries and blubbers, and says that it is the Countess Alfrida, who is staying in the monastery, and that he is her serving-man, and that it is as much as my life is worth to touch a hair of his head, and so forth—so far so good. Then I asked him again, who told him I was my master's man!—and he confessed that it was Herlun the prior—who that was Lady Godiva's chaplain of old, whom my master robbed of his money when he had the cell of Bonne years ago. Very well, quoth I to myself, that's one more count on our score against Master Herlun. Then I asked him how Herlun and the Lady Alfrida came to know aught of each other? and he said that she had been questioning all about the monastery without Abbot Thorold's knowledge, for one that know Hereward and favoured him well. That was all I could get from the knave, he cried so for fright. So I took his money and his letter, warning him that if he betrayed me, there were those who would roast him alive before he was done with me. And so away over the town wall, and ran here five-and-twenty miles before breakfast, and thought it better as you see to give the letter to my lady first.'

'You have been officious,' said Torfrida coldly. 'Tis addressed to your master. Take it to him. Go.'

Martin Lightfoot whistled and obeyed, while Torfrida walked away proudly and silently with a beating heart.

Again Godiva's words came over her. Should she end in the convent of Crowland? And suspecting, fearing, imagining all sorts of baseless phantasies, she hardened her heart into a great hardness.

Martin had gone with the letter, and Torfrida never heard any more of it.

So Hereward had secrets which he would not tell to her. At last!

That, at least, was a misery which she would not confide to Lady Godiva, or to any soul on earth.

But a misery it was, such a misery as none can delineate, save those who have endured it themselves, or had it confided to them by another. And happy are they to whom neither has befallen.

She wandered out and into the wild wood, and sat down by a spring. She looked in it—her only mirror—at her wan coarse face, with wild black elf locks hanging round it, and wondered whether Alfrida, in her luxury and prosperity, was still so very beautiful. Ah, that that fountain were the fountain of Jouvence, the spring of perpetual youth, which all believed in those days to exist somewhere,—how would she plunge into it, and be young and fair once more!

No! she would not! She had lived her life, and lived it well, gallantly, lovingly, heroically. She had given that man her youth, her beauty, her wealth, her wit. He should not have them a second time. He had had his will of her. If he chose to throw her away when he had done with her, to prove himself base at last, unworthy of all her care, her counsels, her training—dreadful thought! To have lived to keep that man for her own, and just when her work seemed done, to lose him! No, there was worse than that. To have lived that she might make that man a perfect knight, and just when her work seemed done, to see him lose himself.

And she wept till she could weep no more. Then she washed away her tears in that well. Had it been in Greece of old, it would have become a sacred well thenceforth, and Torfrida's tears have changed into forget-me-nots, and fringed its marge with azure overmore.

Then she went back, calm, all but cold—but determined not to betray herself, let him do what he would. Perhaps it was all a mistake, a fancy. At least she would not degrade him, and herself, by showing suspicion. It would be dreadful, shameful to herself, wickedly unjust to him, to accuse him were he innocent after all.

Hereward, she remarked, was more kind to her now. But it was a kindness which she did not like. It was shy, faltering, as of a man guilty and ashamed, and she repelled it as much as she dared, and then, once or twice, returned it passionately, madly, in hopes—

But he never spoke a word of that letter.

After a dreadful month, Martin came mysteriously to her again. She trembled, for she had remarked in him lately a strange change. He had lost his usual loquacity and quaint humour; and had fallen back into that sullen taciturnity which, so she heard, he had kept up in his youth. He, too, must know evil which he dared not tell.

'There is another letter come. It came last night,' said he.

'What is that to thee or me? My lord has his state secrets. Is it for us to pry into them? Go!'

'I thought—I thought —'

'Go, I say!'

'That your ladyship might wish for a guide to Crowland!'

'Crowland!' almost shrieked Torfrida, for the thought of Crowland had risen in her own wretched mind instantly and involuntarily. 'Go, madman!'

Martin went. Torfrida paced madly up and down the barnhouse. Then she settled herself into heroic despair.

There was a noise of tramping horses outside. The men were arming and saddling, seemingly for a raid.

Hereward hurried in for his armour. When he saw Torfrida, he blushed scarlet.

'You want your arms,' said she quietly, 'let me fetch them.'

'No, never mind. I can harness myself. I am going south-west, to pay Taillebois a visit. I am in a great hurry. I shall be back in three days. Then—good-bye.'

He snatched his arms off a perch, and hurried out again, dragging them on. As he passed her, he offered to kiss her, she put him back, and helped him on with his armour, while he thanked her confusedly.

'He was as glad not to kiss me, after all!'

She looked after him as he stood, his hand on his horse's withers. How noble he looked! And a great yearning came over her. To throw her arms round his neck once, and then to stab herself, and set him free, dying, as she had lived for him.

Two bonny boys were wrestling on the lawn, young outlaws who had grown up in the forest with ruddy cheeks and iron limbs.

'Ah, Winter!' she heard him say, 'had I had such a boy as that!—'

She heard no more. She turned away, her heart dead within her. She knew all that those words implied, in days when the possession of land was everything to the free man, and the possession of a son necessary, to pass that land on in the ancestral line. Only to have a son, only to prevent the old estate passing, with an heiress, into the hands of strangers, what crimes did not men commit in those days, and find themselves excused for them in public opinion? And now, her other children (if she ever had any) hatched in childhood, the little Torfrida, named after herself, was all that she had brought to Hereward, and he was the last of his house. In him the race of Loofric, of Golvra, of Earl Osloc, would become extinct, and that girl would marry—whom? Whom but some French conqueror, or at best some English outlaw. In either case Hereward would have no descendants for whom it was worth his while to labour or to fight. What wonder if he longed for a son—and not a son of hers, the barren tree—to pass his name down to future generations? It might be worth while, for that, to come in to the king, to recover his lands, to — She saw it all now, and her heart was dead within her.

She spent that evening, neither eating nor drinking, but sitting over the log embers, her head upon her hands, and thinking over all her past life and love, since she saw him, from the gable window, and the first time into St Omer. She went through it all, with a certain stern delight in the self-torture, deliberately day by day, year by year,—all its lofty aspirations, all its blissful passages, all its deep disappointments, and found in it—so she chose to fancy in the wilfulness of her misery, nothing but cause for remorse. Self in all, vanity and vexation of spirit, for herself she had loved him, for herself she had tried to raise him, for herself she had set her heart on man, and not on God. She had sown the wind, and behold she had reaped the whirlwind. Still she could not repent, she could not pray. But oh! that she could die.

She was unjust to herself in her great nobleness. It was not true, not half, not a tenth part true. But perhaps it was good for her that it should seem true for that moment, that she should be emptied of all earthly things—for once, if so she might be filled from above.

At last she went into the inner room to lie down and try to sleep. At her feet, under the porch where Hereward's armour had hung, lay an open letter.

She picked it up, surprised to see such a thing there, and kneeling down, held it eagerly to the wax candle which was on a spike at the bed's head.

She knew the handwriting in a moment. It was Alfrida's.

Thus then was why Hereward had been so strangely hurried. He must have had that letter and dropped it.

Her mind and eye took it all in in one instant, as the lightning flash reveals a whole landscape. And then her mind became as dark as that landscape when the flash is past.

It congratulated Hereward on having shaken himself free from the fascinations of that sorceress. It said that all was settled with king William. Hereward was to come to Winchester. She had the king's writ for his safety ready to send to him. The king would receive him as his hegemon. Alfrida would receive him as her husband. Archbishop Lanfranc had made difficulties about the dissolution of the marriage with Torfrida, but gold would do all things at Rome, and Lanfranc was her very good friend, and a reasonable man—and so forth.

Men and beasts likewise, when stricken with a mortal wound, will run, and run on, blindly, unless, impelled by the mere instinct of escape from intolerable agony. And so did Torfrida. Half undrest as she was, she fled forth into the forest, she knew not whither, running as one does wrapped in fire, but the fire was not without her, but within.

She cast a passing glance at the girl who lay by her, sleeping a pure and gentle sleep—

'Oh, that thou hadst but been a boy!' Then she thought no more of her, not even of Hereward, but all of which she was conscious was a breast and brain bursting, an intolerable choking, from which she must escape.

She ran, and ran on, for miles. She knew not whether the night was light or dark, warm or cold. Her tender feet might have been ankle-deep in snow. The branches over her head might have been howling in the tempest, or dripping with rain. She knew not, and heeded not. The owls hooted to each other under the staring moon, but she heard them not. The wolves glared at her from the brakes, and snunk off appalled at the white ghostly figure, but she saw them not. The deer stood at gaze in the glades till she was close upon them, and then bounded into the wood. She ran right at them, past them heedless. She had but one thought. To flee from the agony of a soul alone in the universe with its own misery.

At last she was aware of a man close beside her. He had been following her a long way, she recollected now, but she had not feared him, even hooded him. But when he laid his hand upon her arm she turned fiercely, but without dread.

She looked to see if it was Hereward. To meet him would be death. If it were not he she cared not who it was. It was not Hereward, and she cried angrily, 'Off! off!' and hurried on.

'But you are going the wrong way!' The wrong way!' said the voice of Martin Light-foot.

'The wrong way! Fool, which is the right way for me, save the path which leads to a land where all is forgotten!'

'To Crowland! To Crowland! To the minster! To the monks! That is the only right way for poor wretches in a world like this. The Lady Godiva told you you must go to Crowland. And now you are going! I too, I ran away from a monastery when I was young, and now I am going back. Come along!'

'You are right! Crowland, Crowland, and a nun's cell till death. Which is the way, Martin?'

'Oh, a wise lady! A reasonable lady! But you will be cold before you get thither. There will be a frost ere morn. So when I saw you run out, I caught up something to put over you.'

Torfrida shuddered, as Martin wrapped her in the white bear's skin.

'No! Not that! Anything but that!' and she struggled to shake it off.

'Then you will be dead ere dawn. Folks that run wild in the forest thus, for but one night, die.'

'Would God I could die!'

'That shall be as He wills. You do not die while Martin can keep you alive. Why, you are staggering already.'

Martin caught her up in his arms, threw her over his shoulder as if she had been a child, and hurried on in the strength of madness.

At last he stopped at a cottage door, set her down upon the turf, and knocked loudly.

'Grunkel Tolken! Grunkel, I say!'

And Martin burst the door open with his foot. 'Give me a horse, on your life,' said he to the man inside. 'I am Martin, The Wake's man, upon my master's business.'

'What is mine is The Wake's, God bless him,' said the man, struggling into a garment, and hurrying out to the stable.

'There is a ghost against the gate!' cried he, recoiling.

'That is my matter, not yours. Get me a horse to put the ghost upon.'

Torfrida lay against the gate-post, exhausted now, but quite unable to think. Martin lifted her on to the beast, and led her onward, holding her up again and again.

'You are tired. You had run four miles before I could make you hear me.'

'Would I had run four thousand!' And she relapsed into stupor.

They passed out of the forest, across open wolds, and at last down to the river. Martin knew of a boat there. He lifted her from the horse, turned him loose, put Torfrida into the boat, and took the oars.

She looked up, and saw the roofs of Bourne shining white in the moonlight.

And then she lifted up her voice, and shrieked three times,

'Lost! Lost! Lost!'

with such a dreadful cry, that the starlings whirled up from the reeds, and the wild fowl rose clanging off the meres, and the watch-dogs in Bourne and Manthorpe barked and howled, and folk told fearfully next morning, how a white ghost had gone down from the forest to the fen, and wakened them with its unearthly scream.

The sun was high when they came to Crowland minster. Torfrida had neither spoken nor stirred, and Martin, who in the midst of his madness kept a strange courtesy and delicacy, had never disturbed her, save to wrap the bear's skin more closely over her.

When they came to the bank, she rose, stepped out without his help, and drawing the bear's skin closely round her, and over her head, walked straight up to the gate of the house of nuns.

All men wondered at the white ghost, but Martin walked behind her, his left finger on his hip, his right hand grasping his hilt, and with such a stern and serious face, and so fierce an eye, that all drew back in silence, and let her pass.

The portress looked through the wicket.

'I am Torfrida,' said a voice of terrible calm. 'I am come to see the Lady Godiva. Let me in.'

The portress opened, utterly astounded.

'Madam!' said Martin eagerly, as Torfrida entered.

'What? What?' she seemed to waken from a dream. 'God bless thee, thou good and faithful servant,' and she turned again.

'Madam! Stay!'

'What?'

'Shall I go back, and kill him?' And he held out the little axe.

Torfrida snatched it from his grasp with a shriek, and cast it inside the convent door.

'Mother Mary and all saints!' cried the portress, 'your garments are in tatters, madam!'

'Never mind! Bring me garments of yore. I shall need none other till I die!' and she walked in and on.

'She is come to be a nun!' whispered the portress to the next sister, and she again to the next, and they all gabbled, and lifted up their hands and eyes, and thanked all the saints of the calendar, over the blessed and miraculous conversion of the Lady Torfrida, and the wealth which she would probably bring to the convent.

Torfrida went straight on, speaking to no one, not even to the prioress, and into Lady Godiva's chamber.

There she dropped, at the countess's feet, and laid her head upon her knees.

'I am come, as you always told me I should do. But it has been a long way hither, and I am very tired.'

'My child! What is this? What brings you here?'

'I am doing penance for my sins.'

'And your feet all cut and bleeding.'

'Are they?' said Torfrida vacantly. 'I will tell you all about it when I wake.'

And she fell fast asleep, with her head in Godiva's lap.

The countess did not speak or stir. She beckoned the good prioress, who had followed Torfrida in, to go away. She saw that some thing dreadful had happened, and prayed as she awaited the news.

Torfrida slept for a full hour. Then she awoke with a start.

'Where am I? Hereward!'

Then followed a dreadful shock, which made every nun in that quiet house shudder, and thank God that she knew nothing of those agonies of soul which were the lot of the foolish virgins who married and were given in marriage themselves, instead of waiting with oil in their lamps for the true Bridegroom.

'I recollect all now,' said Torfrida. 'Listen! And she told the countess all, with speech so calm and clear that Godiva was awed by the power and spirit of that marvellous woman.

But she groaned in bitterness of soul. 'Any thing but this! Rather death from him than treachery! This last, worse than had God kept in His quiver for me, most miserable of women! And now his bolt has fallen! Hereward! Hereward! That thy mother should wish her last child laid in his grave!'

'Not so,' said Torfrida, 'it is well as it is. How better? It is his only chance for comfort, for honour, for life itself. He would have grown a —I was growing bad and foul myself in that ugly wilderness. Now he will be a knight on a mare among meadows, and win himself fresh honour in fresh fields. Let him marry her. Why not? He can get a dispensation from the Pope, and then there will be no sin in it, you know. If the Holy Father cannot make wrong right, who can? Yes. It is very well as it is. And I am very well where I am. Women! Bring me scissors, and one of your nun's dresses. I am come to be a nun like you.'

Godiva would have stopped her. But Torfrida rose upon her knees, and calmly made a solemn vow, which though canonically void without her husband's consent, would, she well knew, never be disputed by any there, and as for him, — 'He has lost me, and for ever. Torfrida never gives herself away twice.'

'There's a cruel pride in those words, my poor child,' said Godiva.

'Cruel!' said she proudly. 'When I am sacrificing myself utterly for him.'

'And thy poor girl!'

'He will let her come hither,' said Torfrida, with forced calm. 'He will see that it is not fit that she should grow up with — yes, he will send her to me — to us. And I shall live for her — and for you. If you will let me be your bower-woman, dress you, serve you, read to you.'

You know that I am a pretty scholar. You will let me, mother? 'I may call you mother, may I not?' And Torfrida fondled the old woman's thin hands. 'For I do want so much something to love.'

'Love thy heavenly Bridegroom, the only love worthy of woman!' said Godiva, as her tears fell fast on Torfrida's head.

She gave a half impatient toss.

'That may come, in good time. As yet it is enough to do, if I can keep down this devil here in my throat. Women, bring me the scissors.'

And Torfrida cut off her raven locks, now streaked with gray, and put on the nun's dress, and became a nun housefurther.

On the second day there came to Crowland Leofric the priest, and with him the poor child.

She had woken in the morning and found no mother. Leofric and the other men searched the woods round, far and wide. The girl mounted her horse, and would go with them. Then they took a bloodhound, and he led them to Grunkol's hut. There they heard of Martin. The ghost must have been Torfrida. Then the hound brought them to the river. And they divined at once that she was gone to Crowland, to Godiva, but why, they could not guess.

Then the girl wept, prayed, at last commanded them to take her to Crowland. And to Crowland they came.

Leofric left the girl at the nuns' house door, and went into the monastery, where he had friends now, runaway and renegade as he was. As he came into the great court, whom should he meet but Martin Lightfoot, in a lay brother's frock.

'Aha! And are you come home likewise? Have you renounced the devil and this last work of his?'

'What work? What devil?' asked Leofric, who saw method in Martin's madness. 'And what do you here in a lay frock?'

'Devil! Hereward the devil. I would have killed him with my axe, but she got it from me, and threw it in among the holy sisters, and I had work to get it again. Shame on her, to spoil my chance of heaven. For I should surely have won heaven, you know, if I had killed the devil.'

After much beating about, Leofric got from Martin the whole tragedy.

And when he heard it, he burst out weeping.

'O Hereward, Hereward! O knightly honour! Oh, faith and troth, and gratitude, and love in return for such love as might have tamed him and made tyrants mild! Are they all carnal vanities, words of the weak flesh, bruised words which break when they are leaned upon? If so, you are right, Martin, and there is nought left, but to flee from a world in which all men are liars.'

And Leofric, in the midst of Crowland Yard, tore off his belt and trusty sword, his hauberk and helm also, and letting down his monk's frock, which he wore trussed to the mid-knee, he went to the abbot's lodgings, and asked to see old Ulfcetyl.

'Bring him up,' said the good abbot, 'for he is a valiant man and true, in spite of all his vanities, and may be, he brings news of Hereward, whom God forgive.'

And when Leofric came in, he fell upon his knees, bewailing and confessing his sinful life, and begged the abbot to take him back again into Crowland minster, and lay upon him what penance he thought fit, and put him in the lowest office because he was a man of blood; if only he might stay there, and have a sight at times of his dear Lady Torfrida, without whom he should surely die.

So Leofric was received back, in full chapter, by abbot, and prior, and all the monks. But when he asked them to lay a penance upon him, Ulfcetyl arose from his high chair, and spoke.

'Shall we, who have sat here at ease, lay a penance on this man, who has shed his blood in fifty valiant fights for us, and for St. Guthlac, and for this English land? Look at you scars upon his head and arms. He has had sharper discipline from cold steel than we could give him here with rod, and has fasted in the wilderness more sorely, many a time, than we have fasted here.'

And all the monks agreed that no penance should be laid on Leofric. Only that he should abstain from singing vain and carnal ballads, which turned the heads of the young brothers, and made them dream of nought but battles, and grants, and enchantments, and ladies' love.

Hereward came back on the third day, and found his wife and daughter gone. His guilty conscience told him in the first instance why. For he went into the chamber, and there, upon the floor, lay the letter which he had looked for in vain.

None had touched it where it lay. Perhaps no one had dared to enter the chamber. If they had, they would not have dared to meddle with writing which they could not read, and which might contain some magic spell. Letters were very safe in those old days.

There are moods of man which no one will dare to describe, unless, like Shakespeare, he is Shakespeare, and like Shakespeare knows it not.

Therefore what Hereward thought and felt will not be told. What he did, was this.

He raged and blustered. He must hide his shame. He must justify himself to his knights, and much more to himself, or if not justify himself, must shift some of the blame over to the opposite side. So he raged and blustered. He had been robbed of his wife and daughter. They had been cajoled away by the monks of Crowland. What villains were those to rob an honest man of his family while he was fighting for his country?

So he rode down to the river, and there took two great barges, and rowed away to Crowland, with forty men-at-arms.

And all the while he thought of Alfrida, as he had seen her at Peterborough.

And of no one else!

Not so. For all the while he felt that he loved Torfrida's little finger better than Alfruda's whole body, and soul into the bargain.

What a long way it was to Crowland! How wearying were the hours through mire and sea. How wearying the monotonous pulse of the oars. If tobacco had been known then, Hereward would have smoked all the way, and been none the wiser, though the happier, for it, for the herb that drives away the evil spirits of anxiety, drives away also the good, though stern, spirits of remorse.

But in those days a man could only escape facts by drinking, and Hereward was too much afraid of what he should meet in Crowland, to go blither drunk.

Sometimes he hoped that Torfrida might hold her purpose, and set him free to follow his wicked will. All the lower nature in him, so long crushed under, leapt up chuckling and grinning and tumbling head over heels, and cried—'Now I shall have a holiday!'

Sometimes he hoped that Torfrida might come out to the shore, and settle the matter in one moment, by a glance of her great hawk's eyes. If she would but quell him by one look, leap on board, seize the helm, and assume without a word the command of his men and him, steer them back to Bourne, and sit down beside him with a kiss, as if nothing had happened! If she would but do that, and ignore the past, would he not ignore it? Would he not forget Alfruda, and King William, and all the world, and go up with her into Sherwood, and then north to Scotland and Gwynedd, and be a man once more?

No. He would go with her to the Baltic or the Mediterranean. Constantinople and the Varangers would be the place and the men. Ay, there to escape out of that charmed ring into a new life.

No. He did not deserve such luck, and he would not get it.

She would talk it all out. She must, for she was a woman.

She would blame, argue, say dreadful words—dreadful, because true and deserved. Then she would grow angry, as women do when they are most in the right, and say too much—still more dreadful words, which would be untrue and undeserved. Then he should resist, recriminate. He would not stand it. He could not stand it. No. He could never face her again.

And yet if he had seen a man insult her—if he had seen her at that moment in peril of the slightest danger, the slightest bruise, he would have rushed forward like a madman, and died, saving her from that bruise. And he knew that: and with the strange self-contradiction of human nature, he soothed his own conscience by the thought that he loved her still; and that, therefore—somehow or other, he cared not to make out how—he had done her no wrong. Then he blustered again, for the benefit of his men. He would teach these monks of Crow-land a lesson. He would burn the minster over their heads.

'That would be juty, seeing they are the only Englishmen left in England,' said Siward the White, his nephew, very simply.

'What is that to thee? Thou hast helped to burn Peterborough at my bidding, and thou shalt help to burn Crowland.'

'I am a free gentleman of England, and what I choose, I do. I and my brother are going to Constantinople to join the Varanger Guard, and shall not burn Crowland, nor let any man burn it.'

'Shall not let?'

'No,' said the young man, so quietly that Hereward was cowed.

'I—I only meant if they did not do right by me.'

'Do right thyself,' said Siward.

Hereward swore awfully, and laid his hand on his sword-hilt. But he did not draw it, for he thought he saw overhead a cloud which was very like the figure of St Guthlac in Crowland window, and an awe fell upon him from above.

So they came to Crowland, and Hereward landed and beat upon the gates, and spoke high words. But the monks did not open the gates for a while. At last the gates creaked, and opened, and in the gateway stood Abbot Ulfketyl in his robes of state, and behind him the prior, and all the others, and all the monks of the house.

'Comes Hereward in peace or in war?'

'In war!' said Hereward.

Then that true and trusty old man, who sealed his patriotism, if not with his blood, for the very Normans had not the heart to take that—still with long and bitter sorrows, lifted up his head, and said, like a valiant Dane, as his name bespoke him, 'Against the traitor and the adulterer—'

'I am neither,' roared Hereward.

'Thou wouldst be, if thou couldst. Whoso looketh upon a woman to—'

'Preach me no sermons, man! Let me in to seek my wife.'

'Over my body,' said Ulfketyl, and laid himself down across the threshold.

Hereward recoiled. If he had dared to step over that sacred body, there was not a blood-stained ruffian in his crew who dared to follow him.

'Rise, rise! for God's sake, lord abbot,' said he. 'Whatever I am, I need not that you should disgrace me thus. Only let me see her—reason with her.'

'She has vowed herself to God, and is none of thine henceforth.'

'It is against the canons. A wrong and a robbery.'

Ulfketyl rose, grand as ever.

'Hereward Leofricsson, our joy and our glory once. Harken to the old man who will soon go whither thine uncle Brand is gone, and be free of Frenchmen, and of all this wicked world. When the walls of Crowland dare not shelter the wronged woman, fleeing from man's treason to God's faithfulness, then let the roofs of Crowland burn till the flame reaches heaven, for a sign that the children of God are as false as the children of this world, and break their faith like any lustful knight.'

Hereward was silenced. His men shrink back from him. He felt as if God, and the mother of God, and St. Guthlac, and all the host of heaven, were shrinking back from him likewise. He turned to supplications, compromises—what else was left.

'At least you will let me have speech of her, or of my mother?'

'They must answer that, not I.'

Hereward sent in, entreating to see one, or both.

'Tell him,' said Lady Godiva, 'what calls himself my son, that my sons were men of honour, and that he must have been changed at nurse.'

'Tell him,' said Tithida, 'that I have lived my life, and am dead. Dead. If he would see me, he will only see my corpse.'

'You would not slay yourself?'

'What is there that I dare not do? You do not know Torfrida. He does.'

And Hereward did, and went back again like a man stunned.

After a while there came by boat to Crowland all Torfrida's wealth, clothes, jewels, not a shield had Hereward kept. The magic armour came with them.

Tithida gave all to the alms, there and then. Only the armour she wrapped up in the white bear's skin, and sent it back to Hereward, with her blessing, and entreaty not to refuse that, her last request.

Hereward did not refuse, for very shame. But for very shame he never wore that armour more. For very shame he never slept again upon the white bear's skin, on which he and his true love had lain so many a year.

And Tithida turned herself utterly to serve the Lady Godiva, and to teach and train her child as she had never done before, while she had to love Hereward, and to work day and night with her own fingers, for all his men. All pride, all fierceness, all care of self, had passed away from her. In penitence, humility, obedience, and gentleness, she went on, never smiling, but never weeping. Her heart was broken, and she felt it good for herself to let it break.

And Leofric the priest, and mad Martin lightfoot, watched like two dogs for her going out and coming in, and when she went among the old caroliers, and nursed the sick, and taught the children, and went to and fro upon her holy errands, blessing and blessed, the two wild men had a word from her mouth, or a kiss of her hand, and were happy all the day after. For they loved her with a love mightier than ever Hereward had heaped upon her, for she had given him all. But she had given those two wild men nought but the beatific vision of a noble woman.

CHAPTER XXXVII

HOW HERWARD LOST SWORD BAINBITER

'On account of which,' says the chronicler, 'many troubles came to Hereward because Torfrida was most wise, and of great counsel in need. For afterwards, as he himself confessed, things went not so well with him as they did in her time.'

And the first thing that went ill was this. He was riding through the Bruneswald, and behind him Gery, Wenoch, and Matelgar, these three. And there met him in an open glade a knight, the biggest man he had ever seen, on the biggest horse, and two knights behind him. He was an Englishman, and not a Frenchman, by his dress, and Hereward spoke courteously enough to him. But who he was, and what his business was in the Bruneswald, Hereward thought that he had a right to ask.

'Tell me who thou art who askest, before I tell thee who I am when am asked, riding here on common land,' quoth the knight surly enough.

'I am Hereward, without whose leave no man has ridden the Bruneswald for many a day.'

'And I am Letwold the Englishman, who rides whither he will in merry England, without care for any Frenchman upon earth.'

'Frenchman? Why callest thou me Frenchman, man? I am Hereward.'

'Then thou art, if tales be true, as French as les Taillebois. I hear that thou hast left thy true lady, like a fool and a churl, and goest to London, or Winchester, or the nether yot. I care not which—to make thy peace with the Manner.'

The man was a surly brute. But what he said was so true, that Hereward's wrath arose. He had promised Torfrida many a time never to quarrel with an Englishman, but to endure all things. Now, out of very spite to Torfrida's counsel, because it was Torfrida's, and he had promised to obey it, he took up the quarrel.

'If I am a fool and a churl, thou art a greater fool, to provoke thine own death, and a greater—'

'Space your breath,' said the big man, 'and let me try Hereward, as I have many another.'

Whereon they dropped their lance points, and rode at each other like two mad bulls. And by the contagion of folly common in the middle age, at each other rode Hereward's three knights and Letwold's five. The two leaders found themselves both rolling on the ground, jumped up, drew their swords, and hewed away at each other. Gery unhorsed his man at the first charge, and left him stunned. Then he turned on another, and did the same by him. Wenoch and Matelgar each overthrew their man. The fifth of Letwold's knights threw up his lance-point, not liking his new company. Gery and the other two rode in on the two chiefs, who were fighting hard, each under shield.

'Stand back!' roared Hereward, 'and give the knight fair play! When did any one of us want a man to help him? Kill or die single has been our rule, and shall be.'

They threw up their lance-points, and stood round to see that great fight. Letwold's knight rode in among them, and stood likewise, and friend and foe looked on, as they might at a pair of game-cocks.

Hereward had, to his own surprise and that of his fellows, met his match. The sparks flew, the iron clanged, but so heavy were the stranger's strokes that Hereward recoiled again and again. So sure was the guard of his shield, that Hereward could not wound him, hit where he would. At last he dealt a furious blow on the stranger's head.

'If that does not bring your master down?' quoth Gery. 'By --, Braumbiter is gone!'

It was too true. Sword Braumbiter's end was come. The ogre's magic blade had snapped off short by the hilt.

'Your master is a true Englishman, by the hardness of his blows,' quoth Wemmel, as the stranger, reeling for a moment, lifted up his head, and stared at Hereward in the face, doubtful what to do.

'Will you yield, or fight on?' cried he.

'Yield?' shouted Hereward, rushing upon him, as a mastiff might on a lion, and striking at his helm, though shorter than him by a head and shoulders, such swift and terrible blows with the broken hilt, as staggered the tall stranger.

'What are you at, forgetting what you have at your side?' roared Gery.

Hereward sprang back. He had, as was his custom, a second sword on his right thigh.

'I forgot everything now,' said he to himself angrily.

And that was too true. But he drew the second sword, and sprang at his man once more.

The stranger tried, according to the chronicles, who probably had it from one of the three bystanders, a blow which has cost many a brave man his life. He struck right down on Hereward's head. Hereward raised his shield, warding the stroke, and threw in that coup de jaree, which there is no guarding, after the downright blow has been given. The stranger chattered upon his wounded knee.

'Yield,' cried Hereward in his turn.

'That is not my fashion.' And the stranger fought on upon his stump, like Witherington in Cherry Chase.

Hereward, mad with the sight of blood, struck at him four or five times. The stranger's guard was so quick that he could not hit him, even on his knee. He held his hand, and drew back, looking at his new rival.

'What the murrain are we two fighting about?' said he, at last.

'I know not, neither care,' said the other, with a grim chuckle. 'But if any man will fight me, him? I fight, ever since I had beard to my chin.'

'Thou art the best man that ever I faced.'

'That is like enough.'

'What wilt thou take, if I give thee thy life?' 'My way on which I was going. For I turn back for no man alive on land.'

'Then thou hast not had enough of me?'

'Not by another hour.'

'Thou must be born of fiend, and not of man.' 'Very like. It is a wise son knows his own father.'

Hereward burst out laughing.

'Would to heaven I had had thee for my man this three years since.'

'Perhaps I would not have been thy man.'

'Why not?'

'Because I have been my own man ever since I was born, and am well content with myself for my master.'

'Shall I bind up thy leg?' asked Hereward, having no more to say, and not wishing to kill the man.

'No. It will grow again, like a crab's claw.'

'Thou art a fiend.' And Hereward turned away, sulky and half afraid.

'Very like. No man knows what a devil he is till he tries.'

'What dost mean?' and Hereward turned angrily back.

'Friends we are all, till God's grace comes.'

'Little grace has come to thee yet, by thy ungracious tongue.'

'Rough to men may be gracious to women.'

'What hast thou to do with women?' asked Hereward fiercely.

'I have a wife, and I love her.'

'Thou art not like to get back to her to-day.'

'I fear not, with this paltry scratch. I had looked for a cut from that would have saved me all fighting henceforth.'

'What dost mean?' asked Hereward with an oath.

'That my wife is in heaven, and I would needs follow her.'

Hereward got on his horse, and rode away. Never could he find out who that Su Letwold was, or how he came into the Bruneswale. All he knew was, that he never had had such a fight since he wore beard, and that he had lost sword Braumbiter, from which his evil conscience augured that his luck had turned, and that he should lose many things beside.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

HOW HERWARD CAME IN TO THE KING

AFTER these things Hereward summoned all his men, and set before them the hopelessness of any further resistance, and the promises of amnesty, lands, and honours which William had offered him, and persuaded them—and indeed he had good arguments enough and to spare—that they should go and make their peace with the king.

They were so accustomed to look up to his determination, that when it gave way theirs gave way likewise. They were so accustomed to trust his wisdom, that most of them yielded at once to his arguments. That the band should break up, all agreed. A few of the more suspicious, or more desperate, said that they could never trust the Frenchman, that Hereward himself had warned them again and again of his treachery; that he was now going to do himself what he had laughed at Gospatric and the rest for doing, what had brought ruin on Edwin and Morcar, what he had again and again prophesied would bring ruin on Walthoof himself ere all was over.

But Hereward was deaf to their arguments. He had said as little to them as he could about Alfrida, for very shame, but he was utterly besotted on her. For her sake, he had determined to run his head blindly into the very snare of which he had warned others. And he had seared—so he fancied—his conscience. It was Torfrida's fault now, not his. If she left him—if she herself freed him of her own will—why, he was free, and there was no more to be said about it.

And Hereward (says the chronicler) took Gwenoel, Gery, and Matelgar, and rode south to the king.

Where were the two young Swards? It is not said. Probably they, and a few desperadoes, followed the fashion of so many English in those sad days—when, as sings the Norse scald,

'Cold heart and bloody hand
Now rule English land,' and took ship for Constantinople, and enlisted in the Varangian Guard, and died full of years and honour, leaving fair-haired children behind them, to become Varangers in their turn.

Be that as it may, Hereward rode south. But when he had gotten a long way upon the road, a fancy (says the chronicler) came over him. He was not going in pomp and glory enough. It seemed mean for the once great Hereward to sneak into Winchester with three knights. Perhaps it seemed not over safe for the once great Hereward to travel with only three knights. So he went back all the way to camp, and took (says the chronicler) 'forty most famous knights, all big and tall of stature, and splendid—if from nothing else, from their looks and their harness alone.'

So Hereward and those forty knights rode down from Peterborough, along the Roman road. For the Roman roads were then, and for centuries after, the only roads in this land, and our forefathers looked on them as the work of gods and giants, and called them after the names of their old gods and heroes—Irmen Street, Watling Street, and so forth.

And then, like true Englishmen, our own forefathers showed their respect for the said divine works, not by copying them, but by picking them to pieces to pave every man his own courtyard. Be it so. The neglect of new roads, the destruction of the old ones, was a natural evil consequence of local self-government. A cheap price perhaps, after all, to pay for that power of local self-government which has kept England free unto this day.

Be that as it may, down the Roman road Hereward went; past Alconbury Hill, of the old posting days; past Hatfield, then deep forest, and so to St. Albans, then deep forest likewise. And there they lodged in the minster, for the monks thereof were good English, and sang masses daily for King Harold's soul. And the next day they went south, by ways which are not so clear.

Just outside St. Albans—Verulamium of the Romans (the ruins whereof were believed to be full of ghosts, demons, and magic treasures)—they turned at St. Stephen's to the left, off the Roman road to London, and by another Roman road struck into the vast forest which ringed London round from north-east to south-west. Following the upper waters of the Colne, which ran through the woods on their left, they came to Watford, and then turned probably to Rickmansworth. No longer on the Roman paved ways, they followed horse-tracks, between the forest and the rich marsh-meadows of the Colne, as far as Denham, and then struck into a Roman road again at the north end of Langley Park. From thence over heathy commons—for that western part of Buckinghamshire, its soil being light and some gravel, was little cultivated then, and hardly all cultivated now—they held on straight by Langley town into the Vale of Thames.

Little they dreamed, as they rode down by Ditton Green, off the heathy commons, past the poor-scattered farms, on to the vast rushy meadows, while upon them was the dull weight of disappointment, shame, all but despair, their race enslaved, their country a prey to strangers, and all its future, like their own, a lurid blank—little they dreamed of what that vale would be within eight hundred years—the eye of England, and it may be of the world, a spot which owns more wealth and peace, more art and civilisation, more beauty and more virtue, it may be, than any of the God's-gardens which make fair this earth. Windsor, on its crowned steep, was to them but a new hunting-palace of the old miracle-monger Edward, who had just ruined England. Bunnymede, a mile below them down the broad stream, was but a horse-fen fringed with water-lilies, where the men of Wessex had met of old to counsel, and to bring the country to this pass. And as they crossed, by ford or ferry-boat, the shallows of old Windsor, whither they had been tending all along, and struck into the moorlands of Wessex itself, they were as men going into an unknown wilderness, behind them ruin, and before them unknown danger.

On through Windsor Forest, Edward the Saint's old hunting-ground, its bottoms choked with beech and oak, and birch and alder scrub; its upper lands vast flats of level heath; along the great trackway which runs along the lower side of Chobham Camp, some quarter of a mile broad, every rut and trackway as fresh at this day as when the ancient Briton, finding that his neighbour's cessum—chariot, or rather cart—had worn the ruts too deep, struck out a fresh wandering line for himself across the dreary heath.

Over the Blackwater by Sandhurst, and along the flats of Hartford Bridge, where the old furze-grown ruts show the trackway to this day down into the clayland forests of the Andredswald, and up out of them again at Basing, on to the clean crisp chalk turf, to strike at Popham Lane the Roman road from Silchester, and hold it over the high downs, till they saw far below them the royal city of Winchester.

It then, silver as they looked on her from above, but when they came down to her, so clear that none could see where water ended and where air began, hurried through the city in many a stream. Beyond it rose the 'White Camp,' the 'Venta Belgarum,' the circular earthwork of white chalk on the high down. Within the city rose the ancient minster church, built by Ethelwold—ancient even then—where slept the ancient kings, Kennulf, Eglbert, and Ethelwulf, the Saxons, and by them the Danes, Canute the Great, and Hardecanute, his son, and Norman Emma, his wife, and Ethelred's before him, and the great Earl Godwin, who seemed to Hereward to have died, not twenty, but two hundred years ago,—and it may be an old Saxon hall upon the littleisle whither Edgar had hidden bring the heads of all the wolves in Wessex, where afterwards the bishops built Wolvesey Palace. But nearer to them, on the down which sloped up to the west, stood an uglier thing, which they saw with curses deep and loud,—the keep of the new Norman castle by the west gate.

Hereward halted his knights upon the down outside the northern gate. Then he rode forward himself. The gate was open wide, but he did not care to go in.

So he rode into the gateway, and smote upon that gate with his lance-butt. But the porter saw the knights upon the down, and was afraid to come out; for he feared treason.

Then Hereward smote a second time—but the porter did not come out.

Then he took the lance by the shaft, and smote a third time. And he smote so hard, that the lance-butt flew to splinters against Winchester Gate.

And at that started out two knights, who had come down from the castle, seeing the men on the down; and asked.

'Who art thou, who knockest here so bold?'

'Who I am, any man can see by those splinters, if he knows what men are left in England this day.'

The knights looked at the broken wood, and then at each other. Who could the man be, who could beat an ash stave to splinters at a single blow?

'You are young, and do not know me, and no shame to you. Go and tell William the king that Hereward is come to put his hands between the king's, and be the king's man henceforth.'

'You are Hereward?' asked one, half awed, half disbelieving, at Hereward's short stature.

'You are—I know not who. Pick up those splinters, and take them to King William, and say, "The man who broke that lance against the gate is here to make his peace with thee," and he will know who I am.'

And so cowed were these two knights with Hereward's royal voice, and royal eye, and royal strength, that they went simply, and did what he bade them.

And when King William saw the splinters, he was as joyful as man could be, and said.

'Send him to me, and tell him, Bright shines the sun to me that lights Hereward into Winchester.'

'But, lord king, he has with him a meinie of full forty knights.'

'So much the better. I shall have the more valiant Englishmen to help my valiant French.'

So Hereward rode round, outside the walls, to William's new entrenched palace outside the west gate, by the castle.

And then Hereward went in, and knelt before the Norman, and put his hands between William's hands, and swore to be his man.

'I have kept my word,' said he, 'which I sent to thee at Rouen seven years ago. Thou art king of all England, and I am the last man to say so.'

'And since thou hast said it, I am king indeed. Come with me, and dine, and to-morrow I will see thy knights.'

And William walked out of the hall leaning on Hereward's shoulder, at which all the Normans gnashed their teeth with envy.

'And for my knights, lord king? Thine and mine will mix, for a while yet, like oil and water, and I fear lest there be murder done between them.'

'Likely enough.'

So the knights were bestowed in a 'vill' near by, and the next day the venerable king himself went forth to see those knights, and caused them to stand, and march before him, both with arms and without. With whom being much delighted, he praised them, congratulating them on their beauty and stature, and saying that they must all be knights of fame in war. After which Hereward sent them all home except two, and waited till he should marry Alfrida, and get back his heritage.

'And when that happens,' said William, 'why should we not have two weddings, beannare, as well as one? I hear that you have in Crowland a fair daughter, and marriageable.'

Hereward bowed.

'And I have found a husband for her suitable to her years, and who may conduce to your peace and serenity.'

Hereward bit his lip. To refuse was impossible in those days. But—

'I trust that your grace has found a knight of higher lineage than him whom, after so many honours, you honoured with the hand of my niece.'

William laughed. It was not his interest to quarrel with Hereward. 'Alas! Ivo, the woodcutter's son. I ask your pardon for that, Sir Hereward. Had you been my man then, as you are now, it might have been different.'

'If a kinsman ask my pardon, I can only ask him in return.'

'You must be friends with Taillebois. He is a brave knight, and a wise warrior.'

'None ever doubted that.'

'And to cover my little blot in his sentence, I have made him an earl, as I may make you some day.'

'Your majesty, like a true king, knows how to reward. Who is this knight whom you have chosen for my lady?'

'Sir Hugh of Everme, a neighbour of yours, and a man of blood and breeding.'

'I know him, and his lineage, and it is very well. I humbly thank your majesty.'

'Can I be the same man?' said Hereward to himself bitterly.

And he was not the same man. He was loosened on Altruda, and haunted himself accordingly.

CHAPTER XXXIX

HOW TORFRIDA CONFESSED THAT SHE HAD BEEN INSPIRED BY THE DEVIL

AFTER a few days, there came down a priest to Crowland from Winchester, and talked with Torfrida.

And she answered him, the priest said, so wisely and well, that he never had met with a woman of so clear a brain, or of so stout a heart.

At last, being puzzled to get that which he wanted, he touched on the matter of her marriage with Hereward.

She wished it, he said, dissolved. She wished herself to enter religion.

The Church would be most happy to sanction so fully a desire, but there were objections. She was a married woman, and her husband had not given his consent.

'Let him give it, then.'

There were still objections. He had nothing to bring against her which could justify the dissolution of the holy bond—unless—

'Unless I bring some myself!'

'There have been rumours—I say not how true—of magic and sorcery—'

Torfrida leapt up from her seat, and laughed such a laugh, that the priest said in after years, it rang through his head as if it had aken out of the pit of the loat.

'So that is what you want, churchman? Then you shall have it. Bring me pen and ink. I need not to confess to you. You shall read my confession when it is done. I am a better scribe, mind you, than any clerk between here and Paris.'

She seized the pen and ink, and wrote; not fiercely, as the priest expected, but slowly and carefully. Then she gave it to the priest to read.

'Will that do, churchman? Will that free my soul, and that of your French archbishop?'

And the priest read to himself.

How Torfrida of St. Omer, born at Arles, in Provence, confessed that from her youth up she had been given to the practice of diabolic arts, and had at diverse times and places used the same, both alone and with Richilda, late Countess of Harcourt. How, wickedly, wantonly, and instinct with a malignant spirit, she had compassed, by charms and spells, to win the love of Hereward. How she had ever since kept in bondage him, and others whom she had not loved with the same carnal love, but only desired to make them useful to her own desire of power and glory, by the same magical arts, for which she now humbly begged pardon of Holy Church, and of all Christian folk, and penetrated with compunction, desired only that she might retire into the convent of Crowland. She assented the marriage which she had so unlawfully compassed to be null and void, and prayed to be released therefrom, as a burden to her conscience and soul, that she might spend the rest of her life in penitence for her many enormous sins. She submitted herself to the judgment of Holy Church, only begging that this her free confession might be counted in her favour, and that she might not be put to death, as she deserved, nor remained perpetually, because her mother-in-law, according to the flesh, the Countess Godiva, being old and infirm, had daily need of her, and she wished to serve her mentally as long as she lived. After which, she put herself utterly upon the judgment of the Church. And meanwhile she desired and prayed that she might be allowed to remain in perpetual imprisonment (whereby her marriage could be canonically dissolved) in the said monastery of Crowland, not leaving the precincts thereof without special leave given by the abbot and priores in one case between her and them reserved, to wear garments of hair-cloth to fast all the year on bread and water, and to be disciplined with rods or otherwise, at such times as the priores should command, and to such degree as her body, softened with carnal luxury, could reasonably endure. And beyond—that, being dead to the world, God might have mercy on her soul.

And she meant what she said. The madness of remorse and disappointment, so common in the wild middle age, had come over her, and with it the twin madness of self-torture.

The priest read, and trembled; not for Torfrida, but for himself, lest she should enchant him after all.

'She must have been an awful sinner,' said he to the monks when he got safe out of the room, 'comparable only to the witch of Endor, or the woman Jezebel, of whom St. John writes in the Revelations.'

'I do not know how you Frenchmen measure folks, when you see them but to our mind she is—for goodness, humility, and patience, comparable only to an angel of God,' said Abbot Ulfsketyl.

'You Englishmen will have to change your minds on many points, if you mean to stay here.'

'We shall not change them, and we shall stay here,' quoth the abbot.

'How! You will not get Sweyn and his Dances to help you a second time.'

'No, we shall all die, and give you your wills, and you will not have the heart to cast our bones into the fens!'

'Not unless you intend to work miracles, and set up for saints, like your Alphego and Edmund.'

'Heaven forbid that we should compare ourselves with them! Only let us alone till we die.'

'If you let us alone, and do not turn traitor meanwhile.'

Abbot Ulfsketyl hit his lip, and kept down the rising feud.

'And now, said the priest, 'deliver me over Torfrida the younger, daughter of Hroeward and this woman, that I may take her to the king, who has found a fit husband for her.'

'You will hardly get her.'

'Not get her?'

'Not without her mother's consent. The lass cares for nought but her.'

'Push that sorceress! Send for the girl.'

Abbot Ulfsketyl, forced in his own abbey, great and august lord though he was, to obey any upstart of a Norman priest who came backed by the king and Lanthan, sent for the lass.

The young outlaw came in—hawk on fist, and its hood off, for it was a jet short, sturdy, upright, brown-haired, blue-eyed, ill-dressed, with hard hands and sunburnt face, but with the hawk-eyo of her father and her mother, and the hawks among which she was bred. She looked the priest over from head to foot, till he was abashed.

'A Frenchman!' said she, and she said no more.

The priest looked at her eyes, and then at the hawk's eyes. They were disagreeably like each other. He told his errand as courteously as he could, for he was not a bad-hearted man for a Norman priest.

The lass laughed him to scorn. The king's commands! She never saw a king in the greenwood, and cared for none. There was no king in England now, since Sweyn Ulfsen sailed back to Denmark. Who was this French William, to sell a free English lass like a colt or a cow? The priest might go back to the slaves of Wessex, and command them if he could but in the fens men were free, and lasses too.

The priest was piously shocked and indignant, and began to argue.

She played with her hawk instead of listening, and then was marching out of the room.

'Your mother,' said he, 'is a sorceress.'

'You are a knave, or set on by knaves. You lie, and you know you lie.' And she turned away again.

'She has confessed it.'

'You have driven her mad between you, till she will confess anything. I presume you threatened to burn her, as some of you did a while back.' And the young lady made use of words equally strong and true.

The priest was not accustomed to the direct language of the greenwood, and, indignant on his own account, threatened, and finally offered to use force. Whereon there looked up into his face such a gleam (so he said) as he never had seen or dreamed of, and said:

'If you lay a finger on me, I will bridle you like any dog.' And therewith pulled out a saying-knife, about half as long again as the said priest's hand, being very sharp, so he disposed, down the whole length of one edge, and likewise down his little finger's length of the other.

Not being versed in the terms of English ventry, he asked Abbot Ulfsketyl what brithing of a sliver might mean, and being informed that it was that operation on the carcass of a stag which his countrymen called renter, he subsided, and thought it best to go and consult the young lady's mother.

She, to his astonishment, submitted at once and utterly. The king and he whom she had called her husband were very gracious. It was all well. She would have preferred, and the lady Godiva too, after their experience of the world and the flesh, to have devoted her daughter to heaven in the instant there. But she was unworthy. Who was she, to train a bride for him who died on the cross? She accepted this as part of her penance, with thankfulness and humility. She had heard that Su Hugh of Everme was a gentleman of ancient birth and good prowess, and she thanked the king for his choice. Let the priest tell her daughter that she commanded her to go with him to Winchester. She did not wish to see her. She was stained with many crimes, and unworthy to approach a pure martyr. Besides, it would only cause misery and tears. She was trying to die to the world and to the flesh, and she did not wish to reawaken that power within her. Yes. It was very well. Let the lass go with him.

'Thou art indeed a true penitent,' said the priest, his human heart softening him.

'Thou art very much mistaken,' said she, and turned away.

The girl, when she heard her mother's command, wept, shrieked, and went. At least she was going to her father. And from wholesome fear of that same saying-knife, the priest left her in peace all the way to Winchester.

After which, Abbot Ulfsketyl went into his lodgings, and burst, like a noble old nobleman as he was, into bitter tears of rage and shame.

But Torfrida's eyes were as dry as her own sackcloth.

The priest took the letter back, and showed it—it may be to Archbishop Lanfranc, who was well versed in such matters, having already (as is well known to all the world) arranged King William's uncanonical marriage, by help of Archdeacon Hildebrand, afterwards pope. But what he said, this chronicler would not dare to say. For he was a very wise man, and a very staunch and strong pillar of the holy Roman Church. And doubtless he was man enough not to require that anything should be added to Torfrida's penance, and that would have been enough to prove him a man in those days—at least for a churchman—as it proved Archbishop or Saint Aired to be, a few years after, in the case of the nun of Watton, to be read in Gale's Scriptores Anglicanæ. Then he showed the letter to Alfruda.

And she laughed one of her laughs, and said, 'I have her at last!'

Then, as it befell, he was forced to show the letter to Queen Matilda, and she wept over it human tears, such as she, the noble heart, had been forced to weep many a time before, and said, 'The poor soul!—You, Alfruda, woman! does Hereward know of this?'

'No, madam,' said Alfruda, not adding that she had taken good care that he should not know.

'It is the best thing which I have heard of him. I should tell him, were it not that I must not meddle with my lord's plans. God grant him a good delivery, as they say of the poor souls in gaol. Well, madam, you have your will at last. God give you grace thereof, for you have not given him much chance as yet.'

'Your majesty will honour us by coming to the wedding!' asked Alfruda, utterly unabashed.

Matilda the Good looked at her with a face of such calm childlike astonishment, that Alfruda dropped her proud head at last, and slunk out of the presence like a beaten cur.

But William went to the wedding, and swore horrible oaths that they were the handsomest pair he had ever seen. And so Hereward married Alfruda. How Holy Church settled the matter is not said. But that Hereward married Alfruda, under these very circumstances, may be considered a 'historic fact,' being vouched for both by Gaimar and by Richard of Ely. And doubtless Holy Church contrived that it should happen without sin, if it conduced to her own interest.

And little Torfrida—then aged, it seems, some sixteen years—was married to Hugh of Evermuc. She wept and struggled as she was dragged into the church.

'But I do not want to be married. I want to go back to my mother.'

'The diabolic instinct may have descended to her,' said the priests, 'and attracts her to the sorceress. We had best sprinkle her with holy water.'

So they sprinkled her with holy water, and used exorcisms. Indeed, the case being an important one, and the personages of rank, they brought out from their treasures the apron of a certain virgin saint, and put it round her neck, in hopes of driving out the hereditary fiend.

'If I am led with a halter, I must needs go,' said she, with one of her mother's own flashes of wit, and went. 'But, Lady Alfruda,' whispered she, half-way up the church, 'I never loved him.'

'Behave yourself before the king, or I will whip you till the blood runs.'

And so she would, and no one would have wondered in those days.

'I will murder you, if you do. But I never even saw him.'

'Little fool! And what are you going through, but what I went through before you?'

'You to say that?' gnashed the girl, as another spark of her mother's wit came out. 'And you gaining what—?'

'What I have waited for for fifteen years,' said Alfruda coolly. 'If you have courage and cunning like me, to wait for fifteen years, you too may have your will likewise.'

The pure child shuddered, and was married to Hugh of Evermuc, who was, according to them of Crowland, a good friend to that monastery, and therefore, doubtless, a good man. Once, says wicked report, he offered to strike her, as was the fashion in those chivalrous days. Whereon she turned upon him like a tigress, and bidding him remember that she was the daughter of Hereward and Torfrida, gave him such a beating that he, not wishing to draw sword upon her, surrendered at discretion, and they lived all their lives afterwards as happily as most other married people in those times.

All this, however pleasant to Hereward, was not pleasant to the French courtiers, whereon, after the simple fashion of those times, they looked about for one who would pick a quarrel with Hereward and slay him in fair fight. But an Archibald Bell-the-Cat was not to be found behind every hedge.

Still, he might be provoked to fight. If his foe were slain, so much the worse for both parties. For a duel, especially if a fatal one, within the precincts of the king's court, was a grave offence, punishable, at least in extreme cases, with death.

Now it befell that among them at Winchester was Oger the Breton, he who had held Morcar's lands round Bourne, and who was now in wrath and dread enough at the prospect of having to give them up to Hereward. It was no difficult matter to set the hot-headed Celt on to provoke the equally hot-headed Wake, and accordingly Oger, having been duly plied with wine, was advised to say one afternoon—

'Hereward feeds well at the king's table. French cooking is a pleasant change for an outlaw, who has fed for many a day on rats and mice and such small deer.'

'A pleasanter change for a starveling Breton, who was often glad enough, ere he came to England, to rob his own ponies of their furze-toppings, and boil them down for want of kale.'

'We use furze-toppings in Brittany to scourge saucy churls withal. Speakest thou thus to me, who have the blood of King Arthur and half his knights in my veins?'

'Then discipline thine own churl's back therewith, for churl thou art, though thou comest of Arthur's blood. Nay, I will not quarrel with thee. I have had too many gnats pestering me in the fens already to care for one more here.'

Wherefrom the Breton judged that Hereward had no lust to fight.

The next day he met Hereward going out to hunt, and was confirmed in his opinion when Hereward lifted his cap to him most courteously, saying that he was not aware before that his neighbour was a gentleman of such high lineage.

'Lineage! Better at least than thine, thou bare-legged Saxon, who has dared to call me base born and starveling! So thou must needs have thy throat cut! I took thee for a wiser man.'

'Many have taken me for that which I am not. If you will harness yourself, I will do the same, and we will ride up to the woods, and settle this matter in peace.'

'Three men on each side to see fair play,' said the Breton.

And up to the woods they rode, and fought long without advantage on either side.

Hereward was not the man which he had been. His nerve was gone, as well as his conscience, and all the dash and fury of his old onslaughts gone therewith.

He grew tired of the fight, not in body, but in mind, and more than once drew back.

'Let us stop this child's play,' said he, according to the chronicler, 'what now have we to fight here all day about nothing?'

Whereat the Breton fancied him already more than half-beaten, and attacked more furiously than ever. He would be the first man on earth who ever had had the better of the great outlaw. He would win himself eternal glory, as the champion of all England.

But he had mistaken his man and his indomitable English pluck. 'It was Hereward's fashion in fight and war,' says the chronicler, 'always to ply the man most at the last.' And so found the Breton, for Hereward suddenly lost patience, and rushing on him with one of his old shouts, hewed at him again and again, as if his arm would never tire.

Oger gave back, would he or not. In a few moments his sword-arm dropped to his side, cut half-through.

'Have you had enough, Sir Tristram the younger?' quoth Hereward, wiping his sword, and walking moodily away.

The fruit of which was this. That within twenty-four hours Hereward was arrested on a charge of speaking evil of the king, breaking his peace, compassing the death of his faithful lieges, and various other wicked, traitorous, and diabolical acts.

He was to be sent to Bedford Castle, in the custody of Robert Herepol, chatelain of Bedford, a reasonable and courteous man. The king had spared his life, in consideration of his having first submitted himself.

Hereward went like a man stunned, and spoke never a word. Day after day he rode northward, unarmed for the first time for many a year, and for the first time in all his years, with gyves on ankle and on wrist. This was the wages of his sin. This was the faith of Frenchmen. He was not astonished, hardly disappointed. Hatred of William, and worse, hatred of himself, swept all the passions from his soul. Of Alfrida he never thought for a moment. Indeed he never thought steadily of anything, was hardly conscious of anything, till he heard the key turned on him in a room -- not a small or doleful one -- in Bedford keep, and found an iron shackle on his leg, fastened to the stone bench on which he sat.

Robert of Herepol had meant to leave his prisoner loose. But there were those among his French guards who told him, and with truth, that if he did so, no man's life would be safe, that to brain the gaoler with his own keys, and then twist out of his bowels a line wherewith to let himself down from the top of the castle, would be not only easy, but amusing, to the famous 'Wake.'

So Robert consented to fetter him so far, but no farther, and begged his pardon again and again as he did it, pleading the painful necessities of his office.

But Hereward heard him not. He sat in stupefied despair. A great black cloud had covered all heaven and earth, and entered into his brain through every sense, till his mind, as he said afterwards, was like hell with the fire gone out.

A gaoler came in, he knew not how long after, bringing a good meal, and wine. He came cautiously toward the prisoner, and when still beyond the length of his chain, set the food down, and thrust it toward him with a stick, lest Hereward should leap on him and wring his neck.

But Hereward never even saw him or the food. He sat there all day, all night, and nearly all the next day, and hardly moved hand or foot. The gaoler told Sir Robert in the evening that he thought the man was mad, and would die.

So good Sir Robert went up to him, and spoke kindly and hopefully. But all Hereward answered was, that he was very well. That he wanted nothing. That he had always heard well of Sir Robert. That he should like to get a little sleep, but that sleep would not come.

The next day Sir Robert came again early, and found him sitting in the same place.

'He was very well,' he said. 'How could he be otherwise? He was just where he ought to be. A man could not be better than in his right place.'

Whereon Sir Robert gave him up for mad.

Then he bethought of sending him a harp, knowing the fame of Hereward's music and singing. 'And when he saw the harp,' the quoter said, 'he wept, but bade take the thing away. And so sat still where he was.'

In this state of dull despair, he remained for many weeks. At last he woke up.

There passed through and by Bedford large bodies of troops, going as it were to and from battle. The clank of arms stirred Hereward's heart as of old, and he sent to Sir Robert to ask what was toward.

Sir Robert, 'the venerable man,' came to him joyfully and at once, glad to speak to an illustrious captive, whom he looked on as an injured person, and told him news enough.

Tallebois's warning about Ralph Guader and Waltheof had not been needless. Ralph, as the most influential of the Bretons, was on no good terms with the Normans, save with one, and that one of the most powerful—Fitz-Osbern, Earl of Hereford. His sister Ralph was to have married but William, for reasons unknown, forbade the match. The two great earls celebrated the wedding in spite of William, and asked Waltheof as a guest. And at Exning, between the ten and Newmarket Heath—

'Was that bride ale
Which was men's bair.'

For there was matured the plot which Ivo and others had long seen brewing. William (they said) had made himself hateful to all men by his cruelties and tyranny, and, indeed, his government was growing more unrighteous day by day. Let them drive him out of England, and put the land between them. Two should be dukes, the third king paramount.

'Waltheof, I presume,' quoth Hereward, 'plotted drunk, and repented sober, when too late. The wittol! He should have been a monk.'

'Repented he has, if ever he was guilty. For he fled to Archbishop Lanfranc, and confessed to him so much, that Lanfranc desires him innocent, and has sent him on to William in Normandy.'

'O kind priest! true priest! To send his sheep into the wolf's mouth.'

'You forget, dear sir, that William is our king.'

'I can hardly forget that, with this pretty ring upon my ankle. But after my experience of how he has kept faith with me, what can I expect for Waltheof, the wittol, save that which I have foretold many a time?'

'As for you, dear sire, the king has been misinformed concerning you. I have sent messengers to reason with him again and again, but as long as Taillebois, Warrene, and Robert Malet had his ear, of what use were my poor words?'

'And what said they?'

'That there would be no peace in England if you were loose.'

'They lied. I am no boy, like Waltheof. I know when the game is played out. And it is played out now. The Frenchman is master, and I know it well. Were I loose to-morrow, and as great a fool as Waltheof, what could I do with, it may be, some forty knights, and a hundred men-at-arms, against all William's armies? But how go on this fools' rebellion? If I had been loose, I might have helped to crush it in the bud.'

'And you would have done that against Waltheof?'

'Why not against him? He is but bringing more misery on England. Tell that to William. Tell him that if he sets me free, I will be the first to attack Waltheof, or whom he will. There are no English left to fight against,' said he bitterly, 'for Waltheof is none now.'

'He shall know your words when he returns to England.'

'What, is he abroad, and all this evil going on?'

'In Normandy. But the English have risen for the king in Herefordshire, and beate Earl Roger, and Odo of Bayeux and Bishop Mowbray are on their way to Cambridge, where they hope to give a good account of Earl Ralph, and hope, too, that the English may help them there.'

'And they shall! They hate Ralph Guader as much as I do. Can you send a message for me?'

'Whither?'

'To Rouen in the Brunswald, and say to Hereward's men, wherever they are, let them rise and arm, if they love Hereward, and go down to Cambridge, to be the foremost at Bishop Odo's side against Ralph Guader, or Waltheof himself. Send! send! Oh that I were free!'

'Would to heaven thou wert free, my gallant son!' said the good man.

From that day Hereward woke up somewhat. He was still a broken man, querulous, peevish, but the hope of freedom and the hope of battle stirred him. If he could but get to his men! But his melancholy returned. His men—some of them at least—went down to Odo at Cambridge, and did good service. Guader was utterly routed, and escaped to Norwich, and thence to Brittany, his home. The lords punished their prisoners, the rebel French, with horrible mutilations.

'The wolves are beginning to eat each other,' said Hereward to himself. But it was a sickening thought to him, that his men had been fighting and he not at their head.

After a while there came to Bedford Castle two witty knaves. One was a cook, who 'canno to buy milk,' says the chirqueler, the other seemingly a gleeman. They told stories, jested, harped, sang, drank, and pleased much the garrison and Sir Robert, who let them hang about the place.

They asked next, whether it were true that the famous Wake was there? If so, might a man have a look at him?

The gaoler said that many men might have gone to see him, so easy was Sir Robert to him. But he would have no man, and none dare enter save Sir Robert and he, for fear of their lives. But he would ask him of Hereward.

The good knight of Herepol said, 'Let the rogues go in, they may amuse the poor soul.'

So they went in, and as soon as they went, he knew them. One was Martin Lightfoot, the other, Leofric his mass-priest.

'Who sent you?' asked he surily, turning his face away.

'She.'

'Who?'

'We know but one she, and she is at Crow-bind.'

'She sent you? and wherefore?'

'That we might sing to you, and make you merry.'

Hereward answered them with a terrible word, and turned his face to the wall, groaning, and then bade them sternly to go.

So they went for the time.

The gaoler told this to Sir Robert, who understood all, being a kind-hearted man.

'From his poor first wife, eh? Well, there can be no harm in that. Nor if they came from this Lady Alfrida either, for that matter, let them go in and out when they will.'

'But they may be spies and traitors.'

'Then we can but hang them.'

Robert of Herepol, it would appear from the chronicle, did not much care whether they were spies or not.

So the men went to and fro, and often sat with Hereward. But he forbade them sternly to mention Tofrida's name.

Alfrida, meanwhile, returned to Bourne, and took possession of her new husband's house and lands. She sent him again and again messengers of passionate love and sorrow, but he listened to them as sullenly as he did to his two servants, and sent no answer back. And so he sat more weary months, in the very prison, it may be in the very room, in which John Bunyan sat eight hundred years after—but in a very different frame of mind.

One day Sir Robert was going up the stairs with another knight, and met the two coming down. He was talking to that knight earnestly, indignantly, and somehow, as he passed Leofric and Martin he thought fit to raise his voice, as if in a great wrath.

'Shame to all honour and chivalry! Good saints in heaven, what a thing is human fortune! That this man, who had once a gallant army at his back, should be at this moment going like a sheep to the slaughter, to Buckingham Castle, at the mercy of his worst enemy—of Ivo Taille-bow, of all men in the world! If there were a dozen knights left of all those whom he used to heap with wealth and honour, worthy the name of knights, they would catch us between here and Stratford, and make a free man of their lord.'

So spake—or words to that effect, according to the Latin chronicler, who must have got them from Leofric himself—the good knight of Herepol.

'Hillo, knaves!' said he, seeing the two, 'are you here cavedropping? Out of the castle this instant, on your lives.'

Which hint those two witty knaves took on the spot.

A few days after, Hereward was travelling toward Buckingham, chained upon a horse, with Sir Robert and his men, and a goodly company of knights belonging to Ivo. Ivo, as the story runs, seems to have arranged with Ralph Pagnel at Buckingham to put him into the keeping of a creature of his own. And how easy it was to put out a man's eyes, or starve him to death, in a French keep, none knew better than Hereward.

But he was past fear or sorrow. A dull heavy cloud of despair had settled down upon his soul. Black with sin, his heart could not pray. He had hardened himself against all heaven and earth, and thought, when he thought at all, only of his wrongs—but never of his sins.

CHAPTER XL

HOW EARL WALTHEOF WAS MADE A SAINT

A DAY or two after, there sat in Abbot Thorold's lodgings in Peterborough a select company of Frenchmen, talking over affairs of state after their supper.

'Well, lords and knights,' said the abbot, as he sipped his wine, 'the cause of our good king, which is happily the cause of Holy Church, goes well, I think. We have much to be thankful for when we review the events of the past year. We have finished the rebels, Roger de Bretonvil is safe in prison, Ralph Guadin unsafe in Brittany, and Waltheof more than unsafe in—the place to which traitors descend. We have not a man left which is not in loyal hands, we have not a single English monk left who has not been surgical and starved into holy obedience, not an English saint for whom any man cares a jot, since Guerin de Laro preached down St. Adhelm, the admirable inmate disposed of St. Alphego's martyrdom, and some other wise man—I am ashamed to say that I forget who—proval that St. Edmund of Sutholk was merely a barbarian knight, who was killed fighting with Danes only a little more heathen than himself. We have had great labours and great sufferings since we landed in this barbarous isle upon our holy errand ten years since, but, under the shadow of the Gumbles of St. Peter, we have conquered, and may sing, "Dominus Illuminatio mea," with humble and thankful hearts.'

'I don't know that,' said Ascelin, 'my lord uncle, I shall never sing "Dominus Illuminatio mea," till I see your cellars illuminated once more by those thirty thousand marks.'

'Or I,' said Ivo Taillebois, 'till I see Hereward's head on Bourne gable, where he stuck up those Frenchmen's heads seven years ago, as his will be, within a week after he gets to Buckingham Castle—where he should be by now. But what the lord abbot means by saying that we have done with English saints I do not see, for the rogues of Crowland have just made a new one for themselves.'

'A new one!'

'I tell you truth and fact, I will tell you all, lord abbot, and you shall judge whether it is not enough to drive an honest man mad to see such things going on under his nose. Men say of me that I am rough, and swear, and blaspheme. I put it to you, lord abbot, if Job would not have cursed if he had been lord of Spalding. You know that the king let these Crowland monks have Waltheof's body!'

'Yes, I thought it an unwise act of grace it would have been wiser to leave him, as he intended, out on the bare down, in ground unconsecrated, but what has happened?'

'That old traitor, Ulfketyl, and his monks, bring the body to Crowland, and bury it as if it had been the Pope's. In a week they begin to spread their lies—that Waltheof was innocent, that Archbishop Lanfranc himself said so.'

'That was the only act of human weakness which I have ever known the venerable prelate commit,' said Thorold.

'That the hurglers at Winchester were so deep in the traitor's favour, that the king had to have him out and cut off his head in the gray of the morning, ere folks were up and about, that the fellow was so holy that he passed all his time in prison in weeping and praying, and said over the whole psalter every day, because his mother had taught it him—I wish she had taught him to be an honest man—and that when his head was on the block he said all the paternoster, as far as "Lead us not into temptation," and then off went his head, whereon, his head being off, he finished the prayer with—you know best what comes next, abbot!'

'"Deliver us from evil, Amen!" What a manifest lie! The traitor was not permitted, it is plain, to ask for that which could never be granted to him but his soul, unworthy to be delivered from evil, entered instead into evil, and howls for ever in the pit.'

'But all the rest may be true,' said one, 'and yet that be no reason why these monks should say it.'

'So I told them,' quoth Taillebois, 'and threatened them too, for, not content with making him a martyr, they are making him a saint.'

'Impious! Who can do that, save the Holy Father!' said Thorold.

'You had best get your bishop to look to them, then; for they are carrying blind beggars and mad girls by the dozen to be cured at the man's tomb, that is all. Their fellows in the cell at Spalding went about to take a girl that had fits off one of my manors, to cure her, but that I stopped with a good horse-whip.'

'And rightly.'

'And gave the monks a piece of my mind; and drove them clean out of their cell home to Crowland.'

What a piece of Ivo's mind on this occasion might be, let Ingulf describe—

Against our monastery and all the people of Crowland he was, by the instigation of the devil, raised to such an extreme pitch of fury that he would follow their animals in the marshes with his dogs, drive them to a great distance down in the lakes, mutilate some in the tails, others in the ears, while often, by breaking the backs and legs of the beasts of burden, he rendered them utterly useless. Against our cell also (at Spalding) and our brethren, his neighbours, the prior and monks, who dwelt all day within his presence, he raged with tyrannical and frantic fury, lamed their oxen and horses, daily impounded their sheep and poultry, striking down, killing, and slaying their swine and pigs, while at the same time the servants of the prior were oppressed in the earl's court with insupportable exactions, were often assaulted in the highways with swords and staves, and sometimes killed.'

At this moment there was a bustle outside. The door which led from the hall was thrown open, and then rushed in, muddied and gory, Oger the Breton.

'Have a care for yourselves, lordings! The Wake is loose!'

If the earth had opened between them, the party could not have started more suddenly on their feet.

When their curses had lulled somewhat, Oger told his story between great gulps of wine, for he was nigh dead with hard riding.

'We were in a forest midway between Bedford and Buckingham, when the rascals dashed out on us—Gwenoch and Winter, and the rest, with that Ramsey monk and the Wake banners—I know not how many there were. We had no time to form or even arm. Our helmets were hanging at our saddle-bows—it was all over in a minute.'

'Cleverly done!' shouted Ivo, in spite of his curses, for he honestly loved deeds of arms, for him or against him. 'One Wake makes many.'

'And that old traitor of Herepold refused to fight. We were past his jurisdiction, he said. Your men, Lord Ivo, and Sir Ralph's must guard the prisoner, if they would.'

'He has been in league with The Wake all through.'

'That has he. For when The Wake was freed and armed, and hewing away like a devilish dwarf as he is, he always bade spare Sir Robert, crying that he was his friend and his saviour, and ere they parted the two villains shook hands lovingly, saying aloud how Sir Robert should ride post to the king, and give him a good report of Hereward.'

The comments which followed this statement had best be omitted, as they consisted wholly of French oaths.

'And how earnest thou alive hither, of all men?' asked the abbot at last.

'How? I was smitten down at once, having no sword arm as you know. But The Wake, when he saw me down, bade spare me. He would not slay me, lest the king should say he did it for the sake of my lady. I should ride to you here at Peterborough, and carry this message to you all, that whoso wanted his head cut off, should come to him at Bourne.'

'He has promised to cut my head off long ago,' said Ascelin. 'Earl, knights, and gentlemen, do you not think it wiser that we should lay our wife together once and for all, and cut off him?'

'But who will catch The Wake sleeping?' said Ivo, laughing.

'That will I. I have my plans, and my intelligencers.'

'You your intelligencers?'

'Nobles, there is nought suits so much my olivaceous humour as the consoling of distressed ladies. I may have visited the fair Alfrida at Bourne, I may have reminded her of certain old pleasant passages between her and me.'

'Which may end in thy going over thy horse's crump, nephew, as thou dost about another dame of Hereward's.'

'Uncle! What would a sinner of doughty deeds, and a deer thereof beside, like you, have me do especially when we both have thirty thousand marks to avenge—save dare again—perhaps to win? No, no. I lost that Torrida but I am grown cunninger now, and Alfrida is an easier game to fly at. I may have said to her, for instance, that she had better have chosen me, and been answered by gentle wailings about who should protect her in her loneliness. I may have offered to do so myself, and been shrucked at with "Out, traitor! wretch!" and yet have visited Bourne again—in all honesty, mind you, my lords. And I may have talked with a pretty bowen-maiden, and have said that though Abbot Thorold be poor, yet he has a ring or two left, or an owl, or suchlike, which might be earned by service due. And so forth. Wait for me, my good lords all, and I will not keep you waiting long.'

And so those wicked men took counsel together to slay Hereward.

CHAPTER VII

HOW HERWARD BEGAN TO GET HIS SON'S PRICE

AND now behold Hereward at home again, fat with the wages of sin, and not knowing that they are death.

He is once more 'Dominus de Brunne cum Marisco,' lord of Bourne with the fen, 'with all returns and liberties and all other things adjacent to the same vill, which are now held as a barony from the lord king of England.' He has a fair young wife, and with her farms and manors even richer than his own. He is still young, hearty, wise by experience, high in the king's favour, and deservedly so.

H. T. W.

Why should he not begin life again?

Why not? Unless it be true that the wages of sin are, not a new life, but death.

And yet he had his troubles. Hardly a French knight or baron round but had a blood-feud against him, for a kinsman slain. Of the Breton was not likely to forgive his wounded arm. Sir Aswain, Thorold the abbot's man, was not likely to forgive him for turning him out of the three Manthorpe manors, which he had comfortably held for two years past, and sending him back to lounge in the abbot's hall at Peterborough, without a yard of land which he could call his own. Sir Ascelin was not likely to forgive him for marrying Alfrida, whom he had intended to marry himself. Ivo Taillebois was not likely to forgive him for existing within a hundred miles of Spalding, any more than the wolf would forgive the lamb for fouling the water below him. Beside, had not he (Ivo) married Hereward's niece? And what more grievous offence could Hereward commit, than to be her uncle, reminding Ivo of his own low birth by his nobility, and too likely to take Lucia's part, whenever it should please Ivo to beat or kick her? Only Gillairet of Ghent, 'the pious and illustrious earl,' sent messages of congratulation and friendship to Hereward, it being his custom to sail with the wind, and worship the rising sun—till it should decline again.

But more, hardly one of the Frenchmen round him, in the conceit of their skin-deep yesterday's civilisation, looked on Hereward as a barbarian Englishman, who had his throat tattooed, and wore a short coat, and preferred—the churl—to talk English in his own hall, though he could talk as good French as they when he was with them, beside three or four barbarian tongues if he had need.

But more still—if they were not likely to bestow their love on Hereward, Hereward was not likely to win love from them of his own will. He was peevish and wrathful, often insolent and quarrelsome and small blame to him. The French were invaders and tyrants, who had no business there, and would not have been there if he had had his way. And they and he could no more amalgamate than fire and water. Moreover, he was a very great man, or had been such once, and he thought himself one still. He had been accustomed to command men, whole armies, and he would no more treat these French as his equals than they would treat him as such. His own son-in-law, Hugh of Everme, had to take hard words—thoroughly well-deserved, it may be, but all the more unpleasant for that reason.

The truth was, that Hereward's heart was gnawed with shame and remorse, and therefore he fancied, and not without reason, that all men pointed at him the finger of scorn.

He had done a bad, base, accursed deed. And he knew it. Once in his life—for his other sins were but the sins of his age—the Father of men seems (if the chroniclers say truth) to have put before this splendid barbarian good and evil, saying, Choose! And he knew that the evil was evil, and chose it nevertheless.

Eight hundred years after, a far greater genius and greater general had the same choice—as far as human cases of conscience can be alike—put before him. And he chose as Hereward chose.

But as with Napoleon and Josephine, so it was with Hereward and Torfrida. Neither thrived after.

It was not punished by miracle. What sin is? It worked out its own punishment, that which it merited, deserved, or earned by its own labour. No man could commit such a sin without shaking his whole character to the root. Hereward tried to persuade himself that his was not shaken, that he was the same Hereward as ever. But he could not deceive himself long. His conscience was evil. He was discontented with all mankind, and with himself most of all. He tried to be good—as good as he chose to be. If he had done wrong in one thing, he might make up for it in others, but he could not. All his higher instincts fell from him one by one. He did not like to think of good and noble things, he dared not think of them. He felt, not at first, but as the months rolled on, that he was a changed man; that God had left him. His old bad habits began to return to him. Gradually he sank back more and more into the very vices from which Torfrida had raised him sixteen years before. He took to drinking again, to quell the malady of thought, he excused himself to himself, he wished to forget his defeats, his disappointment, the ruin of his country, the splendid past which lay behind him like a dream. True, but he wished to forget likewise Torfrida fasting and weeping in Crowland. He could not bear the sight of Crowland Tower on the far green horizon, the sound of Crowland bells booming over the flat on the south wind. He never rode down into the fens, he never went to see his daughter at Deeping, because Crowland lay that way. He went up into the old Brunesswald, hunted all day long through the glades where he and his merry men had done their doughty deeds, and came home in the evening to get drunk.

Then he lost his sleep. He sent down to Crowland to Leofric the priest, that he might come to him, and sing him sagas of the old heroes, that he might get rest. But Leofric sent back for answer that he would not come.

That night Alfrida heard him by her side in the still hours, weeping silently to himself. She caressed him, but he gave no heed to her.

'I believe,' and she bitterly at last, 'that you love Torfrida still better than you do me.'

And Hereward answered, like Mahomet in like case, 'That do I, by heaven. She believed in me when no one else in the world did.'

And the vain hard Alfrida answered angrily; and there was many a fierce quarrel between them after that.

With his love of drinking, his love of boasting came back. Because he could do no more great deeds—or rather had not the spirit left in him to do more—he must needs, like a worn-out old man, babble of the great deeds which he had done, insult and defy his Norman neighbours, often talk what might be easily caricatured into treason against King William himself.

There were great excuses for his follies, as there are for those of every beaten man; but Hereward was spent. He had lived his life, and had no more life which he could live, for every man, it would seem, brings into the world with him a certain capacity, a certain amount of vital force, in body and in soul, and when that is used up, the man must sink down into some sort of second childhood, and end, like Hereward, very much where he began—unless the grace of God shall lift him up above the capacity of the mere flesh, into a life literally new, ever-renewing, ever-expanding, and eternal.

But the grace of God had gone away from Hereward, as it goes away from all men who are unfaithful to their wives.

It was very pitiable. Let no man judge him late, to most, is very hard work. There are those who endure to the end, and are saved; there are those, again, who do not endure, upon whose souls may God have mercy.

So Hereward soon became as intolerable to his Norman neighbours as they were intolerable to him, and he had, for his own safety, to keep up at Bourne the same watch and ward by day and night as he had kept up in the forest.

In those days a messenger came riding post to Bourne. The Countess Judith wished to visit the tomb of her late husband, Earl Waltheof, and asked hospitality on her road of Hereward and Alfrida.

Of course she would come with a great train, and the trouble and expense would be great. But the hospitality of those days, when money was scarce, and wine scarcer still, was unbounded, and a matter of course, and Alfrida was overjoyed. No doubt Judith was the most unpopular person in England at that moment, called by all a traitress and a fiend. But she was an old acquaintance of Alfrida's, she was the king's niece, she was immensely rich, not only in manors of her own, but in manors, as Domesday-book testifies, about Lincolnshire and the counties round, which had belonged to her murdered husband—which she had too probably received as the price of her treason. So Alfrida looked to her visit as to an honour which would enable her to hold her head high among the proud French dames, who despised her as the wife of an Englishman.

Hereward looked on the visit in a different light. He called Judith ugly names, not undeserved, and vowed that if she entered his house by the front door he would go out at the back. 'Torfrida prophesied,' he said, 'that she would betray her husband, and she has done it.'

'Torfrida prophesied! Did she prophesy that I should betray you likewise?' asked Alfruda, in a tone of bitter scorn.

'No, you handsome fiend, will you do it!'

'Yes, I am a handsome fiend, am I not?' and she bridled up her magnificent beauty, and stood over him as a snake stands over a mouse.

'Yes, you are handsome—beautiful I adore you.'

'And yet you will not do what I wish!'

'What you wish? What would I not do for you? What have I not done for you?'

'Then receive Judith. And now, go hunting, and bring me in game. I want deer, roe, fowls, anything and everything, from the greatest to the smallest. Go and hunt.'

And Hereward trembled and went.

There are flowers whose scent is so insidious that silly children will plunge their heads among them, drinking in their odour, to the exclusion of all fresh air. On a sudden, sometimes, comes a revulsion of the nerves. The delicious odour changes in a moment to a disgusting one; and the child cannot bear for years after the scent which has once become intolerable by oversweetness. And so had it happened to Hereward. He did not love Alfruda now, he loathed, hated, dreaded her. And yet he could not take his eyes for a moment off her beauty. He watched every movement of her hand, to press it, obey it. He would have preferred instead of hunting simply to sit and watch her go about the house at her work. He was spellbound to a thing which he regarded with horror.

But he was told to go and hunt, and he went, with all his men, and sent home large supplies for the larder. And as he hunted, the fresh air of the forest comforted him; the free forest life came back to him, and he longed to be an outlaw once more, and hunt on for ever. He would not go back yet, at least to face that Judith. So he sent back the greater part of his men with a story. He was ill, he was laid up at a farmhouse far away in the forest, and begged the countess to excuse his absence. He had sent fresh supplies of game, and a goodly company of his men, knights and housecarles, who would escort her royally to Crowland.

Judith cared little for his absence, he was but an English barbarian. Alfruda was half glad to have him out of the way, lest his now sullen and uncertain temper should break out, and bowed herself to the earth before Judith, who patronised her to her heart's content, and offered her shyly insistent condolences on being married to a barbarian. She herself could sympathise—who more?

Alfruda might have answered with scorn that she was a princess, and of better English blood than Judith's French blood; but she had her ends to gain, and gained them.

For Judith was pleased to be so delighted with her that she kissed her lovingly, and said with much emotion that she required a friend who would support her through her coming trial, and who better than one who herself had suffered so much? Would she accompany her to Crowland?

Alfruda was overjoyed, and away they went.

And to Crowland they came, and to the tomb in the minster, whereof men were saying already that the sacred corpse within worked miracles of healing.

And Judith, habited in widow's weeds, approached the tomb, and laid on it, as a peace-offering to the soul of the dead, a splendid pall of silk and gold.

A fierce blast came howling off the fen, screeched through the minster towers, swept along the dark aisles, and then, so say the chroniclers, caught up the pall from off the tomb, and hurled it far away into a corner.

'A miracle!' cried all the monks at once, and honestly enough, like true Englishmen as they were.

'The holy saint refuses the gift, countess,' said old Ulfketyl, in a voice of awe.

Judith covered her face with her hands, turned away trembling, and walked out, while all looked upon her as a thing accursed.

Of her subsequent life, her folly, her wantonness, her disgrace, her poverty, her wanderings, her wretched death, let others tell.

But these Normans believed that the curse of heaven was upon her from that day. And the best of them believed likewise that Waltheof's murder was the reason that William, her uncle, prospered no more in life.

'Ah, saucy sir,' said Alfruda to Ulfketyl, as she went out. 'There is one waiting at Peterborough now who will teach thee manners, Ingulf of Fontenelle, abbot in thy room.'

'Does Hereward know that?' asked Ulfketyl, looking keenly at her.

'What is that to thee?' said she fiercely, and flung out of the minster. But Hereward did not know. There were many things abroad of which she told him nothing.

They went back, and were landed at Deeping town, and making their way along the King Street to Bourne. Thereon a man met them running. They had best stay where they were. The Frenchmen were out, and there was fighting up in Bourne.

Alfruda's knights wanted to push on, to see after the Bourne folk, Judith's knights wanted to push on to help the French, and the two parties were ready to fight each other. There was a great tumult. The ladies had much ado to still it.

Alfruda said that it might be but a countryman's rumour, that, at least, it was shame to quarrel with their guests. At last it was agreed that two knights should gallop on into Bourne, and bring back news.

But those knights never came back. So the whole body moved on Bourne, and there they found out the news for themselves.

Hereward had gone home as soon as they had departed, and sat down to eat and drink. His manner was sad and strange. He drank much at the mid-day meal, and then lay down to sleep, setting guards as usual.

After a while he leapt up with a shriek and shudder.

They ran to him, asking whether he was ill.

'Ill? No. Yes. Ill at heart. I have had a dream—an ugly dream. I thought that all the men I ever slew on earth came to me with their wounds all gaping, and cried at me, "Our luck then, thy luck now." Chaplain! Is there not a verse somewhere—uncle Brand said it to me on his deathbed—"Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed"?''

'Surely the master is fey,' whispered Gwenoeh in fear to the chaplain. 'Answer him out of Scripture.'

'Text? None such that I know of,' quoth priest Ailward, a graceless fellow, who had taken Leofric's place. 'If that were the law, it would be but few honest men that would die in their beds. Let us drink, and drive girls' fancies out of our heads.'

So they drank again, and Hereward fell asleep once more.

'It is thy turn to watch, priest,' said Winter to Ailward. 'So keep the door well, for I am worn out with hunting,' and so fell asleep.

Ailward shuffled into his harness, and went to the door. The wine was heady, the sun was hot. In a few minutes he was asleep likewise.

Hereward slept, who can tell how long? But at last there was a rustle, a heavy fall, and waking with a start, he sprang up. He saw Ailward lying dead across the door, and above him a crowd of fierce faces, some of which he knew too well. He saw Ivo Taillebois, he saw Oger, he saw his fellow-Breton, Sir Raoul de Dol, he saw Sir Ascelin; he saw Sir Aswart, Thorold's man; he saw Sir Hugh of Evermine, his own son-in-law, and with them he saw, or seemed to see, the ogre of Cornwall, and Feargus of Ivark, and Dirk Hammerhand of Waloheren, and many another old foe long underground, and in his ear rang the text—'Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed.' And Hereward knew that his end was come.

There was no time to put on mail or helmet. He saw sword and shield hang on a perch, and tore them down. As he garded the sword on, Winter sprang to his side.

'I have three lances—two for me and one for you, and we can hold the door against twenty.'

'Till they fire the house over our heads. Shall Hereward die like a wolf in a cave? Forward, all The Wake men! A Wake! A Wake!

And he rushed out upon his fate. No man followed him, save Winter. The rest, dispersed, unarmed, were running hither and thither helplessly.

'Brothers in arms! and brothers in Valhalla!' shouted Winter as he rushed after him.

A knight was running to and fro in the court, shouting Hereward's name. 'Where is the villain? Wake! We have caught thee asleep at last.'

'I am out,' quoth Hereward, as the man almost stumbled against him, 'and thou art in.'

And through shield, and hauberk, and body, as says Gaimar, went Hereward's javelin, while all drew back, confounded for the moment at that mighty stroke.

'Felon!' shouted Hereward, 'your king has given me his truce, and do you dare break my house, and kill my folk? Is that your French law? And is this your French honour?—To take a man unawares over his meat? Come on, traitors all, and get what you can of a naked man, you will buy it dear—Guard my back, Winter!'

And he ran right at the press of knights; and the fight began.

'He gored them like a wood wild boar,
As long as that lance might endure.'

says Gaimar

'And when that lance did break in hand,
Full full enough he smote with brand.'

And as he hewed on silently, with grinding teeth, and hard glittering eyes, of whom did he think? Of Alfrida?

Not so. But of that pale ghost, with great black hollow eyes, who sat in Crowland, with thin bare feet, and sackcloth on her tatter-limbs, watching, praying, longing, loving, uncomplaining. That ghost had been for many a month the background of all his thoughts and dreams. It was so clear before his mind's eye now, that, unawares to himself, he shouted 'Tofrida!' as he struck, and struck the harrier at the sound of his old battle-cry.

And now he is all wounded and be-bled, and Winter, who has fought back to back with him, has fallen on his face, and Hereward stands alone, turning from side to side, as he sweeps his sword right and left till the forest rings with the blows, but staggering as he turns. Within a ring of eleven corpses he stands. Who will go in and make the twelfth?

A knight rushes in, to fall headlong down, cleft through the helm: but Hereward's blade snaps short, and he hurls it away as his foes rush in with a shout of joy. He tears his shield from his left arm, and with it, says Gaimar, brains two more.

But the end is come. Taillebois and Evermue are behind him now, four lances are through his back, and bear him down upon his knees.

'Cut off his head, Breton!' shouted Ivo. Raoul de Dol rushed forward, sword in hand. At that cry Hereward lifted up his dying head. One stroke more ere it was all done for ever.

And with a shout of 'Torfrida!' which made the Bruneswald ring, he hurled the shield full in the Breton's face, and fell forward dead.

The knights drew their lances from that terrible corpse slowly and with caution, as men who have felled a bear, and yet dare not step within reach of the seemingly lifeless paw.

'The dog died hard,' said Ivo. 'Lucky for us that Sir Ascelin had news of his knights being gone to Crowland. If he had had them to back him, we had not done this deed to-day.'

'I must keep my word with him,' said Ascelin, as he struck off the once fair and golden head.

'Ho, Breton,' cried Ivo, 'the villain is dead. Get up, man, and see for yourself. What ails him?'

But when they lifted up Raoul de Dol his brains were running down his face, and all men stood astonished at that last mighty stroke.

'That blow,' said Ascelin, 'will be sung hereafter by minstrel and maiden as the last blow of the last Englishman. Knights, we have slain a better knight than ourselves. If there had been three more such men in this realm, they would have driven us and King William back again into the sea.'

So said Ascelin, those words of his, too, were sung by many a jongleur, Norman as well as English, in the times that were to come.

'Likely enough,' said Ivo, 'but that is the more reason why we should set that head of his up over the hall-door, as a warning to those English churls that their last man is dead, and their last stake thrown and lost.'

So perished 'The last of the English.'

It was the third day. The French were drinking in the hall of Bourne, advising Ascelin, with coarse jests, to lose no time in espousing the fair Alfrida, who sat weeping within over the headless corpse; when in the afternoon a servant came in, and told them how a barge full of monks had come to the shore, and that they seemed to be monks from Crowland. Ivo Taillebois bade drive them back again into the barge with whips. But Hugh of Evermue spoke up.

'I am lord and master in Bourne this day; and if Ivo have a quarrel against St. Guthlac, I have none. This Ingulf of Fontenelle, the new abbot who has come thither since old Ulfsketil was sent to prison, is a loyal man, and a friend of King William's, and my friend he shall be till he behaves himself as my foe. Let them come up in peace.'

Taillebois growled and cursed, but the monks came up, and into the hall, and at their head Ingulf himself, to receive whom all men rose, save Taillebois.

'I come,' said Ingulf, in most courtly French, 'noble knights, to ask a boon in the name of the Most Merciful, on behalf of a noble and unhappy lady. Let it be enough to have avenged yourself on the living. Gentlemen and Christians war not against the dead.'

'No, no, master abbot!' shouted Taillebois, 'Waltheof is enough to keep Crowland in miracles for the present. You shall not make a martyr of another Saxon churl. He wants the barbarian's body, knights, and you will be fools if you let him have it.'

'Churl? Barbarian?' said a haughty voice, and a nun stepped forward who had stood just behind Ingulf. She was clothed entirely in black. Her bare feet were bleeding from the stones. Her hand, as she lifted it, was as thin as a skeleton's.

She threw back her veil, and showed to the knights what had been once the famous beauty of Torfrida.

But the beauty was long passed away. Her hair was white as snow, her cheeks were fallen in. Her hawk-like features were all sharp and hard. Only in their hollow sockets burned still the great black eyes, so fiercely that all men turned uneasily from her gaze.

'Churl? Barbarian?' she said slowly and quietly, but with an intensity which was more terrible than rage. 'Who gives such names to one who was as much better born and better bred than they who now sit here, as he was braver and more terrible than they? The base woodcutter's son?—The upstart who would have been honoured had he taken service as your dead man's groom?—'

'Talk to me so, and my stirrup leathers shall make acquaintance with your sides,' said Taillebois.

'Keep them for your wife. Churl? Barbarian? There is not a man within this hall who is not a barbarian compared with him. Which of you touched the harp like him? Which of you, like him, could move all hearts with song? Which of you knows all tongues from Lapland to Provence? Which of you has been the joy of ladies' bowers, the counsellor of earls and heroes, the rival of a mighty king? Which of you will compare yourself with him—whom you dared not even strike, you and your robber crew, fairly in front, but skulked round him till he fell pecked to death by you, as Lapland Skratlungs peck to death the bear! Ten years ago he swept this hall of such as you, and hung their heads upon yon gable outside, and were he alive but one five minutes, this hall would be right cleanly swept again! Give me his body—or bear for ever the name of cowards, and Torfrida's curse.'

She fixed her terrible eyes first on one, and then on another, calling them by name.

'Ivo Taillebois—basest of all—'

'Take the witch's accursed eyes off me!' and he covered his face with his hands. 'I shall be overlooked—planet-struck. Hew the witch down! Take her away!'

'Hugh of Evermeo—The dead man's daughter is yours, and the dead man's lands. Are not these remembrances enough of him? Are you no fond of his memory that you need his corpse likewise?'

'Give it her! Give it her!' said he, hanging down his head like a ratal car.

'Ascelin of Lincoln, once Ascelin of Ghent—There was a time when you would have done—what would you not?—for one glance of Torfrida's eyes. Stay. Do not deceive yourself, fair sir. Torfrida means to ask no favour of you, or of living man. But she commands you. Do the thing she bids, or with one glance of her eye she sends you childless to your grave.'

'Madam! Lady Torfrida! What is there I would not do for you? What have I done now, save avenge your great wrong?'

Torfrida made no answer, but fixed steadily on him eyes which widened every moment.

'But, madam!—and he turned shrinking from the fancied spell—'what would you have? The—the corpse? It is in the keeping of—of another lady.'

'So?' said Torfrida quietly. 'Leave her to me,' and she swept past them all, and slung open the bower door at their backs, discovering Alfruda sitting by the dead.

The ruffians were so utterly appalled, not only by the false powers of magic, but by the veritable powers of majesty and eloquence, that they let her do what she would.

'Out!' cried she, using a short and terrible epithet. 'Out, siren, with fairy's face and tail of fiend, and leave the husband with his wife!'

Alfruda looked up, shrieked, and then, with the sudden passion of a weak nature, drew a little knife, and sprang up.

Ivo made a coarsen jest. The abbot sprang in. 'For the sake of all holy things, let there be no more murder here!'

Torfrida smiled, and fixed her snake's eye upon her wretched rival.

'Out! woman, and choose thee a new husband among these French gallants, ere I blast thee from head to foot with the leprosy of Naaman the Syrian.'

Alfruda shuddered, and fled shrieking into an inner room.

'Now, knights, give me—that which hangs outside.'

Ascelin hurried out, glad to escape. In a minute he returned.

The head was already taken down. A tall lay brother, the moment he had seen it, had climbed the gable, snatched it away, and now sat in a corner of the yard, holding it on his knees, talking to it, chiding it, as if it had been alive. When men had offered to take it, he had drawn a battle-axe from under his frock, and threatened to brain all comers. And the monks had warned off Ascelin, saying that the man was mad, and had Berserk fits of superhuman strength and rage.

'He will give it me,' said Torfrida, and went out.

'Look at that gable, foolish head,' said the madman. 'Ten years ago, you and I took down from thence another head. O foolish head, to get yourself at last up into that same place! Why would you not be ruled by her, you foolish golden head?'

'Martin!' said Torfrida.

'Take it and comb it, mistress, as you used to do. Comb out the golden locks again fit to shine across the battlefield. She has let them all get entangled into elf-knots, that lazy slut within!'

Torfrida took it from his hands, dry-eyed, and went in.

Then the monks silently took up the bier, and all went forth, and down the Roman road, toward the fen. They laid the corpse within the barge, and slowly rowed away.

And past the Deeping, down the Welland stream,
By winding reaches on, and shining meres
Between gray reed-beds, and green alder beds,
And the brown horror of the homeless fen,
A dirge of monks and wail of women rose
In vain to heaven for the last Englishman,
Then died far off within the boundless mist,
And left the Frenchman master of the land!

So Torfrida took the corpse home to Crowland, and buried it in the choir, near the blessed martyr St. Waltheof, after which she did not die, but lived on many years, spending all day in nursing and feeding the Countess Godiva, and lying all night on Hereward's tomb, and praying that he might find grace and mercy in that day.

And at last Godiva died, and they took her away, and buried her with great pomp in her own minster-church of Coventry.

And after that Torfrida died likewise; because she had nothing else for which to live. And they laid her in Hereward's grave, and their dust is mingled to this day.

¹ If Ingulf can be trusted, Torfrida died about A. D. 1085.

And Oger the Breton got back Morcar's lands, and held them at least till the time of Domesday-book. But Manthorpe, Toft, and Witham, Aswast, Thorold's man, got back, and they were held for several centuries by the abbey of Peterborough, seemingly as some set-off for Abbot Thorold's thirty thousand marks.

And Ivo Taillebois did evil mightily all his days, and how he died, and what befell him after death, let Peter of Blois declare.

And Leofric the priest lived on to a good old age, and above all things he remembered the deeds and the sins of his master, and wrote them in a book, and thus is what remains thereof.

But when Martin Lightfoot died no man has said, for no man in those days took account of such poor churls and running serving-men.

And Hereward's comrades were all scattered abroad, some maimed, some blinded, some with tongues cut out, to beg by the wayside, or crawl into convents, and then die, while their sisters and daughters, ladies born and bred, wore the slaves of grooms and scullions from beyond the sea.

And so, as sang Thorkel Skallason—

'Cold heart and bloody hand!
Now rule English land.'

And after that things waxed even worse and worse, for sixty years and more, all through the reigns of the two Williams, and of Henry Beaulerc, and of Stephen, till men saw visions and portents, and thought that the foul fiend was broken loose on earth. And they whispered oftener and oftener that the soul of Hereward haunted the Brunswald, where he loved to hunt the dun deer and the roe. And in the Brunswald, when Henry of Poitou was made abbot,* men saw—'let no man think lightly of the marvel which we are about to relate as a truth, for it was well known all over the country—upon the Sunday, when men sing "Exsurge quare, O Domine," many hunters hunting, black, and tall, and loathly, and their hounds were black and ugly with wide eyes, and they rode on black horses and black bucks. And they saw them in the very deer park in the town of Peterborough, and in all the woods to Stamford, and the monks heard the blasts of the horns which they blow in the night. Men of truth kept watch upon them, and said that there might be well about twenty or thirty horn-blowers. This was seen and heard all that Lent until Easter.' And the French monks of Peterborough said how it was The Wake, doomed to wake for ever with Apollyon and all his crew, because he had stolen the riches of the Golden Borough—but the poor folk knew better, and said, That the mighty outlaw was rejoicing in the chase, blowing his horn for Englishmen to rise against the French, and therefore it was that he was seen first on 'Arise O Lord' Sunday.

But they were so sore trodden down that they could never rise, for 'the French' had filled the land full of castles. They greatly oppressed the wretched people by making them work at these castles, and when the castles were finished, they filled them with devils and evil men. They took those whom they suspected of having any goods, both men and women, and they put them in prison for their gold and silver, and tortured them with pains unspeakable, for never were any martyrs tormented as these were. They hung some by their feet, and smoked them with foul smoke, some by the thumbs or by the head, and put burning things on their feet. They put a knotted string round their heads, and twisted it till it went into the brain. They put them in dungeons wherein were addors, and snakes, and toads, and thus wore them out. Some they put into a crucet-house—that is, into a chest that was short and narrow, and they put sharp stones therein, and crushed the man so that they broke all his bones. There were hateful and grim things called *sachentege*s in many of the castles, which two or three men had enough to do to carry. This sachentege was made thus—It was fastened to a beam, having a sharp iron to go round a man's throat and neck, so that he might no ways sit, nor lie, nor sleep, but he must bear all the iron. Many thousands they wore out with hunger. They were continually levying a tax from the towns, which they called trusene, and when the wretched townsfolk had no more to give, then burnt they all the towns, so that well mightest thou walk a whole day's journey or ever thou shouldst see a man settled in a town, or its lands tilled.

'Then was corn dear, and flesh, and cheese, and butter, for there was none in the land. Wretched men starved with hunger. Some lived on alms who had been once rich. Some fled the country. Never was there more misery, and never heathens acted worse than these.'

For now the sons of the Church's darlings, of the Crusaders whom the Pope had sent, beneath a gonfalon blessed by him, to destroy the liberties of England, turned by a just retribution upon that very French clergy who had abetted all their iniquities in the name of Rome. 'They spared neither church nor churchyard, but took all that was valuable therein, and then burned the church and all together. Neither did they spare the lauds of bishops, nor of abbots, nor of priests, but they robbed the monks and clergy, and every man plundered his neighbour as much as he could. If two or three men came riding to a town, all the townsfolk fled before them, and thought that they were robbers. The bishops and clergy were for ever cursing them, but this to them was nothing, for they were all accursed and forsworn and reprobate. The earth bore no corn, you might as well have tilled the sea, for all the land was ruined by such deeds, and it was said openly that Christ and His saints slept.

And so was avenged the blood of Harold and his brothers, of Edwin and Morean, of Walthoeof and Hereward.

And those who had the spirit of Hereward in them fled to the merry greenwood, and became bold outlaws, with Robin Hood, Scarlet, and John, Adam Bell, and Clym of the Cleugh, and William of Cloudeslee, and watched with sullen joy the French robbers tearing in pieces each other, and the Church who had blest their crime.

And they talked and sung of The Wake, and all his dauntless deeds, over the hearth in lone farmhouse, or in the outlaw's lodge beneath the hollow green, and all the burden of their song was, 'Ah that The Wake were alive again!' for they knew not that The Wake was alive for evermore—that only his husk and shell lay mouldering there in Crowland choir, that above them, and around them, and in them, destined to raise them out of that bitter bondage, and mould them into a great nation, and the parents of still greater nations in lands as yet unknown, brooded the immortal spirit of The Wake, now purged from all earthly dross—even the spirit of Freedom, which can never die.

CHAPTER XLII

HOW DEEPING FEN WAS DRAINED

BUT war and disorder, ruin and death, cannot last for ever. They are by their own nature exceptional and suicidal, and spend themselves with what they feed on. And then the true laws of God's universe, peace and order, usefulness and life, will reassert themselves, as they have been waiting all along to do, had in God's presence from the strife of men.

And even so it was with Bourne.

Nearly eighty years after, in the year of grace 1155, there might have been seen sitting, side by side, and hand in hand, upon a sunny bench on the Bruneswald slope, in the low December sun, an old knight and an old lady, the master and mistress of Bourne.

Much had changed since Hereward's days. The house below had been raised a whole story.

There were fresh herbs and flowers in the garden, unknown at the time of the Conquest. But the great change was in the fen, especially away toward Deeping, on the south-eastern horizon.

Where had been lonely meres, foul water-concretes, stagnant slime, there were now great dykes, rich and fair corn and grass lands, rows of white cottages. The newly-drained land swarmed with stocks of new breeds—horses and sheep from Flanders, cattle from Normandy, for Richard de Rulos was the first—as far as history tells—of that noble class of agricultural squires who are England's blessing and England's pride.

'For thus Richard de Rulos,' says Ingulf, or whoever wrote in his name, 'who had married the daughter and heiress of Hugh of Evermune, Lord of Bourne and Deeping, being a man of agricultural pursuits, got permission from the monks of Crowland, for twenty marks of silver, to enclose as much as he would of the common marshes. So he shut out the Wolland by a strong embankment, and building thereon numerous tenements and cottages, till in a short time he formed a large "vill," marked out gardens, and cultivated fields, while, by shutting out the river, he found in the meadow land, which had been lately deep lakes and impassable marshes (wherefore the place was called Deeping, the deep meadow), most fertile fields and desirable lands, and out of sloughs and bogs accursed made quite a garden of pleasure.'

So there the good man, the beginning of the good work of centuries, sat looking out over the fen, and listening to the music which came on the southern breeze, above the low of the kine, and the clang of the wild-fowl settling down to rest, from the hells of Crowland minster far away.

They were not the same bells which tolled for Hereward and Torfrida. Those had run down in molten streams upon that fatal night when Abbot Ingulf leapt out of bed to see the vast wooden sanctuary wrapt in one sheet of roaring flame, from the carelessness of a plumber who had raked the ashes over his fire in the bell-tower, and left it to smoulder through the night.

Then perished all the riches of Crowland, its library too, of more than seven hundred volumes, with that famous Nadir, or Orrery, the like whereof was not in all England, wherein the seven planets were represented, each in their proper metals. And even worse, all the charters of the monastery perished, a loss which involved the monks thereof in centuries of lawsuits, and compelled them to become as industrious and skilful forgers of documents as were to be found in the minsters of the Middle Age.

But Crowland minster had been rebuilt in greater glory than ever, by the help of the French gentry round. Abbot Ingulf, finding that St. Guthlac's plain inability to take care of himself had discredited him much in the women's eyes, fell back, Frenchman as he was, on the virtues of the holy martyr, St. Walthoof, whose tomb he opened with due reverence, and found the body as whole and uncorrupted as on the day on which it was buried, and the head united to the body, while a fine crimson line around the neck was the only sign remaining of his decollation.

On seeing which Ingulf 'could not contain himself for joy, and interrupting the responses which the brethren were singing, with a loud voice began the hymn, "Te Deum Laudamus," on which the chanter, taking it up, enjoined the rest of the brethren to sing it.' After which Ingulf—who had never seen Walthoof in life—discovered that it was none other than he whom he had seen in a vision at Fontenelle, as an earl most gorgeously arrayed, with a tone of gold about his neck, and with him an abbot, two bishops, and two saints, the three former being Ushaw, Aubelet, and Wandregisel of Fontenelle, and the two saints, of course, St. Guthlac and St. Neot.

Whereon, crawling on his hands and knees, he kissed the face of the holy martyr, and 'perceived such a sweet odour proceeding from the holy body, as he never remembered to have smelt, either in the palace of the king or in Syria with all its aromatic herbs.'

Quid plura? What more was needed for a convent of hunt-out monks? St. Walthoof was translated in state to the side of St. Guthlac, and the news of this translation of the holy martyr being spread throughout the country, multitudes of the faithful flocked thither to the tomb, and offering up their vows there, tended in a great degree to 'resuscitate our monastery.'

But more. The virtues of St. Walthoof were too great not to turn themselves, or be turned, to some practical use. So if not in the days of Ingulf, at least in those of Abbot Jollid, who came after him, St. Walthoof began again, says Peter of Blois, to work wonderful deeds. 'The blind received their sight, the deaf their hearing, the lame their power of walking, and the dumb their power of speech, while each day troops innumerable of other sick persons were arriving by every road, as to the very fountain of their safety—and by the offerings of the pilgrims who came flocking in from every part, the revenues of the monastery were increased in no small degree.'

Only one wicked Norman monk of St. Albans, Audwin by name, dared to dispute the sanctity of the martyr, calling him a wicked traitor who had met with his deserts. In vain did Abbot Jollid, himself a Norman from St. Evroult, expostulate with the inconvenient blasphemer. He launched out into invective beyond measure, till on the spot, in presence of the said father, he was seized with such a stomach-ache, that he went home to St. Albans, and died in a few days, after which all went well with Crowland, and the French monks, who worked the English martyr to get money out of the English whom they had enslaved.

And yet—so strangely nangled for good and evil are the works of men—that lying brotherhood of Crowland set up, in those very days, for pure love of learning and of teaching learning, a little school of letters in a poor town hard by, which became, under their auspices, the University of Cambridge.

So the bells of Crowland were restored, more melodious than ever, and Richard of Ruloe doubtless had his share in their restoration. And that day they were ringing with a will, and for a good reason, for that day had come the news that Henry Plantagenet was crowned king of England.

"Lord," said the good old knight, "now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace." This day, at last, he sees an English king head the English people.

'God grant,' said the old lady, 'that he may be such a lord to England as thou hast been to Bourne.'

'If he will be—and better far will he be, by God's grace, than what I hear of him, than ever I have been—he must learn that which I learnt from thee—to understand these English men, and know what stout and trusty prichommes they are all, down to the meanest serf, when once one can humour their sturdy independent tempers.'

'And he must learn, too, the lesson which thou dost teach me, when I would have laid thee, in the pride of youth, put on the magic armour of my ancestors, and win no fame in every tournament and battlefield. Blessed be the day when Richard of Ruloe said to me, "If others dare to be men of war, I dare more, for I dare to be a man of peace. Have patience with me, and I will win for thee and for myself a renown more lasting, before God and man, than ever was won with lance!" Do you remember those words, Richard mine?'

The old man leant his head upon his hands. 'It may be that not those words, but the deeds which God has caused to follow them, my, by Christ's merits, bring us a short purgatory and a long heaven.'

'Amen. Only whatever grief we may endure in the next life for our sins, may we endure it as we have the griefs of this life, hand in hand.'

'Amen, Torfrida. There is one thing more to do before we die. The tomb in Crowland,— Ever since the fire blackened it, it has seemed to me too poor and mean to cover the dust which once held two such noble souls. Let us send over to Normandy for fair white stone of Caen, and let us carve a tomb worthy of thy grandparents.'

'And what shall we write thereon?'

'What but that which is there already. "Here lies the last of the English"'

'Not so. We will write—"Here lies the last of the old English." But upon thy tomb, when thy time comes, the monks of Crowland shall write—'

'"Here lies the first of the new English, who, by the inspiration of God, began to drain the Fens"'

TAILOR AND POET.

CHAPTER I

A POET'S CHILDHOOD.

I AM a Cockney among Cockneys Italy and the Tropics, the Highlands and Devonshire, I know only in dreams Even the Surrey hills, of whose loveliness I have heard so much, are to me a distant fairyland, whose gleaming ridges I am worthy only to behold afar With the exception of two jonnies, never to be forgotten, my knowledge of England is bounded by the horizon which encircles Richmond Hill

My earliest recollections are of a suburban street, of its jumble of little shops and little terraces, each exhibiting some fresh variety of capricious ugliness, the little scraps of garden before the doors, with their dusty, stunted lilacs and balsam poplars, were my only forests, my only wild animals, the dingy, merry sparrows, who quivered fearlessly on my window sill, ignorant of trap or gun From my earliest childhood, through long nights of sleepless pain, as the midnight brightened into dawn, and the glaring lamps grew pale, I used to listen, with a pleasant awe, to the ceaseless roll of the market-waggon, bringing up to the great city the treasures of the gay green country, the land of fruits and flowers, for which I have yearned all my life in vain They seemed to my boyish fancy mysterious messengers from another world the silent, lonely night, in which they were the only moving things, added to the wonder I used to get out of bed to gaze at them, and envy the coarse men and sluttish women who attended them, their labour among verdant plants and rich brown mould, on breezy slopes, under God's own clear sky I fancied that they learnt what I knew I should have learnt there, I know not then that "the eye only sees that which it brings with it the power of seeing" When will their eyes be opened? When will priests go forth into the highways and the hedges, and preach to the ploughman and the gipsy the blessed news, that there, too, in every thicket and fallow field, is the house of God;—here, too, the gate of Heaven?

I do not complain that I am a Cockney. That, too, is God's gift He made me one, that I might learn to feel for poor wretches who sit stifled in reeking garrets and workrooms drinking in disease with every breath,—banned in their prison house of brick and iron, with their own funeral pall hanging over them, in that canopy of fog and poisonous smoke, from their cradle to their grave. I have drank of the cup of which they drink And so I have learnt—if, indeed, I have learnt—to be a poet—a poet of the people That lesson, surely, was worth buying with asthma, and rickets, and consumption, and weakness, and—worst of all to me—with ugliness It was God's purpose about me; and, therefore, all circumstances combined to imprison me in London I used once, when I worshipped circumstance, to fancy it my curse, Fate's injustice to me, which kept me from developing my genius, and asserting my rank among poets I longed to escape to glorious Italy, or some other southern clime, where natural beauty would have become the very element which I breathed, and yet, what would have come of that? Should I not, as nobler spirits than I have done, have idled away my life in Elysian dreams, singing out like a bird into the air unarticulately, purposeless, for mere joy and fullness of heart; and, taking no share in the terrible questionings, the terrible struggles of this great, awful, blessed time—feeling no more the pulse of the great heart of England stirring me, I used, as I said, to call it the curse of circumstance that I was a sickly, decrepit Cockney My mother used to tell me that it was the cross which God had given me to bear I know now that she was right there She used to say that my disease was God's will I do not think, though, that she spoke right there also I think that it was the will of the world and of the devil, of man's avarice, and laziness, and ignorance And so would my readers, perhaps, had they seen the shop in the city where I was born and nursed, with its little garrets reeking with human breath, its kitchens and areas with noisome sewers. A sanitary reformer would not be long in guessing the cause of my unhealthiness He would not rebuke me—nor would she, sweet soul! now that she is at rest in bliss—for my wild longings to escape, for my envying the very flies and sparrows their wings that I might flee miles away into the country, and breathe the air of heaven once, and die I have had my wish. I have made two journeys far away into the country, and they have been enough for me.

My mother was a widow. My father, whom I cannot recollect, was a small retail tradesman in the city. He was unfortunate, and when he died, my mother came down, and lived pennilessly enough. I knew not how till I grew older, down in that same suburban street. She had been brought up an Independent. After my father's death she became a Baptist, from conscientious scruples. She considered the Baptists, as I do, as the only sect who thoroughly embody the Calvinistic doctrine. She held it, as I do, an absurd and impious thing for those who believe mankind to be children of the devil till they have been consciously "converted," to baptise unconscious infants and give them the sign of God's mercy on the mere chance of that mercy being intended for them. When God had proved, by converting them, that they were not reprobate and doomed to hell by His absolute and eternal will, then, and not till then, dare man baptise them into His name. She dared not pun a presumptuous fiction on herself, and call it "charity." But though we had both been christened during my father's lifetime, she purposed to have us rebaptised, if ever that happened—which, in her sense of the word, never happened, I am afraid, to me.

She gloried in her dissent, for she was sprung from old Puritan blood, which had flowed again and again beneath the knife of Stra-Chunker butchers, and on the battle fields of Naseby and Sedgemoor. And on winter evenings she used to sit with her Bible on her knee, while I and my little sister Susan stood beside her and listened to the stories of Gideon and Barak, and Samson and Jephtah, till her eye kindled up, and her thoughts passed forth from that old Hebrew time home into those English times which she fancied, and not untruly, like them. And we used to shudder, and yet listen with a strange fascination, as she told us how her ancestor killed his seven sons off their small Cambridge farm, and horsed and armed them himself to follow behind Cromwell, and smite kings and prelates with "the sword of the Lord and of Gideon." Whether she were right or wrong, what is it to me? What is it now to her, thank God! But those stories, and the strict, stern Puritan education, learnt from the Independents and not the Baptists, which accompanied them, had their effect on me, for good and ill.

My mother moved by rule and method; by God's law, as she considered, and that only. She seldom smiled. Her word was absolute. She never commanded twice, without punishing. And yet there were abysses of unspoken tenderness in her, as well as clear, womanly sense and insight. But she thought herself as much bound to keep down all tenderness as if she had been some ascetic of the Middle Ages—so do extremes meet. It was "carnal," she considered. She had as yet no right to have any "spiritual affection" for us. We were still "children of wrath and of the devil,"—not yet "convicted of sin," "converted, born again." She had no more spiritual bond with us, she thought, than she had with a heathen or a Papist. She dared not even pray for our conversion, earnestly as she prayed on every other subject. For though the majority of her sect would have done so, her clear logical sense would yield to no such tender inconsistency. Had it not been decided from all eternity? We were elect, or we were reprobate. Could her prayers alter that? If He had chosen us, He would call us in His own good time and, if not,—Only, again and again, as I afterwards discovered from a journal of hers, she used to beseech God with agonised tears to set her mind at rest by revealing to her His will towards us. For that comfort she could at least rationally pray. But she received no answer. Poor, beloved mother! If thou couldst not read the answer, written in every flower and every sunbeam, written in the very fact of our existence, here at all, what answer would have sufficed thee?

And yet, with all this, she kept the strictest watch over our morality. Fear, of course, was the only motive she employed, for how could our still carnal understandings be affected with love to God? And love to herself was too faulty and temporary to be urged by one who knew that her life was uncertain, and who was always trying to go down to the deepest eternal ground and reason of everything, and like her stand upon that. So our god, or gods rather, till we were twelve years old, were hell, the rod, the ten commandments, and feeble opinion. Yet under them, not they, but something deeper far, both in her and us, preserved us pure. Call it natural character, conformation of the spirit, conformation of the brain, if you like, if you are a scientific man and a physiologist. I never yet could dissect and map out my own being, or my neighbour's, as you analysts do. To me, I myself, aye, and each person round me, seem one metaphysical whole, to take away a single faculty whereof is to destroy the harmony, the meaning, the life of all the rest. That there is a duality in us—a lifelong battle between flesh and spirit—we all, alas! know well enough, but which is flesh and which is spirit, what philosophers in those days can tell us? Still less had we two found out any such duality or discord in ourselves; for we were gentle and obedient children. The pleasures of the world did not tempt us. We did not know of those existences, and no foundlings educated in a nunnery ever grew up in more virginal and spotless innocence—if ignorance be such—than did Susan and I.

The narrowness of my sphere of observation only concentrated the faculty into greater strength. The few natural objects which I met—and they, of course, constituted my whole outer world (for art and poetry were tabooed both by my rank and my mother's sectarianism, and the study of human beings only develops itself as the boy grows into the man)—these few natural objects, I say, I studied with intense keenness. I knew every leaf and flower in the little front garden, every cabbage and rhubarb-plant in Battersea Fields was wonderful and beautiful to me. Clouds and water I learnt to delight in, from my occasional lingerings on Battersea Bridge, and yearning westward looks toward the sun setting above rich meadows and wooded gardens, to me a forbidden El Dorado.

I brought home wild flowers and chance beetles and butterflies, and pored over them, not in the spirit of a naturalist, but of a poet. They were to me God's angels, shining in coats of mail and fairy masquerading dresses. I envied them their beauty, their freedom. At last I made up my mind, in the simple tenderness of a child's conscience, that it was wrong to rob them of the liberty for which I pined,—to take them away from the beautiful broad country whither I longed to follow them, and I used to keep them a day or two, and then, regretfully, carry them back, and set them loose on the first opportunity, with many compunctions of heart, when, as generally happened, they had been staved to death in the meantime.

They were my only recreations after the hours of the small day-school at the neighbouring chapel, where I learnt to read, write, and sum, except, now and then, a London walk, with my mother holding my hand tight the whole way. She would have hood-winked me, stopped my ears with cotton, and led me in a string,—kind, careful soul!—if it had been reasonably safe on a crowded pavement, so fearful was she lest I should be polluted by some chance sight or sound of the Babylon which she feared and hated—almost as much as she did the Bishops.

The only books which I knew were the Pilgrim's Progress and the Bible. The former was my Shakespeare, my Dante, my Vedas, by which I explained every fact and phenomenon of life. London was the City of Destruction, from which I was to flee; I was Christian, the Wicket of the Way of Life I had strangely identified with the turnpike at Battersea Bridge and, and the rising ground of Moulton and Wimbledon was the Land of Beulah—the Enchanted Mountains of the Shepherds. If I could once get there, I was saved—a carnal view, perhaps, and a childish one, but there was a dim meaning and human reality in it nevertheless.

As for the Bible, I knew nothing of it really, beyond the Old Testament. Indeed, the life of Christ had little chance of becoming interesting to me. My mother had given me formally to understand that it spoke of matters too deep for me; that, "till converted, the natural man could not understand the things of God" and I obtained little more explanation of it from the two unintelligible, dreary sermons to which I listened every dreary Sunday, in terror lest a chance shuffle of my feet, or a hint of drowsiness, the natural result of the stifling gallery and glaring windows and gaslights,—should bring down a lecture and a punishment when I returned home. Oh, those "Sabbaths"—days, not of rest, but utter weariness, when the beetles and the flowers were put by, and there was nothing to fill up the long vacancy but books of which I could not understand a word, when play, laughter, or even a stare out of window at the sun, merrily, Sabbath-breaking pro-miscuaries, were all forbidden, as if the commandment had run, "In it thou shalt take no manner of amusement, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter." By what strange ascetic perversion has that got to mean "keeping holy the Sabbath-day?"

Yet there was an hour's relief in the evening, when either my mother told us Old Testament stories, or some other preacher or two came in to supper after meeting, and I used to sit in the corner and listen to their talk, not that I understood a word, but the mere struggle to understand—the mere watching my mother's earnest face—my pride in the reverent flattery with which the worthy men addressed her as "a mother in Israel," was enough to fill up the blank for me till bedtime.

Of "vital Christianity" I heard much, but, with all my efforts, could find out nothing. Indeed, it did not seem interesting enough to tempt me to find out much. It seemed a set of doctrines, believing in which was to have a magical effect on people, by saving them from the everlasting torture due to sins and temptations which I had never felt. Now and then, believing, in obedience to my mother's assurances, and the solemn prayers of the ministers about me, that I was a child of hell, and a lost and miserable sinner, I used to have accessions of terror, and fancy that I should surely wake next morning in everlasting flames. Once I put my finger a moment into the fire, as certain Papists, and Protestants too, have done, not only to themselves, but to their disciples, to see if it would be so very dreadfully painful; with what conclusions the reader may judge.

Still, I could not keep up the excitement. Why should I?—The fear of pain is not the fear of sin, that I know of, and, indeed, the thing was unreal altogether in my case, and my heart, my common sense, rebelled against it again and again, till at last I got a terrible whipping for taking my little sister's part, and saying that if she was to die,—so gentle, and obedient, and affectionate as she was,—God would be very unjust in sending her to hell-fire, and that I was quite certain He would do no such thing—unless

He were the Devil—an opinion which I have since seen no reason to change. The confusion between the King of Hell and the King of Heaven has cleared up, thank God, since then.

So I was whipped and put to bed—the whipping altering my secret heart just about as much as the dread of hell fire did.

I speak as a Christian man—an orthodox Churchman (if you require that shibboleth). Was I so very wrong? What was there in the idea of religion which was presented to me at home to captivate me? What was the use of a child's hearing of "God's great love manifested in the scheme of redemption," when he heard, in the same breath, that the effects of that redemption were practically confined only to one human being out of a thousand, and that the other nine hundred and ninety-nine were lost and damned from their birth to all eternity—not only by the absolute will and reprobation of God (though that infernal blasphemy I heard often enough), but also, putting that out of the question, by the mere fact of being born of Adam's race. And this to a generation to whom God's love shines out in every tree, and flower, and hedge-side bird, to whom the daily discoveries of science are revealing that love in every microscopic mummified which peoples the stagnant pool! This to working-men, whose craving is only for some idea which shall give equal hopes, claims, and deliverances to all mankind alike! This to working-men, who, in the smiles of their innocent children, see the heaven which they have lost—the messages of baby-chimbs, made in God's own image! This to me, to whom every butterfly, every look at my little sister, contradicted the lie! You may say that such thoughts were too deep for a child, that I am ascribing to my boyhood the scepticism of my manhood; but it is not so, and what went on in my mind goes on in the minds of thousands. It is the cause of the contempt into which not merely sectarian Protestantism, but Christianity altogether, has fallen, in the minds of the thinking workmen. Clergymen, who anathematise us for wandering into Unitarianism—you, you have driven us thither. You must find some explanation of the facts of Christianity more in accordance with the truths which we do know, and will live and die for, or you can never hope to make us Christians; or, if we do return to the true fold, it will be as I returned, after long, miserable years of darkling error, to a higher truth than most of you have yet learned to preach.

But those old Jewish heroes did fill my whole heart and soul. I learnt from them lessons which I never wish to unlearn. Whatever else I saw about them, this I saw,—that they were patriots, deliverers from that tyranny and injustice from which the child's heart,—"child of the devil" though you may call him,—instinctively, and, as I believe, by a divine inspiration, revolts. Moses leading his people out of Egypt; Gideon, Barak, and Samson slaying their oppressors; David, hiding in the mountains from the tyrant, with his little band of those who had fled from the oppressions of an aristocracy of Nobels. Jehu, executing God's vengeance on the kings—they were my heroes, my models, they mixed themselves up with the dim legends about the Reformation martyrs, Cromwell and Hampden, Sidney and Monmouth, which I had heard at my mother's knee. Not that the perennial oppression of the masses, in all ages and countries, had yet risen on me as an awful, torturing, fixed idea. I fancied, poor fool! that tyranny was the exception, and not the rule. But it was the mere sense of abstract pity and justice which was delighted in me. I thought that these were old fairy tales, such as never need be realised again. I learnt otherwise in after years.

I have often wondered since, why all cannot read the same lesson as I did in those old Hebrew Scriptures—that they of all books in the world, have been wrested into proofs of the divine right of kings, the eternal necessity of slavery! But the eye only sees what it brings with it the power of seeing. The upper classes, from their first day at school to their last day at college, read of nothing but the glories of Salamis and Marathon, of freedom and of the old republics. And what comes of it? No more than that tutors know will come of it, when they thrust into the boy's hands books which give the lie in every page to their own political superstitions.

But when I was just turned of thirteen, an altogether new fairyland was opened to me by some missionary tracts and journals, which were lent to my mother by the ministers. Pacific coral islands and volcanoes, coconut groves and bananas, graceful savages with paint and feathers—what an El Dorado! How I devoured them and dreamt of them, and went there in fancy, and preached small sermons as I lay in bed at night to Tahitians and New Zealanders, though I confess my spiritual eyes were, just as my physical eyes would have been, far more busy with the scenery than with the souls of my audience. However, that was the place for me, I saw clearly. And one day, I recollect it well, in the little dingy, foul, reeking, twelve-foot-square back-yard, where huge smoky party-walls shut out every breath of air and almost all the light of heaven, I had climbed up between the water butt and the angle of the wall for the purpose of fishing out of the dirty fluid which lay there, crusted with gnat and alive with insects, to be renewed only three times in the seven days, some of the great larvae and kicking monsters which made up a large item in my list of wonders. All of a sudden the horror of the place came over me; those grim prison walls above, with their canopy of lurid smoke; the dreary, sloppy, broken pavement; the horrible stench of the stagnant cesspools; the utter want of form, colour, life, in the whole place, crushed me down, without my being able to analyse my feelings as I can now, and then came over me that dream of Pacific Islands, and the free, open sea, and I slid down from my perch, and bursting into tears threw myself upon my knees in the court, and prayed aloud to God to let me be a missionary.

Half fearfully I set out my wishes to my mother when she came home. She gave me no answer, hint, as I found out afterwards, —too late, alas! for her, if not for me,—she, like Mary, had "laid up all these things, and treasured them in her heart."

You may guess then my delight when, a few days afterwards, I heard that a real live missionary was coming to take tea with us. A man who had actually been in New Zealand! —the thought was rapture. I painted him to myself over and over again, and when after the first burst of fancy, I recollected that he might possibly not have adopted the native costume of that island, or, if he had, that perhaps it would look too strange for him to wear it about London, I settled within myself that he was to be a tall, venerable-looking man, like the portraits of old Puritan divines which adorned our day-room, and as I had heard that "he was powerful in prayer," I advanced his right hand with that mystic weapon "all-prayer," with which Christian, when all other means had failed, finally vanquishes the fiend—-which instrument, in my mind, was somewhat after the model of an infernal sort of hilt or halberd—all hooks, curls, spikes, and crescents—which I had passed, shuddering, once, in the hand of an old eunuch of annam in Wardour Street.

He came—and with him the two ministers who often drank tea with my mother; both of whom, as they played some small part in the drama of my afterlife, I may as well describe here. The elder was a little, sleek, silver-haired old man, with a blind, weak face, just like a white rabbit. He loved me, and I loved him too, for there were always lollipops in his pocket for me and Susan. Had his head been equal to his heart—but what has been was to be—and the dissenting clergy, with a few noble exceptions among the Independents, are not the strong men of the day—none know that better than the workmen. The old man's name was Bowyer. The other, Mr Wigginton, was a younger man; tall, grim, dark, bilious, with a narrow forehead, retreating suddenly from his eyebrows up to a conical peak of black hair over his ears. He preached "higher doctrine," i.e. more fatalist and Antinomian, than his gentler colleague,—and, having also a stentorian voice, was much the greater favourite at the chapel. I hated him—and if any man ever deserved hatred, he did.

Well, they came. My heart was in my mouth as I opened the door to them, and sunk back again to the very lowest depths of my inner man when my eyes fell on the face and figure of the missionary—a squat, red-faced, pig-eyed, low-browed man, with great soft lips that opened back to his very ears, sensuality, conceit, and cunning marked on every feature—an innate vulgarity, from which the artisan and the child recoil with an instinct as true, perhaps truer, than that of the courtier, showing itself in every tone and motion, I shrunk into a corner, so crest-fallen that I could not even exert myself to hand round the bread and butter, for which I got duly scolded afterwards. Oh! that man!—how he bawled and contradicted, and laid down the law, and spoke to my mother in a fumbling, patronising way, which maddened me, I knew not why, boil over with jealousy and indignation. How he filled his teacup half full of the white sugar, to buy which my mother had entailed her yesterday's dinner—how he drained the few remaining drops of the three-pennyworth of cream, with which Susan was stealing off to keep it as an unexpected treat for my mother at breakfast the next morning—how he talked of the natives, not as St. Paul might of his converts, but as a planter might of his slaves, over-laying all his unintentional confessions of his own greed and prosperity, with cant, flimsy enough for even a boy to see through, while his eyes were not blinded with the superstition that a man must be pious who sufficiently interlards his speech with a jumble of old English picked out of our translation of the New Testament. Such was the man I saw. I don't deny that all are not like him. I believe there are noble men of all denominations, doing their best according to their light, all over the world, but such was the one I saw—and the men who are sent home to plead the missionary cause, whatever the men may be like who stay behind and work, are, from my small experience, too often such. It appears to me to be the rule that many of those who go abroad as missionaries, go simply because they are men of such inferior powers and attainments that if they stayed in England they would starve.

Three parts of his conversation, after all, was made up of abuse of the missionaries of the Church of England, not for doing nothing, but for being so much more successful than his own sect,—accusing them, in the same breath, for being just of the inferior type of which he was himself, and also of being more universally true gentlemen. Really I did not wonder, upon his own showing, at the savages preferring them to him; and I was pleased to hear the old white-headed minister gently interpose at the end of one of his tirades—"We must not be jealous, my brother, if the Establishment has discovered what we, I hope, shall find out some day, that it is not wise to draft our missionaries from the off-scouring of the ministry, and serve God with that which costs us nothing except the expense of providing for them beyond seas."

"There was somewhat of a roguish twinkle in the old man's eye as he said it, which emboldened me to whisper a question to him."

"Why is it, sir, that in old times the heathens used to crucify the missionaries and burn them, and now they give them beautiful farms, and build them houses, and carry them about on their backs?"

The old man seemed a little puzzled, and so did the company, to whom he smilingly retailed my question.

As nobody seemed inclined to offer a solution, I ventured one myself.

"Perhaps the heathens are grown better than they used to be?"

"The heart of man," answered the tall, dark minister, "is, and ever was, equally at enmity with God."

"Then, perhaps," I ventured again, "what the missionaries preach now is not quite the same as what the missionaries used to preach in St. Paul's time, and so the heathens are not so angry at it?"

My mother looked thunder at me, and so did all except my white-headed friend, who said, gently enough,—

"It may be that the child's words come from God."

Whether they did or not, the child took very good care to speak no more words till he was alone with his mother, and then finished off that disastrous evening by a punishment for the indecency of saying, before his little sister, that he thought it "a great pity the missionaries taught black people to wear ugly coats and trousers, they must have looked so much handsomer running about with nothing on but feathers and strings of shells."

So the missionary dream died out of me, by a foolish and illegal antipathy enough; though, after all, it was a child of my imagination only, not of my heart, and the fancy, having tried it, was able to kill it also. And David became my ideal. To be a shepherd boy, and sit among beautiful mountains, and sing hymns of my own making, and kill lions and bears, with now and then the chance of a stray giant—what a glorious life! And if David slew giants with a sling and a stone, why should not I?—at all events, one ought to know how, so I made a sling out of an old garter and some string, and began to practise in the little back-yard. But my first shot broke a neighbour's window, value sevenpence, and the next flew back in my face, and cut my head open, so I was sent supplicious to bed for a week, till the sevenpence had been duly saved out of my hungry stomach—and, on the whole, I found the hymn-writing side of David's character the more feasible, so I tried, and with much brass-knitting, committed the following lines to a scrap of duty paper. And it was strangely significant, that in this, my first attempt, there was an instinctive denial of the very doctrine of "particular redemption," which I had been hearing all my life, and an instinctive yearning after the very Being in whom I had been told I had "no part nor lot" till I was "converted." Here they are. I am not ashamed to call them,—loggery! though they be,—an inspiration from Him of whom they speak. If not from Him, good readers, from whom?

Jesus, He loves one and all,
Jesus, He loves children small,
Their souls are sitting round His feet,
On high, before His mercy seat.

When on earth He walked in skum,
Children small unto Him came,
At His feet they knelt and prayed,
On their heads His hands He laid.

Came a spirit on them then,
Greater than of mighty men,
A spirit gentle, meek, and mild,
A spirit good for king and child.

Oh! that spirit give to me,
Jesus, Lord, where'er I be!
So—

But I did not finish them, not seeing very clearly what to do with that spirit when I obtained it, for, indeed, it seemed a much finer thing to fight material Apollyons with material swords of iron, like my friend Christian, or to go bear and lion hunting with David, than to convert heathens by meekness—at least, if true meekness was at all like that of the missionary whom I had lately seen.

I showed the verses in secret to my little sister. My mother heard us singing them together, and extorted, grimly enough, a confession of the authorship. I expected to be punished for them (I was accustomed weekly to be punished for all sorts of deeds and words, of the harmfulness of which I had not a notion). It was, therefore, an agreeable surprise when the old minister, the next Sunday evening, patted my head, and praised me for them.

"A hopeful sign of young grace, brother," said he to the dark, tall man. "May we behold here an infant Timothy?"

"Bad doctrine, brother, in that first line—bad doctrine, which I am sure he did not learn from our excellent sister here. Remember, my boy, henceforth, that Jesus loves not love one and all—not that I am angry with you. The carnal mind cannot be expected to understand divine things, any more than the beasts that perish. Nevertheless, the blessed message of the Gospel stands true, that Christ loves none but His Bride, the Church. His merits, my poor child, extend to none but the elect. Ah! my dear sister Locke, how delightful to think of the narrow way of discriminating grace! How it enhances the believer's view of his own exceeding privileges, to remember that there be few that be saved!"

I said nothing. I thought myself only too lucky to escape so well from the danger of having done anything out of my own head. But somehow Susan and I never altered it when we sang it ourselves.

I thought it necessary for the sake of those who might read my story, to string together these few scattered recollections of my boyhood,—to give, as it were, some sample of the cotyledon leaves of my young life-plant, and of the soil in which it took root ere it was transplanted—but I will not forestall my sorrows. After all, they have been but types of the woes of thousands who “die and give no sign.” Those to whom the struggles of every, even the meanest, human being are scenes of an awful drama, every incident of which is to be noted with reverent interest, will not find them void of meaning, while the life which opens in my next chapter is, perhaps, full enough of mere dramatic interest (and whose life is not, were it but truly written?) to amuse merely as a novel. Ay, grim and real is the action and suffering which begins with my next page, as you yourself would have found, high born reader (if such chance to light upon this story), had you found yourself at fifteen, after a youth of convent like seclusion, settled, apparently for life—in a tailor’s workshop.

Ay, laugh! no tailor can quote poetry as well as make your coat dresses.

You sit in a cloud and shew, like pictured angels,
And see the world run smooth while right below
Welters the black fermenting heap of griefs
Whereon your state is built.

CHAPTER II

THE TAILOR’S WORKROOM

HAVE you done laughing? Then I will tell you how the thing came to pass.

My father had a brother, who had steadily risen in life, in proportion as my father fell. They had both begun life in a grocer’s shop. My father saved enough to marry, when of middle age, a woman of his own years, and set up a little shop, where there were but too many such already, in the hope—to him, as to the rest of the world, quite just and innocent—of drawing away as much as possible of his neighbours’ custom. He failed, died—as so many small tradesmen do—of bad debts and a broken heart, and left us beggars. His brother, more prudent, had in the meantime, risen to be foreman; then he married, on the strength of his handsome person, his master’s blooming widow; and rose and rose, year by year, till at the time of which I speak, he was owner of a first-rate grocery establishment in the city, and a pleasant villa near Henric Hill, and had a son, a year or two older than myself, at King’s College, preparing for Oxford and the Church—that being nowadays the approved method of converting a tradesman’s son into a gentleman,—whereof let artisans, and gentlemen also, take note!

My aristocratic readers—if I ever get any, which I pray God I may—may be surprised at so great an inequality of fortune between two cousins, but the thing is common in our class. In the higher ranks, a difference in income implies none in education or manners, and the poor “gentleman” is a fit companion for dukes and princes—thanks to the old usages of Norman chivalry, which after all were a democratic protest against the sovereignty, if not of rank, at least of money. The knight, however penniless, was the prince’s equal, even his superior, from whose hands he must receive knight hood, and the “squire of low degree,” who honourably earned his spurs, rose also into that guild, whose qualifications, however hairbare, were still higher ones than any which the pocket gives. But in the commercial classes money most truly and fearfully “makes the man.” A difference in income, as you go lower, makes more and more difference in the supply of the common necessities of life, and worse in education and manners, in all which polishes the man, till you may see often, as in my case, one cousin an Oxford undergraduate, and the other a tailor’s journeyman.

My uncle one day came down to visit us, resplendent in a black velvet waistcoat, thick gold chain, and acres of shirt front, and I and Susan were turned to feed on our own curiosity and awe in the back yard, while he and my mother were closeted to gether for an hour or so in the living room. When he was gone, my mother called me in, and with eyes which would have been tearful had she allowed herself such a weakness before us, told me very solemnly and slowly, as if to impress upon me the awfulness of the matter, that I was to be sent to a tailor’s workroom the next day.

And an awful step it was in her eyes, as she laid her hands on my head and murmured to herself, “Behold I send you forth as a lamb in the midst of wolves. Be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves.” And then rising hastily to conceal her own emotion I fled upstairs, where we could hear her throw herself on her knees by the bedside, and sob piteously.

That evening was spent dolefully enough, in a sermon of warnings against all manner of sins and temptations, two very names of which I had never heard, but to which, as she informed me, I was by my fallen nature altogether prone, and right enough was she in so saying, though, as often happens, the temptations from which I was in real danger were just the ones of which she had no notion—fighting more or less extinct Satans, as Mr Carlyle says, and quite unconscious of the real, modern, man-devouring Satan close at her elbow.

To me, in spite of all the terror which she tried to awaken in me, the change was not unwelcome, at all events, it promised me food for my eyes and my ears,—some escape from the narrow cage in which, though I hardly dare confess it to myself, I was beginning to pine. Little I dreamt to what a darker cage I was to be translated! Not that I accuse my uncle of neglect or cruelty, though the thing was altogether of his commanding. He was as generous to us as society required him to be. We were entirely dependent on him, as my mother told me then for the first time, for support. And had he not a right to dispose of my person, having bought it by an allowance to my mother of five-and-twenty pounds a year? I did not forget that fact, the thought of my dependence on him rankled in me, till it almost bred hatred in me to a man who had certainly never done or meant anything to me but in kindness. For what could he make me but a tailor—or a shoemaker? A pale, consumptive, rickety, weakly boy, all forehead and no muscle—have not clothes and shoes been from time immemorial the appointed work of such? The fact that that weakly frame is generally compensated by a proportionally increased activity of brain is too unimportant to enter into the calculations of the great King Louis-seize-faire. Well, my dear Society, it is you that suffer for the mistake, after all, more than we. If you do tether your cleverest artisans on tailors' shop-boards and cobblers' benches, and they—as sedentary folk will—fall a thinking, and come to strange conclusions thereby, they really ought to be much more thankful to you than you are to them. If Thomas Cooper had passed his first five and twenty years at the plough tail instead of the shoemaker's awl, many words would have been left unsaid which, once spoken, working men are not likely to forget.

With a beating heart I shambled along by my mother's side the next day to Mr Smith's shop, in a street off Piccadilly, and stood by her side, just within the door, waiting till someone would condescend to speak to us, and wondering when the time would come when I, like the gentleman who skipped up and down the shop, should shine gloriously in patent leather boots, and a blue satin tie spunged with gold.

Two personages, both equally magnificent, stood talking with their backs to us, and my mother, in doubt, like myself, as to which of them was the tailor, at last summoned up courage to address the wrong one, by asking if he were Mr Smith.

The person addressed answered by a most polite smile and bow, and assured her that he had not that honour, while the other—he'd, evidently a little flustered by the mistake, and then uttered in a tremendous voice these words:

"I have nothing for you, my good woman—go Mr Elliot! how did you come to allow these people to get into the establishment?"

"My name is Locke, sir, and I was to bring my son here this morning."

"Oh—ah—Mr Elliot, see to these persons. As I was saying, my lord, the crimson velvet suit, about thirty-five guineas. By-the-bye, that coat ours? I thought so—idea grand and light—masses well broken—very fine chiaroscuro about the whole—an aristocratic wrinkle just above the hips—which I flatter myself no one but myself and my friend Mr Cooke really do understand. The rapid smoothness of the door dummy, my lord, should be confined to the regions of the Strand. Mr Elliot, where are you? Just be so good as to show his lordship that lovely new thing in drab and bleu foncé. Ah! your lordship can't wait—Now, my good woman, is this the young man?"

"Yes," said my mother "and—and—God deal so with you, sir, as you deal with the widow and the orphan."

"Oh—ah—that will depend very much, I should say, on how the widow and the orphan deal with me. Mr. Elliot, take this person into the office and transact the little formalities with her. Jones, take the young man upstairs to the workroom."

I stumbled after Mr Jones up a dark, narrow, iron staircase till we emerged through a trap-door into a garret at the top of the house. I recoiled with disgust at the scene before me, and here I was to work—perhaps through life! A low lean to room, stifling me with the combined odours of human breath and perspiration, stale beer, the sweet sickly smell of gun, and the son and hardly less disgusting one of new cloth. On the floor, thick with dust and dirt, scraps of stuff, and ends of thread, sat some dozen haggard, untidy, shoeless men, with a mingled look of care and recklessness that made me shudder. The windows were tight closed to keep out the cold winter air, and the condensed breath ran in streams down the panes, chequering the dreary outlook of chimney tops and smoke. The conductor handed me over to one of the men.

"Here, Crosswhite, take this younger and make a tailor of him. Keep him next you, and pick him up with your needle if he shirks."

He disappeared down the trap door, and mechanically, as if in a dream, I sat down by the man and listened to his instructions kindly enough bestowed. But I did not remain in peace two minutes. A burst of chatter rose as the foreman vanished, and a tall, bloated, sharp-nosed young man next me bawled in my ear,—

"I say, young'un, fork out the tin and pay your footing at Conscumption Hospital!"

"What do you mean?"

"Ain't he just given?—Down with the stumpy—a tizzy for a pot of half-and-half."

"I never drink beer."

"Then never do," whispered the man at my side, "as sure as hell's hell, it's your only chance."

There was a fierce, deep earnestness in the tone, which made me look up at the speaker, but the other instantly chimed in,—

"Oh, yer don't, don't yer, my young Father Mathy? then yer'll soon learn it here if yer want to keep yer virtuals down"

"And I have promised to take my wages home to my mother"

"Oh, crimony! hark to that, my coves! here's a chap as is going to take the blunt home to his mammy"

"Tain't much of it tho old'un 'll see," said another "Ven yer pockets it at the Cock and Bottle, my kildy, yer won't find much of it left o' Sunday mornings"

"Don't his mother know he's out?" asked another, "and won't she know it—"

Ven he's sitting in his glory
Half price at the Victory

Oh no! 'e never mentions her—her name is never heard! Certainly not, by no means! Why should it?"

"Well, if yer won't stand a pot," quoth the tall man, "I will, that's all, and blow temperance! 'A short life and a merry one," says the tailor—

The midstern talk a great deal about port,
And they make Cape wine very dear,
But blow their his if ever they tries
To deprive a poor cove of his beer

Here, Sam, run to the Cock and Bottle for a pot of half and half to my score"

A thin, pale lad jumped up and vanished, while my tormentor turned to me

"I say, young'un, do you know why we're nearer heaven here than our neighbours?"

"I shouldn't have thought so," answered I, with a natret which raised a laugh, and dashed the tall man for a moment

"Yer don't?" then I'll tell yer! A cause we're atop of the house in the first place, and next place yer'll be here six months sooner nor if yer worked in the room below! Ain't that logic and science, Orator?" appealing to Crossthwaite

"Why?" asked I

"A cause you get all the other floors stinks up here as well as your own! Concentrated essence of man's flesh is this here as you is a breathing! Cellar workroom w calls Rheumatic Ward, because of the damp Ground floor's Fever Ward—them as don't gets typhus gets dysentery, and them as don't get dysentery gets typhus—your nose 'd tell yer why if ybu opened the back windy! First floor's Ashmy Ward—don't you know 'um now through the cracks in the boards, a puffing away like a host of young locomotives! And this here most august and upper crust cockloft is the Conscriptive Hospital. First you begins to cough, then you proceeds to expectorate—spituous, as you see, powdered free gracious for nothing—fined a kivarten if you spits on the floor—

Then your cheeks they grows red, and your nose it grows thin,
And your bones they sticks out, till they comes through the skin

And then, when you've sufficiently covered the poor, dear shivering bare backs of the aristocracy—

Die, die, die,
Away you fly,
Your soul is in the sky!

is the inspired Shakespeare wittily remarks"

And the rihald lay down on his back, stretched himself out, and pretended to die in a fit of coughing, which last was, alas! no counterfeit, while poor I, shocked and bewildered, let my tears fall fast upon my cheeks

"Fine him a pot!" roared one, for talking about kicking the bucket! He's a nroving man to keep a cove's spirits up, and talk about a 'short life and a merry one'! Here comes the heavy! Him it is to take the taste of that fellow's talk out of my mouth!"

"Well, my young'un," recommenced my tormentor, "and how do you like your company?"

"Leave the boy alone," growled Crossthwaite, "don't you see he's crying?"

"Is that anything good to eat? Give me some on it if it is—it'll save me washing my face!" And he took hold of my hair and pulled my head back

"I'll tell you what, Tommy Downer," said Crossthwaite, in a voice which made him draw back, "if you don't drop the t, I'll give you such a taste of my tongue as shall turn you blue!"

"You'd better try it on then! Do—only just now—if you please!"

"Be quiet, you fool!" said another "You're a pretty fellow to chaff the Orator! He'll sling you up the chimney afore you can get your shoes on!"

"Fine him a kivarten for quarrelling," cried another, and the bully subsided into a minute's silence, after a solto voce—"Blow temperance, and blow all Chartists, say I!" and then delivered himself of his feelings in a doggerel song

Some folks leads coves a dance,
With their pledge of temperance
And their plans for donkey salvation,
And their pockets full they crams
By their patriotic flame,
And then swears 'em for the good of the nation.

But I don't care two huns
For political opinions,
While I can stand my heavy and my quartern,
For to drown dull care within,
In bac-y, beer, and gin,
Is the prime of a working-tailor's fortin!

"There's common sense for yer now, hand the pot here!"

I recollect nothing more of that day, except that I bent myself to my work with readily enough to earn praises from Cross thwaite. It was to be done, and I did it. The only virtue I ever possessed (if virtue it be) is the power of absorbing my whole heart and mind in the pursuit of the moment, however dull or trivial, if there be good reason why it should be pursued at all.

I owe, too, an apology to my readers for introducing all this ricksherry. God knows it is as little to my taste as it can be to theirs, but the thing exists, and those who live, if not by, yet still beside such a state of things, ought to know what the men are like to whose labour, or, life blood, they owe their luxuries. They are "their brothers' keepers," let them deny it as they will. Thank God, many are hiding that out, and the morals of the working tailors, as well as of other classes of artisans, are rapidly improving—a change which has been brought about partly by the wisdom and kindness of a few master tailors, who have built work shops fit for human beings, and have resolutely stood out against the iniquitous and destructive alterations in the system of employment. Among them I may, and will, whether they like it or not, make honourable mention of Mr. Willis, of St. James's Street, and Mr. Stultz, of Bond Street.

But nine tenths of the improvement has been owing, not to the masters, but to the men themselves; and who among them, my aristocratic readers, do you think, have been the great preachers and practisers of temperance, thrift, chastity, self respect, and education? Who? shrink not in your Belgravian silences—the Chartists, the communists Chartists, upon whom you and your venal press heap every kind of cowardly excitation and libellous slander. You have found out many things, since Peterloo, add that fact to the number.

It may seem strange that I did not tell my mother into what a pandemonium I had fallen, and get her to deliver me, but a delicacy, which was not all evil, kept me back. I shrank from seeming, to dislike to earn my daily bread, and still more from seeming to object to what she had appointed for me. Her will had been always law, it seemed a devilish sin to dispute it. I took for granted, too, that she knew what the place was like, and that, therefore, it must be right for me. And when I came home at night, and got back to my beloved missionary stories, I gathered materials enough to occupy my thoughts during the next day's work, and make me blind and deaf to all the evil around me. My mother, poor dear creature, would have denounced my day dreams sternly enough, had she known of their existence, but were they not holy angels from heaven, guardians sent by that Father, whom I had been taught not to believe in, to shield my senses from pollution?

I was ashamed, too, to mention to my mother the wickedness which I saw and heard. With the delicacy of an innocent boy, I almost forgot all the very witnessing of it as a sin to myself, and soon I began to be ashamed of more than the mere sitting by and hearing. I found myself gradually learning slang-insolence, laughing at coarse jokes, taking part in angry conversations, my moral tone was gradually becoming lower, but yet the habit of prayer remained, and every night at my bedside, when I prayed to "be converted, and made a child of God," I prayed that the same mercy might be extended to my fellow workmen, "if they belonged to the number of the elect." Those prayers may have been answered in a wider and deeper sense than I then thought of.

But, altogether, I felt myself in a most distracted, rudderless state. My mother's advice I felt duly less and less inclined to ask. A gulf was opening between us, we were moving in two different worlds, and she saw it, and imputed it to me as a sin, and was the more cold to me by day, and painful for me (as I knew afterwards) the more passionately while I slept. But help or teacher I had none. I knew not that I had a Father in heaven. How could He be my Father till I was converted? I was a child of the Devil, they told me, and now and then I felt inclined to take them at their word, and behave like one. No sympathising face looked on me out of the wide heaven—off the wide earth, none. I was all boiling with new hopes, new temptations, new passions, new sorrows, and "I looked to the right hand and to the left, and no man cared for my soul."

I had felt myself from the first strangely drawn towards Crossthwaite, carefully as he seemed to avoid me, except to give me business directions in the workroom. He alone had shown me any kindness, and he, too, alone was untroubled with the sin around him. Silent, moody, and pre-occupied, he was yet the king of the room. His opinion was always asked, and listened to. His eye always covered the rascal and the blasphemer, his songs, when he rarely broke out into merriment, were always rapturously applauded. Men hated, and yet respected him. I shrank from him at first, when I heard him called a Chartist, for my dim notions of that class were, that they were a very wicked set of people who wanted to kill all the soldiers and policemen, and respectable people, and rob all the shops of their contents. But, Chartist or none, Crossthwaite fascinated me. I often found myself neglecting my work to study his face. I liked him, too, because he was as I was—small, pale, and weakly. He might have been five and twenty, but his looks, like those of too many working-men, were rather those of a man of forty. Wild grey eyes gleamed out from under huge knitted brows, and a perpendicular wall of brain, too large for his puny body. He was not only, I soon discovered, a water-drinker, but a strict "vegetarian" also; to which, perhaps, he owed a great deal of the almost preternatural clearness, volubility, and sensitiveness of his mind. But whether from his ascetic habits, or the unhealthiness of his grade, the marks of ill-health were upon him; and his sallow cheek, and ever working lip, proclaimed too surely --

The fiery soul which, working out its way,
Fretted the piny body to decay
And o'er informed the ornament of clay

I longed to open my heart to him. Instinctively I felt that he was a kindred spirit. Often, turning round suddenly in the workroom, I caught him watching me with an expression which seemed to say, "Poor boy, and art thou too one of us? Hast thou too to fight with poverty and guilelessness, and the cravings of an unsatisfied intellect, as I have done?" But when I tried to speak to him earnestly, his manner was peremptory and repellent. It was well for me that so it was -- well for me, I see now, that it was not from him my mind received the first lessons in self-development. For guides did come to me in good time, though not such, perhaps, as either my mother or my readers would have chosen for me.

My great desire now was to get knowledge. By getting that I fancied, as most self-educated men are apt to do, I should surely get wisdom. Books, I thought, would tell me all I needed. But where to get the books? And which? I had exhausted our small stock at home, I was sick and tired, without knowing why, of their narrow conventional view of everything. After all, I had been reading them all along, not for their doctrines but for their facts, and knew not where to find more, except in forbidden paths. I dare not ask my mother for books, for I dare not confess to her that religious ones were just what I did not want, and all history, poetry, science, I had been accustomed to hear spoken of as "carnal learning, human philosophy," more or less diabolic and inimical to the soul. So, as usually happens in this life -- "By the law was the knowledge of sin" -- and unnatural restrictions on the development of the human spirit only associated with guilt of conscience, what ought to have been an innocent and necessary blessing.

My poor mother, not singular in her mistake, had sent me forth, out of an unconscious paradise into the evil world, without allowing me even the god strength which comes from eating of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. She expected in me the innocence of the dove, as if that was possible on such an earth as this, without the wisdom of the serpent to support it. She forbade me strictly to stop and look into the windows of print shops, and I strictly obeyed her. But she forbade me, too, to read any book which I had not first shown her, and that restriction, reasonable enough in the abstract, practically meant, in the case of a poor boy like myself, reading no books at all. And then came my first act of disobedience, the parent of many more. Bitterly have I repented it, and bitterly been punished. Yet, strange contradiction! I dare not wish it undone. But such is the great law of life. Punished for our sins we surely are, and yet how often they become our blessings, teaching us that which nothing else can teach us! Nothing else? One says so. Rich parents, I suppose, say so, when they send their sons to public schools "to learn life." We working men have too often no other teacher than our own errors. But surely, surely, the rich ought to have been able to discover some mode of education in which knowledge may be acquired without the price of conscience. Yet they have not, and we must not complain of them for not giving such a one to the working man when they have not yet even given it to their own children.

In a street through which I used to walk homeward was an old book shop, piled and fringed outside and in with books of every age, size, and colour. And here I at last summoned courage to stop, and timidly and stealthily taking out some volume whose title attracted me, snatch hastily a few pages and hasten on, half-fearful of being called on to purchase, half-ashamed of a desire which I fancied everyone else considered as unlawful as my mother did. Sometimes I was lucky enough to find the same volume several days running, and to take up the subject where I had left it off, and then I continued to hurry through a great deal of "Childe Harold," "Lara," and the "Corsair" -- a new world of wonders to me. They fed, those poems, both my health and my diseases, while they gave me, little of them as I could understand, a thousand new notions about scenery and man, a sense of poetic melody and luxuriance as yet utterly unknown. They clung in with all my discontent, my melancholy, my thirst after my life of action and excitement, however frivolous, insane, or even worse. I forgot the Corsair's sinful trade in his free and daring life, rather, I honestly eliminated the bad element in which, God knows, I took no delight -- and kept the good one. However that might be, the innocent, guilty pleasure grew on me day by day. Innocent because human -- guilty, because disobedient. But have I not paid the penalty?

One evening, however, I fell accidentally on a new book -- "The Life and Poems of J. Keats." I opened the story of his life -- became interested, absorbed -- and there I stood, I know not how long, on the greasy pavement, heedless of the passers who thrust me right and left, reading by the flaring gaslight that sad history of labour, sorrow, and death -- how the Highland cottar, in spite of disease, penny starvation itself, and the daily struggle to earn his bread by digging and ditching, educated himself—how he toiled unceasingly with his hands—how he wrote his poems in secret on duty scraps of paper and old leaves of books—how thus he wore himself out, manful and godly, “bating not a jot of heart or hope,” till the weak flesh would bear no more; and the noble spirit, unrecognised by the lord of the soil, returned to God who gave it. I seemed to see in his history a sad presage of my own. If he, stronger, more self-restrained, more righteous far than ever I could be, had died thus unknown, unassisted, in the stern battle with social disadvantages, what must be my lot?

And tears of sympathy, rather than of selfish fear, fell fast upon the book.

A harsh voice from the inner darkness of the shop startled me.

“Hoot, laddie, ye’ll better no spoil my books wi’ greeting ower them!”

I replaced the book hastily, and was hurrying on, but the same voice called me back in a more kindly tone.

“Stop a wee, my laddie. I’m no angered wi’ ye. Come in, and we’ll just ha’ a bit crack thegither.”

I went in, for there was a gentility in the tone to which I was unaccustomed, and something whispered to me the hope of an adventure, as indeed it proved to be, if an event deserves that name which decided the course of my whole destiny.

“What war ye greeking about, then? What was the book?”

“Bethune’s Life and Poems, sir,” I said. “And certainly they did affect me very much.”

“Affect ye? Ah, Johnnie Bethune, puir fellow! Ye maunna take on about sic like laddies, or ye’ll greet your o’en out o’ your head. It’s mony a braw man beside Johnnie Bethune has gane Johnnie Bethune’s gate.”

Though unaccustomed to the Scotch accent, I could make out enough of this speech to be in nowise consoled by it. But the old man turned the conversation by asking me abruptly my name, and trade, and family.

“Hum, hum, widow, eh? ‘Pun body! work at Smith’s shop, eh? Ye’ll ken John Crossthwaite, thon’ ay? hum, hum, an’ ye’re desirous o’ reading books, vara weel—let’s see your capabilities.”

And he pulled me into the dim light of the little back window, shoved back his spectacles, and peering at me from underneath them, began, to my great astonishment, to feel my head all over.

“Hum, hum, a vara gude forehead—vara gude indeed. Cansative organs large, perceptive ditto. Imagination superabundant—mun be heeled. Renevolence, conscientiousness, ditto, ditto. Caution—no—that large—might be developed” with a quiet chuckle, “under a gude Scot’s education. Just turn your head into profile, laddie. Hum, hum. Back o’ the head a’thegither defective. Firmness sma’—love of approbation uncobis. Beware o’ leeing, as ye live, ye’ll need it. Philoprogenitiveness gude. Ye’ll be fond o’ harms, I’m guessing.”

“Of what?”

“Children, laddie,—children.”

“Very,” answered I, in utter dismay, “at what seemed to me a magical process for getting at all my secret failings.”

“Hum, hum! Amative and combative organs sma’—a general want o’ healthy animalism, as my friend Mr. Deville wad say. And ye want to read books?”

I confessed my deane, without, alas! confessing that my mother had forbidden it.

“Vara weel, thon books I’ll lend ye, after I’ve had a crack wi’ Crossthwaite about ye, gin I find his opinion o’ ye satisfactory. Come to me tho day after tomorrow. An’ mind, here are my rules—a’ damage done to a book to be paid for, or na mair books lent, ye’ll mind to take no books without leave, specially ye’ll mind no to read in bed o’ nights,—industrious folks ought to be sleepin’ betwene, an’ I’ll no be a party to burning pun weans in their beds, and lastly, ye’ll observe not to read mair than five books at once.”

I assured him that I thought such a thing impossible, but he smiled in his saturnine way, and said,—

“We’ll see this day fortnight. Now, thou I’ve observed ye for a month past over that aristocrat Byron’s poems. An’ I’m willing to teach the young idea how to shoot—but no to shoot itself, so ye’ll just leave alone that vinegary, soul-destroying trash, and I’ll lend ye, gin I hear a gude report o’ ye, ‘The Paradise Lost,’ o’ John Milton—a gran’ classic model, and for the doctrine o’ it, it’s just about as gude as ye’ll hear elsewhere the noo. So gang your gite, and tell John Crossthwaite, privately, and Sandy Mackaye wad like to see him the mornin’ night.”

I went home in wonder and delight. Books! books! books! I should have my fill of them at last. And when I said my prayers at night, I thanked God for this unexpected boon, and then remembered that my mother had forbidden it. That thought checked the thanks, but not the pleasure. Oh, parents! are there not real sins enough in the world already, without your defiling it, over and above, by inventing new ones?

CHAPTER III

SANDY MACKAYE.

THAT day fortnight came,—and the old Scotchman’s words came true. Four books of his I had already, and I came in to borrow a fifth, whereon he began with a solemn chuckle.

“Eh, laddie, laddie, I’ve been treating ye as the grocers do their new ‘prentices. They first gie the boys three days' free warren among the figs and the sugar-candy, and they get scunnered wi' sweets after that. Noo, then, my lal, ye've just been reading four books in three days—and here's a fifth. Ye'll no open this again."

"Oh!" I cried, piteously enough, "just let me finish what I am reading. I'm in the middle of such a wonderful account of the Hornets of Jorilla."

"Hornets or wasps, a swarm of them ye're like to have at this rate, and a verry brail substitute ye'll find them for the Attie hee. Now tak' tent. I'm no in the habit of speakin' without deliberation, for it saves a man a great deal of trouble in changing his mind. If ye canna traduce to me a page o' Virgil by this day three months, ye read no more o' my books. Deontory reading is the bane o' lals. Ye mair begin with self-restaurant and method, my man, gin ye intend to gie yonself a liberal education. So I'll just mak' yon a present of an auld Latin grammar, and ye mair begin where your betters ha' begun before you."

"But who will teach me Latin?"

"Hoot! man! whell teach a man anything except himself?" It's only gentk folks and pun aristocratic bodies that go to be spoilt wi' tutors and pedagogues, crammin' and loadin' them wi' knowledge, as ye'd load a gun, to shoot it all out again, just as it went down, in a college examination, and faigot all about it after."

"Ah!" I sighed, "if I could have gone to college!"

"What for, then? My father was a Highland farmer, and yet he was a weel learned man, and 'Sandy, my lad,' he used to say, 'a man kens just as much as he's taught himself, and na mair. So get wisdom, and wi' all your gettin', get understanding.' And so I did. And mony's the Greek exercise I've written in the cowbyres. And mony's the page o' Virgil, too, I've turned into good Dawrie Scotch to see that's dead and gane, pun hizzie, sitting under the same plaid, with the sheep feeding round us, up among the hills, looking out ower the broad blue sea, and the wee haven wi' the fishing cobbles—"

There was a long solemn pause. I cannot tell why, but I loved the man from that moment, and I thought, too, that he began to love me. "Those few words seemed a proof of confidence, perhaps all the deeper, because accidental and unconscious."

I took the Virgil which he lent me, with Hamilton's literal translation between the lines, and an old tattered Latin grammar; I felt myself quite a learned man—actually the possessor of a Latin book! I regarded as something almost miraculous the opening of this new field for my ambition. Not that I was consciously, much less selfishly, ambitious. I had no idea as yet to be anything but a tailor to the end, to make clothes—perhaps in a less infernal atmosphere—but still to make clothes, and live thereby. I did not suspect that I possessed powers above the mass. My intense longing after knowledge had been to me like a girl's first love—a thing to be concealed from every eye—to be looked at askance, even by myself, delicious as it was, with holy shame and trembling. And thus it was not cowardice merely, but natural modesty, which put me on a limited plan of concealing my studies from my mother, and even from my sister.

I slept in a little lean-to garret at the back of the house, some ten feet long by six wide. I could just stand upright against the inner wall, while the roof on the other side ran down to the floor. There was no fireplace in it, or any means of ventilation. No wonder I coughed all night accordingly, and woke about two every morning with choking throat and aching head. My mother often said that the room was "too small for a Christian to sleep in, but where could she get a better?"

Such was my only study. I could not use it as such, however, at night, without discovery, for my mother carefully looked in every evening, to see that my candle was out. But when my kind cough woke me, I rose, and creeping like a mouse about the room to my mother and sister slept in the next chamber, and every sound was audible through the narrow partition—I drew my darling books out from under a board of the floor, one end of which I had gradually loosened at odd minutes, and with them a rushlight, earned by running on messages, or by taking bits of work home, and finishing them for my fellows.

No wonder that with this scanty rest, and this complicated exertion of hands, eyes, and brain, followed by the long dreary day's work of the shop, my health began to fail; my eyes grew weaker and weaker, my cough became more acute; my appetite failed me daily. My mother noticed the change, and questioned me about it, affectionately enough. But I durst not, alas! tell the truth. It was not one offence, but the arrears of months of disobedience which I should have had to confess; and so arose infinite false excuses, and potty prevarications, which embittered and clogged still more my already overtaken spirit. About my own ailments—formidable as I believe they were—I never had a moment's anxiety. The expectation of early death was as unnatural to me as it is, I suspect, to almost all. Had I not hopes, plans, desires, infinite? Could I die while they were unfulfilled? Even now, I do not believe I shall die yet. I will not believe it—but let that pass.

Yes, let that pass. Perhaps I have lived long enough—longer than many a grey-headed man.

There is a race of mortals who become Old in their youth, and die ere middle age.

And might not those days of mine then have counted as months?—those days when, before starting forth to walk two miles to the shop at six o'clock in the morning, I sat some three or four hours shivering on my bed, putting myself into cramped and painful postures, not daring even to cough, lest my mother should fancy me unwell, and come in to see me, poor dear soul!—my eyes aching over the page, my feet wrapped up in the bedclothes, to keep them from the miserable pain of the cold, longing, watching, dawn after dawn, for the kind summer mornings, when I should need no candle light, look at the picture awhile, ye comfortable folks, who take down from your shelves what looks you like best at the moment, and then lie back, amid prints and statuettes, to grow wise in an easy chair, with a blazing fire and a camphire lamp. 'The lower classes uneducated!' Perhaps you would be so too, if learning cost you the privation which it costs some of them.

But this concealment could not last. My only wonder is, that I continued to get whole months of undiscovered study. One morning, about four o'clock, as might have been expected, my mother heard me stirring, came in, and found me sitting cross legged on my bed, stitching away, indeed, with all my might, but with a Virgil open before me.

She glanced at the book, clutched it with one hand and my arm with the other, and sternly asked,—

"Where did you get this heathen stuff?"

A lie rose to my lips, but I had been so gradually entangled in the bathed meshes of a system of concealment, and consequent prevarication, that I felt as if one direct falsehood would run forever my fast failing self-respect, and I told her the whole truth. She took the book and left the room. It was Saturday morning, and I spent two miserable days, for she never spoke a word to me till the two ministers had made their appearance, and drank their tea on Sunday evening, then at last she opened—

"And now, Mr Wigginton, what account have you of this Mr Mackaye, who has seduced my unhappy boy from the paths of obedience?"

"I am sorry to say, madam," answered the dark man, with a solemn snuffle, "that he proves to be a most objectionable and altogether unregenerate character. He is, as I am informed, neither more nor less than a Chartist and an open blasphemer."

"He is not!" I interrupted, angrily. "He has told me more about God, and given me better advice, than any human being, except my mother."

"Ah! madam, so thinks the unconverted heart, ignorant that the god of the Deist is not the God of the Bible—a consuming fire to all but His beloved elect; the god of the Deist, unhappy youth, is a mere self-invented, all-indulgent phantom—a will o' the wisp, deluding the unwary, as he has deluded you, into the slough of carnal reason and shameful profligacy."

"Do you mean to call me a profligate?" I retorted fiercely, for my blood was up, and I felt I was fighting for all which I prized in the world. "If you do, you lie. Ask my mother when I ever disobeyed her before. I have never touched a drop of anything stronger than water, I have slaved over hours to pay for my own candle, I have—I have no sins to accuse myself of, and neither you nor any other person know of any. Do you call me a profligate because I wish to educate myself and rise in life?"

"Ah!" growled my poor mother to herself, "still more in need of sin!"

"The old Adam, my dear madam, you see—standing as he always does, on his own filthy rags of works, while all the imaginations of his heart are only evil so continually. Listen to me, poor sinner—"

"I will not listen to you," I cried, the accumulated disgust of years bursting out once and for all, "for I hate and despise you, eating my poor mother here out of house and home. You are one of those who creep into widow's houses, and for pretence make long prayers. You, sir, I will hear," I went on, turning to the dear old man who sat by, shaking his white locks, with a sad and puzzled air, "for I love you."

"My dear sister Locke," he began, "I really think sometimes—that is, Alton—with your leave, brother—I am almost disposed—but I wish to defer to your superior zeal—yet, at the same time, perhaps, the desire for information, however carnal in itself, may be an instrument in the Lord's hands—you know what I mean. I always thought him a gracious youth, madam, didn't you? And perhaps—I only observe it in passing; the Lord's people among the dissenting connections are apt to undervalue human learning as a means of course I mean only as a means. It is not generally known, I believe, that our revered Puritan patriarchs, Howe and Baxter, Owen and many more, were not altogether unacquainted with heathen authors, nay, that they may have been called absolutely learned men. And some of our leading ministers are inclined—no doubt they will be led rightly in so important a matter—to follow the example of the Independents in educating their young ministers, and turning Satan's weapons of heathen mythology against himself, as St. Paul is said to have done. My dear boy, what books have you now got by you of Mr Mackaye's?"

"Milton's Poems and a Latin Virgil."

"Ah!" growled the dark man, "will poetry, will Latin save an immortal soul?"

"I'll tell you what, sir, you say yourself that it depends on God's absolute counsel whether I am saved or not. So, if I am elect, I shall be saved whatever I do; and if I am not, I shall be damned whatever I do; and in the meantime you had better mind your own business, and let me do the best I can for this life, as the next is all settled for me."

This flippant, but after all not unreasonable speech, seemed to silence the man, and I took the opportunity of running upstairs and hanging down my Milton. The old man was speaking as I re-entered.

"And you know, my dear madam, Mr Milton was a true converted man and a Puritan."

He was Oliver Cromwell's secretary," I asked.

"Did he teach you to disobey your mother?" asked my mother.

I did not answer, and the old man, after turning over a few leaves, as if he knew the book well, looked up.

"I think, madam, you ought let the youth keep these books, if he will promise, as I am sure he will, to see no more of Mr Mackaye."

I was ready to burst out crying, but I made up my mind and answered,—

"I must see him once again, or he will think me so ungrateful. He is the best friend that I ever had, except you, mother. Besides, I do not know if he will lend me any, after this."

My mother looked at the old minister, and then gave a sullen assent. "Promise me only to see him once - but I cannot trust you. You have deceived me once, Alton, and you may again."

"I shall not, I shall not," I answered proudly. "You do not know me"—and I spoke true.

"You do not know yourself, my poor dear, foolish child!" she replied—and that was true too.

"And now dear friends," said the dark man, "let us join in offering up a few words of special intercession."

We all knelt down, and I soon discovered that by the special intercession was meant a string of bitter and groundless slanders against poor me, twisted into the form of a prayer for my conversion, "if it were God's will." To which I responded with a closing "Amen," for which I was sorry afterwards, when I recollected that it was said in merely insolent mockery. But the little faith I had was breaking up fast - not altogether, surely, by my own fault.

1 The portraits of the minister and the missionary are surely exceptions to their class, rather than the average. The Baptists have had their Andrew Fuller and Robert Hall, and among miscellaneous Dr Carey, and noble spirits in plenty. But such men as those who excited Alton Locke's disgust are to be met with in every sect, in the Church of England, and in the Church of Rome. And it is a real and fearful scandal to the young, to see such men listened to as God's messengers, in spite of their utter want of any manhood or virtue, simply because they are "orthodox," each according to the shibboleths of his hearers, and possess that vulpine "discretion of divines," whose miraculous might Dean Swift sets forth in his "Essay on the

At all events, from that day I was emancipated from modern Puritanism. The ministers both avoided all serious conversation with me, and my mother did the same, while with a strength of mind, rare among women, she never alluded to the scene of that Sunday evening. It was a rule with her never to return to what was once done and settled. What was to be might be prayed over. But it was to be endured in silence, yet wider and wider ever from that time opened the gulf between us.

I went trembling the next afternoon to Mackaye and told my story. He first scolded me severely for disobeying my mother. "If that begins o' that gate, laddie, ends by disobeying God and his own conscience. Gin ye're to be a scholar, God will make you one - and if not, ye'll no mak' yourself one in spite o' Him and His commandments." And then he filled his pipe and chuckled away in silence, at last, he exploded in a horse laugh.

"So ye gied the ministers a bit o' yer mind? 'The deil's among the tailors' in gude earnest, as the sang says. There's Johnnie Crossthwaite - kicked the Papist priest out o' his house yesticeen, pur in ministers, it's ill times wi' them! They gang about keekling and screeching after the working men, like a hen that's hat'ed ducklings, when she sees them tak' the water. Little Dunkeld's coming to London sune, I'm thinking."

Hich' an' a parish, a parish, a parish,
Hich' an' a parish as little Dunkeld,
They hac' strik't the minister, hanged the parson,
Dung down the steeple, and drucken the bell.

"But may I keep the books a little while, Mr Mackaye?"

"Keep them till ye die, gin ye will. What is the worth o' them to me? What is the worth o' anything to me, pur an' deevil, that ha' no half-a-dizen years to live, it the furthest God bless ye, my bairn, gang hame, and mind your mother, or it's little gude books'll do ye."

CHAPTER IV

TAILORS AND SOLDIERS.

I WAS now thrown again utterly on my own resources. I read and re-read Milton's "Poems" and Virgil's "Æneid" for six more months at every spare moment, thus spending over them, I suppose, all in all, far more time than most gentlemen have done. I found, too, in the last volume of Milton a few of his select prose works - the "Areopagitica," the "Defence of the English People,"

"Fates of Clergymen." Such men do exist, and prosper, and as long as they are allowed to do so Alton Locke will meet them, and be scandalised by them. - F.

and one or two more, in which I gradually began to take an interest, and, little of them as I could comprehend, I was awed by their tremendous depth and power, as well as excited by the utterly new trains of thought into which they led me. Terrible was the amount of bodily fatigue which I had to undergo in reading at every spare moment, while walking to and fro from my work, while sitting up, often from midnight till dawn, stitching away to pay for the tallow candle which I burnt, till I had to resort to all sorts of uncomfortable contrivances for keeping myself awake, even at the expense of bodily pain—Heaven forbid that I should weary my readers by describing them! Young men of the upper classes, to whom study pursues it as intensely as you will—is but the business of the day, and every spare moment relaxation; little you guess the frightful drudgery undergone by a man of the people who has vowed to educate himself,—to live at once two lives, each as severe as the whole of yours,—to bring to the self-imposed toil of intellectual improvement, a body and brain already worn out by a day of tedious manual labour. I did it. God forbid, though, that I should take credit to myself for it. Hundreds more have done it, with still fewer advantages than mine. Hundreds more, an ever increasing army of martyrs, are doing it at this moment of some of them, too, perhaps you may hear hereafter.

I had read through Milton, as I said, again and again, I had got out of him all that my youth and my unregulated mind enabled me to get. I had devoured, too, not without profit, a large old edition of "Foxe's Martyrs," which the venerable minister lent me, and now I was hungering again for fresh food, and again at a loss where to find it.

I was hungering, too, for more than information—for a friend. Since my intercourse with Sandy Mackaye had been stopped, six months had passed without my once opening my lips to any human being upon the subjects with which my mind was haunted day and night. I wanted to know more about poetry, history, politics, philosophy—all things in heaven and earth. But, above all, I wanted a faithful and sympathising ear into which to pour all my doubts, discontents, and aspirations. My sister Susan, who was one year younger than myself, was growing into a slender, pretty, hectic girl of sixteen. But she was altogether a devout Puritan. She had just gone through the process of conviction of sin and conversion; and being looked upon at the chapel as an especially gracious professor, was either unable or unwilling to think or speak on any subject, except on those to which I felt a growing distaste. She had shrunk from me, too, very much, since my forcible attack that Sunday evening on the dark minister, who was her special favourite. I remarked it, and it was a fresh cause of unhappiness and perplexity.

At last I made up my mind, come what would, to force myself upon Crossthwaite. He was the only man whom I knew who seemed able to help me, and his very reserve had invested him with a mystery, which served to heighten my imagination of his powers. I waylaid him one day coming out of the workroom to go home, and plunged at once desperately into the matter.

"Mr. Crossthwaite, I want to speak to you. I want to ask you to advise me."

"I have known that a long time."

"Then why did you never say a kind word to me?"

"Because I was waiting to see whether you were worth saying a kind word to. It was but the other day, remember, you were a bit of a boy. Now, I think, I may trust you with a thing or two. Besides, I wanted to see whether you trusted me enough to ask me. Now you've broke the ice at last, in with you, head and ears, and see what you can fish out."

"I am very unhappy—"

"That's no new disorder that I know of."

"No, but I think the reason I am unhappy is a strange one, at least, I never read of but one person else in the same way. I want to educate myself, and I can't."

"You must have real precious little, then, if you think yourself in a strange way. Bless the boy's heart! And what the dickens do you want to be educating yourself for, pray?"

This was said in a tone of good-humoured banter, which gave me courage. He offered to walk homewards with me, and, as I shambled along by his side, I told him all my story and all my griefs.

I never shall forget that walk. Every house, tree, turning, which we passed that day on our way, is indissolubly connected in my mind with some strange new thought which arose in me just at each spot, and recurred, so are the mind and the senses connected, as surely as I repress it.

I had been telling him about Sandy Mackaye. He confessed to an acquaintance with him, but in a reserved and mysterious way, which only heightened my curiosity.

We were going through the Horse Guards, and I could not help lingering to look with wistful admiration on the huge monstachioed war machines who sauntered about the courtyard.

A tall and handsome officer, blazing in scarlet and gold, cantered in on a superb horse, and, dismounting, threw the reins to a dragoon as grand and gandy as himself. Did I envy him? Well—I was but seventeen. And there is something noble to the mind, as well as to the eye, in the great, strong man, who can fight—a completeness, a self-restraint, a terrible sleeping power in him. As Mr. Carlyle says, "A soldier, after all, is one of the few remaining realities of the age. All other professions almost promise one thing, and perform—alas! what?"

But this man promises to fight, and does it; and, if he be told, will veritably take out a long sword and kill me."

So thought my companion, though the mood in which he viewed the fact was somewhat different from my own.

"Come on," he said poovishly, clenching me by the arm, "what do you want dawdling? Are you a nursery-maid, that you must stare at those red-coated butchers?" And a deep curse followed.

"What harm have they done you?"

"I should think I owed them turn enough."

"What?"

"They cut my father down at Sheffield,—perhaps with the very swords he helped to make,—because he would not sit still and stare, and see us starving round him, while those who fattened on the sweat of his brow, and on those lungs of his, which the sword-grinding dust was eating out day by day, were wantoning on venison and champagne. That's the harm they've done me, my chap!"

"Poor fellows!—they only did as they were ordered, I suppose."

"And what business have they to let the machines be ordered? What right, I say—what right has any free, reasonable soul on earth, to sell himself for a shilling a day to murder any man, right or wrong—even his own brother or his own father—just because such a whiskered, profligate jackanapes as that officer, without learning, without any god except his own looking-glass and his opera-dancer—a fellow who, just because he is born a gentleman, is set to command grey-headed men before he can command his own meanest passions. Good heavens! that the lives of free men should be estimated to such a stuffed cockatoo; and that free men should be such traitors to their country, traitors to their own flesh and blood, as to sell themselves, for a shilling a day and the smirks of the nursery-maids, to do that fellow's bidding!"

"What are you a-grumbling about here, my man?—gotten the cholera?" asked one of the dragoons, a huge, stupid-looking lad.

"About you, you young long-legged cut-throat," answered Crossthwaite, "and all you crew of traitors."

"Help, help, comrades o' mine!" quoth the dragoon, bursting with laughter, "I'm gaun to be noothered wi' a little booy that's gone mad, and torned Chartist."

I dragged Crossthwaite off, for what was just to the soldiers, I saw, by his face, was fierce enough earnest to him. We walked on a little, in silence.

"Now," I said, "that was a good-natured fellow enough, though he was a soldier. You and he might have cracked many a joke together, if you did but understand each other,—and he was a country-man of yours, too."

"I may crack something else besides jokes with him some day," answered he, moodily.

"Then my word, you must take care how you do it. He is as big as four of us."

"That vile aristocrat, the old Italian poet—what's his name?—Ariosto—ay!—he know which quarter the wind was making for, when he said that firearms would be the end of all your old knights and gentlemen in armor, that hewed down unarmed innocents as if they had been sheep. Gunpowder is your true leveller—lash physical strength! A boy's a man with a musket in his hand, my chap!"

"God forbid," I said, "that I should ever be made a man of in that way, or you either. I do not think we are quite big enough to make fighters, and if we were, what have we got to fight about?"

"Big enough to make fighters?" said he, half to himself, "or strong enough, perhaps?"—or clever enough?—and yet Alexander was a little man, and the Petit Caporal, and Nelson, and Caesar, too, and so was Saul of Tarsus, and weakly he was into the bargain. Napoleon was a dwarf and so was Attila, Shakespeare was lame, Alfred, a rickety weakling, Byron, clubfooted,—so much of body occur spirit brutes force versus genius—genius!"

I looked at him, his eyes glared like two balls of fire. Suddenly he turned to me.

"Locke, my boy, I've made an ass of myself, and got into a rage, and broken a good old resolution of mine, and a promise that I made to my dear little woman—bless her!—and said things to you that you ought to know nothing of for this long time, but those red-coats always put me beside myself. God forgive me!" And he held out his hand to me cordially.

"I can quite understand your feeling deeply on one point," I said, as I took it, "after the sad story you told me,—but why so bitter on all? What is there so very wrong about things, that we must begin fighting about it?"

"Bless your heart, poor innocent! What is wrong?—what is not wrong? Wasn't there enough in that talk with Mackaye, that you told me of just now, to show anybody that, who can tell a hawk from a handsaw?"

"Was it wrong in him to give himself such trouble about the education of a poor young fellow, who has no tie on him, who can never repay him?"

"No, that's just like him. He feels for the people, for he has been one of us. He worked in a printing office himself many a year, and he knows the heart of the working man. But he didn't tell you the whole truth about education. He daren't tell you. No one who has money dare speak out his heart,—not that he has much certainly, but, the cunning old Scot that he is, he lives by the present system of things, and he won't speak ill of the bridge which carries him over—till the time comes."

I could not understand whither all this ended, and walked on, silent and somewhat angry, at least in the least slight cast on Mackaye.

"Don't you see, stupid?" he broke out at last. "What did he say to you about gentlemen being crummed by tutors and professors? Have not you as good a right to them as any gentleman?"

"But he told me they were no use—that every man must educate himself."

"Oh! all very fine to tell you the grapes are sour, when you can't reach them. Bah."

"Can't you see what comes of education?" he thought, provided he be a gentleman, can be doctored up at school and college, enough to make him play his part decently—his mighty part of ruling us, and riding over our heads, and picking our pockets, as parson, doctor, lawyer, and member of Parliament—whereas you, now, for instance, cleverer than ninety-nine gentlemen out of a hundred, if you had one-tenth the trouble taken with you that is taken with every pig-headed son of an aristocrat—"

"Am I clever?" asked I, in honest surprise.

"What! haven't you found that out yet? Don't try to put that on me. Don't a girl know when she's pretty, without asking her neighbours?"

"Really, I never thought about it."

"More simple than you. Old Mackaye has, at all events, though, canny Scotchman that he is, he'll never say a word to you about it, yet he makes no secret of it to other people. I heard him the other day telling some of our friends that you were a thorough young

"I blushed slightly, between pleasure and a new feeling, was it ambition?"

"Why, have not you a right to aspire to a college education as any do nothing there at the abbey, lad?"

"I don't know that I have a right to anything."

"What, not become what Nature intended you to become? What has she given you brains for, but to be educated and used? Oh! I heard a fine lecture upon that at our club the other night. There was a man there a gentleman, too, but a thorough-going people's man, I can tell you, Mr. O'Flynn. What an orator that man is, to be sure! The Irish Exchanges, I hear they call him in Consultation Hall. Isn't he the man to pitch into the Manningtons? 'Gentlemen and ladies,' says he, 'how long will a diabolic society—no, an offshoot society it was—how long will an effete, emasculate, and effeminate society, in the diabolic selfishness of its eclecticism, refuse to acknowledge what my immortal countryman, Burke, calls the "Dei voluntatem in rebus revoltantem"—the revelation of Nature's will in the phenomena of matter? the cerebration of each in the prophetic sacrament of the yet undeveloped possibilities of his mentation? The form of the brain alone, and not the possession of the vile goods of wealth and rank, constitute man's only right to education—to the glories of art and science. Those beaming eyes and roscate lips beneath me proclaim a heavy of undeveloped Aspasias, of embryo Cleopatra, destined by Nature, and only restrained by man's injustice, from ruling the world by their beauty's eloquence. Those massive and beetling brows, gleaming with the lamplike flames of patriotic wisdom what is needed to unfold them into a race of Shrike sparrows and of Gracchi, ready to proclaim with sword and lyre the divine harmonies of liberty, equality, and fraternity, before quaking universe?"

"It sounds very grand," replied I, meekly, "and I should like very much certainly to have a good education. But I can't see whose injustice keeps me out of one if I can't afford to pay for it."

"Whose? Why, the parsons, to be sure. They've got the monopoly of education in England, and they get their bread by it at their public schools and universities, and of course it's their interest to keep up the price of their commodity, and let no man have a taste of it who can't pay down handsomely. And so those aristocrats of college dons go on rolling in riches, and fellowships and scholarships, that were bequeathed by the people's friends in old times, just to educate poor scholars like you and me, and give us our rights as freemen."

"But I thought the clergy were doing so much to educate the poor. At least, I hear all the dissenting ministers grumbling at their continual interference."

"Ay, educating them to make them slaves and bigots. They don't teach them what they teach their own sons. Look at the miserable smattering of general information—just enough to serve as sauce for their gut first and last lesson of 'Obey the powers that be' whatever they be, leave us alone in our comforts, and stave patiently, do, like good boys, for it's God's will. And then, if a boy does show talent in school, do they help him up in life? Not they, when he has just learnt enough to what his appetite for more, they turn him adrift again, to sink and chudge—to do his duty, as they call it, in that state of life to which society and the devil have called him."

"But there are innumerable stories of great Englishmen who have risen from the lowest ranks."

"Ay, but where are the stories of those who have not risen—of all the noble geniuses who have ended in desperation, drunkenness, starvation, suicide, because no one would take the trouble of lifting them up, and enabling them to walk in the path which Nature had marked out for them? Dead men tell no tales, and this old whitened sepulchre, society, ain't going to turn informer against itself."

"I trust and hope," I said, sully, "that if God intends me to rise, He will open the way for me, perhaps the very struggles and sorrows more than ever wealth and prosperity could."

"True, Alton, my boy! and that's my only comfort. It does make much of us, this bitter battle of life. We working men, when we do come out of the furnace, come out, not tinsel and papier maché, like those fops of red-tape statesmen, but steel and granite, Alton, my boy! that has been seven times tried in the fire, and woo to the papier maché gentleman that runs against us! But," he went on sadly, "for one who comes safe through the furnace, there are a hundred who crack in the burning. You are a young bear, my lad, with all your sorrows before you, and you'll find that a working man's training is like the Red Indian children's. The few who are strong enough to stand it grow up warriors, but all those who are not fire and water proof by nature—just die, Alton, my lad, and the tribe thinks itself well rid of them."

So that conversation ended. But it had implanted in my bosom a new seed of mingled good and evil, which was destined to bear fruit, precious perhaps as well as bitter. God knows it has hung on the tree long enough. Sour and harsh from the first, it has been many a year in ripening. But the sweetness of the apple, the potency of the grape, as the chemists tell us, are born out of acidity—a developed sourness. Will it be so with my thoughts? Dare I assert, as I sit writing here, with the wild waters slipping past the cabin windows, backwards and backwards ever, every plunge of the vessel one forward leap from the old world—worn-out world I had almost called it, of sham civilisation and real paucity—dare I hope ever to return and triumph? Shall I, after all, lay my bones among my own people, and hear the voices of freemen whisper in my dying ears?

Silence, dreaming heart! Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof, and the good thereof also. Would that I had known that before! Above all, that I had known it on that night, when first the burning thought arose in my heart, that I was unjustly used; that society had not given me my rights. It came to me as a revelation, celestial-infernal, full of glorious hopes of the possible future in store for me through the perfect development of all my faculties, and full, too, of fierce present rage, wounded vanity, bitter grudgings against those more favoured than myself, which grew in time almost to cursing against the God who had made me a poor untutored working-man, and seemed to have given me genius only to keep me in a Tantalus' hell of unsatisfied thirst.

Ay, respectable gentlemen and ladies, I will confess all to you—you shall have, if you enjoy it, a fresh opportunity for indulging that supreme pleasure which the press lately affords you of insulting the classes whose powers must of you know as little as you do their sufferings. Yes, the Chartist poet is vain, conceited, ambitious, uneducated, shallow, inexperienced, envious, ferocious, scurrilous, seditious, traitorous—Is your charitable vocabulary exhausted? Then ask yourselves, how often have you yourself honestly resisted and conquered the temptation to any one of these sins, when it has come across you just once in a way, and not as they came to me, as they come to thousands of the working-men, daily and hourly, till their tortments do, by length of time, become their elements? What, are we virtuous, too? Yes! And if those who have, like you, still care more, what wonder if those who have nothing, care of something? Prodigate too? Well, though that imputation as a generality is utterly calumnious, though your amount of respectable annual enjoyment per annum is a hundred times as great as that of the most self-indulgent artisan, yet, if you had ever felt what it is to want, not only every luxury of the senses, but even bread to eat, you would think more mercifully of the man who makes up by rare excesses, and those only of the limited kinds possible to him, for long intervals of dull privation, and says in his madness, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die!" We have our sins, and you have yours. Ours may be the more gross and barbaric, but yours are none the less damnable, perhaps all the more so, for being the sleek, subtle, respectable, religious sins they are. You are frantic enough if our part of the press calls you hard names, but you cannot see that your part of the press repays it back to us with interest. We see those insults, and feel them bitterly enough, and do not forget them, alas! soon enough, while they pass unheeded by your delicate eyes as trivial truisms. Horrible, unprincipled, villainous, seditious, frantic, blasphemous, are epithets, of course, when applied to—to how large a portion of the English people, you will some day discover to your astonishment. When will that day come, and how? In thunder, and storm, and garments rolled in blood? Or like the dew on the mown grass, and the clear shining of the sunlight after April rain?

Yes, it was true. Society had not given me my rights. And woe unto the man on whom that idea, true or false, rises lurid, filling all his thoughts with sallow glare, as of the pit itself. Be it true, be it false, it is equally a woe to believe it, to have to live on a negation, to have to worship for our only idea, as hundreds of thousands of us have this day, the hatred of the things which are Ay, though one of us here and there may die in faith, in sight of the promised land, yet is it not hard, when looking from the top of Pisgah into "the good time coming," to watch the years slipping away one by one, and death crawling nearer and nearer, and the people wearying themselves in the fire for very vanity, and Jordan not yet passed, the promised land not yet entered, while our little children die around us, like lambs beneath the knife, of cholera, and typhus, and consumption, and all the diseases which the good time can and will prevent, which, as science has proved, and you the rich confess, might be prevented at once, if you dared to bring in one bold and comprehensive measure, and not sacrifice yearly the lives of thousands to the idol of vested interests and a majority in the House. Is it not hard to men who smelt beneath such things to help crying aloud—"Then cursed Molech-Mammon, take my life if thou wilt; let me die in the wilderness, for I have deserved it, but these little ones in mines and factories, in typhus-cellers, and Tooting pandemoniums, what have they done?" If not in their fathers' cause, yet still in theirs, were it so great a sin to die upon a barricade?"

Or after all, my working brothers, is it true of our promised land, even as of that Jewish one of old, that the priests' feet must first cross the mystic stream into the good land and large which God has prepared for us?

Is it so indeed? Then in the name of the Lord of Hosts ye priests of His, why will ye not awake, and arise, and go over Jordan, that the people of the Lord may follow you?

CHAPTER V.

THE SCIENTIST'S MOTIVE.

My readers will perceive, from what I have detailed, that I was not likely to get any very positive ground of comfort from Crosshwaite, and from within myself there was daily less and less hope of any. Daily the struggle became more intolerable between my duty to my mother and my duty to myself—that inward thirst for mental self-improvement, which, without any clear consciousness of its sanctity or inspiration, I felt, and could not help feeling, that I must follow. No doubt it was very self-willed and ambitious of me to do that which rich men's sons are flogged for not doing, and rewarded with all manner of prizes, scholarships, fellowships, for doing. But the nineteenth year is a time of life at which self-will is apt to exhibit itself in other people besides tailors, and those religious persons who think it no sin to drive their sons on through classics and mathematics, in hopes of gaining them a station in life, ought not to be very hard upon me for driving myself on through the same path without any such selfish hope of gain—though perhaps the very fact of my having no wish or expectation of such advantage will constitute in their eyes my sin and folly, and prove that I was following the dictates merely of a carnal lust, and not of a proper worldly prudence. I really do not wish to be flippant or sneering. I have seen the evil of it as much as any man, in myself and in my own class. But there are excuses for such a fault in the working-man. It does sour and madden him to be called presumptuous and ambitious for the very same aspirations which are lauded up to the skies in the sons of the rich—unless, indeed, he will do one little thing, and so make his peace with society. If he will desert his own class, if he will try to become a shabby gentleman, a parasite, and, if he can, a Maminourte, the world will compliment him on his noble desire to "rise in life." He will have won his spurs, and be admitted into that exclusive pale of knighthood, beyond which it is a sin to carry arms even in self defence. But if the working genius dares to be true to his own class—to stay among them—to regenerate them—to defend them—to devote his talents to those among whom God placed him and brought him up—then he is the demagogue, the incendiary, the fanatic, the dreamer. So you would have the monopoly of talent, too, exclusive worklings? And yet you pretend to believe in the miracle of Pentecost, and the religion that was taught by the carpenter's Son, and preached across the world by fishermen!

I was several times minded to argue the question out with my mother, and assert for myself the same independence of soul which I was now earning for my body by my wages. Once I had resolved to speak to her that very evening; but, strangely enough, happening to open the Bible, which, alas! I did seldom at that time, my eye fell upon the chapter where Jesus, after having justified to His parents His absence in the temple, while hearing the doctors and asking them questions, yet went down with them to Nazareth after all, and was subject unto them. The story struck me vividly as a symbol of my own duties. But on reading further, I found more than one passage which seemed to me to convey a directly opposite lesson, where His mother and His brethren, fancying Him mad, attempted to interfere with His labours, and asserting their family rights as reasons for retaining Him, met with a peremptory rebuff. I puzzled my head for some time to find out which of the two cases was the more applicable to my state of self-development. The notion of asking for teaching from on high on such a point had never crossed me. Indeed, if it had, I did not believe sufficiently either in the story or in the doctrines connected with it, to have tried such a resource. And so, as may be supposed, my growing self-conceit decided for me that the latter course was the lifting one.

And yet I had not energy to carry it out. I was getting so worn out in body and mind from continual study and labour, started food, and want of sleep, that I could not face the thought of an explosion, such as I knew must ensue, and I lingered on in the same unhappy state, becoming more and more morose in manner to my mother, while I was as assiduous as ever in all filial duties. But I had no pleasure in home. She seldom spoke to me. Indeed, there was no common topic about which we could speak. Besides, ever since that fatal Sunday evening, I saw that she suspected me and watched me. I had good reason to believe that she set spies upon my conduct. Poor dear mother! God forbid that I should uncease thee for a single care of thine, for a single suspicion even, prompted as they all were by a mother's anxious love. I would never have committed those things to paper, hadst thou not been far beyond the reach or hearing of them, and only now, in hopes that they may serve as a warning, in some degree to mothers, but ten times more to children. For I sinned against thee, deeply and shamefully, in thought and deed, while you didst never sin against me, though all thy caution did but hasten the fatal explosion which came, and perhaps must have come, under some form or other, in any case.

I had been detained one night in the shop; till late, and on my return my mother demanded, in a severe tone, the reason of my stay, and on my telling her, answered as severely that she did not believe me, that she had too much reason to suspect that I had been with bad companions.

"Who dared to put such a thought into your head?"

She "would not give up her authorities, but she had too much reason to believe them."

Again I demanded the name of my slanderer, and was refused it. And then I burst out, for the first time in my life, into a real fit of rage with her. I cannot tell how I dared to say what I did, but I was weak, nervous, irritable—my brain excited beyond all natural tension. Above all, I felt that she was unjust to me, and my good conscience, as well as my pride, rebelled.

"You have never trusted me," I cried—"you have watched me—"

"Did you not deceive me once already?"

"And if I did," I answered, more and more excited, "have I not slaved for you, stunted myself of clothes to pay your rent? Have I not run to and fro for you like a slave, while I know all the time you did not respect me or trust me? If you had only treated me as a child and an idiot, I could have borne it. But you have been thinking of me all the while as an incarnate fiend—dead in trespasses and sins—a child of wrath and the devil. What right have you to be astonished if I should do my father's works?"

"You may be ignorant of vital religion," she answered; "and you may insult me. But if you make a mock of God's word, you leave my house. If you can laugh at religion, you can deceive me."

The pent-up scepticism of years burst forth.

"Mother," I said, "don't talk to me about religion, and election, and conversion, and all that—I don't believe one word of it. Nobody does, except good kind people—(like you, alas! I was going to say, but the devil stopped the words at my lips)—who must needs have some reason to account for their goodness. That Bowyer—he's a soft heart by nature, and as he is, so he does—religion has had nothing to do with that, any more than it has with that black fixed, canting scoundrel who has been telling you lies about me. Much his heart is changed! He carries sneer and slanderer in his face—and sneak and slanderer he will be, elect or none. Religion! Nobody believes in it. The rich don't, or they wouldn't fill their churches up with pews, and shut the poor out, all the time they are calling them brothers. They believe the gospel! Then why do they leave the men who make their clothes to starve in such hells on earth as our workroom? No more do the tradespeople believe in it, or they wouldn't go home from sermon to sand the sugar, and put slot leaves in the tea, and send out lying puffs of their vaunted-up goods, and grind the last farthing out of the poor creatures who rent their wretched stinking houses. And as for the workmen—they laugh at it all, I can tell you. Much good religion is doing for them! You may see it's fit only for women and children—for go where you will, church or chapel, you see hardly any thing but bonnets and babies! I don't believe a word of it,—once and for all. I'm old enough to think for myself, and a free thinker I will be, and believe nothing but what I know and understand."

I had hardly spoken the words, when I would have given worlds to recall them—but it was to be—and it was.

Sternly she looked at me full in the face, till my eyes dropped before her gaze. Then she spoke steadily and slowly.

"Leave this house this moment. You are no son of mine henceforward! Do you think I will have my daughter polluted by the company of an infidel and a blasphemer?"

"I will go," I answered, heroically, "I can get my own living at all events!" And before I had time to think, I had rushed up stairs, packed up my bundle, not forgetting the precious books, and was on my way through the frosty echoing streets under the cold glare of the winter's moon.

I had gone perhaps half a mile, when the thought of home rushed over me—the little room where I had spent my life—the scene of all my childish joys and sorrows—which I should never see again, for I felt that my departure was forever. Then I longed to see my mother once again—not to speak to her—for I was at once too proud and too cowardly to do that—but to have a look at her through the window. One look—for all the while, though I was boiling over with rage and indignation, I felt that it was all on the surface—that in the depths of our hearts I loved her and she loved me. And yet I wished to be angry, wished to hate her. Strange contradiction of the flesh and spirit!

Hastily and silently I retraced my steps to the house. The gate was pullock. I cautiously stole over the palings to the window—the shutter was closed and fast. I longed to knock—I lifted my hand to the door, and dare not, indeed, I knew that it was useless, in my dread of my mother's habit of stern determination. That room—that mother I never saw again. I turned away, sickened at heart, I was clambering back again, looking behind me towards the window, when I felt a strong grip on my collar, and turning round, had a policeman's lantern flashed in my face.

"Hallo, young un, and what do you want here?" with a strong emphasis, after the fashion of policemen, on all his pronouns.

"Hush! or you'll alarm my mother!"

"Oh! eh! Forgot the latch-key, you sneaking Don Juan, that's it is it? Late home from the Victory?"

I told him simply how the case stood, and entreated him to get me a night's lodging, assuring him that my mother would not admit me, or I asked to be admitted.

The policeman seemed puzzled, but after scratching his hat in lieu of his head for some seconds, replied,—

"This here is the dodge—you goes outside and lies down on the kerb-stone, whereby I spurs you asleeping in the streets, contrary to act o' Parliament; whereby it is my duty to take you to the station house, whereby you gets a night's lodging free, gracious, for nothing, and company provided by her Majesty."

"Oh, not to the station house!" I cried, in shame and terror.

"Weary well, then you must keep moving all night continually, whereby you avoids the hact, or else you goes to a twopenny-rope shop and gets a lie down. And your bundle you'd best leave at my house. Twopenny-rope society a'n't particular. I'm going off my heart, you walk home with me and leave your traps. Everybody knows me—Costello, V 21, that's my number."

So on I went with the kind-hearted man, who preached solemnly to me all the way on the fifth commandment. But I heard very little of it, for before I had proceeded a quarter of a mile, a deadly faintness and dizziness came over me, I staggered, and fell against the railings.

"And have you been a drinking arter all?"

"I never a drop in my life—nothing but bread and water this fortnight."

And it was true. I had been prying for my own food, and had stunted myself to such an extent, that between starvation, want of sleep, and over exertion, I was worn to a shadow, and the last drop had filled the cup, the evening's scene and its consequences had been too much for me, and in the middle of an attempt to explain matters to the policeman, I dropped on the pavement, bruising my face heavily.

He picked me up, put me under one arm and my bundle under the other, and was proceeding on his march, when three men came rolling up.

"Hallo, Poleax—Costello. What's that? Work for us? A demp, unpleasant body?"

"Oh, Mr Bromley, sir! Hope you're well, sir! Werry run go this here, an! I finds this cove in the streets. He says his mother turned him out o' doors. He seems very fair spoken, and very bad in he's head, and very bad in he's chest, and very bad in he's legs, he does. And I can't come to no conclusions respecting my conduct in this here case, now!"

"Mainmalise the Health of Towns Commission," suggested one.

"Bleed him in the great toe," said the second.

"Put a blister on the back of his left eyeball," said a third.

"Case of male asterisks," observed the first. "Rj Aqua pumpis puræ quantum suff. Applicatur exte. io pte re nata. J. Bromley, M.D., and don't he wish he may get through!"

"Tip up your dadille, my boy," said the second speaker. "I'll tell you what, Bromley, this fellow's very bad. He's got no more pulse than the Philico sever. Run him into the next pot'us. Here you liv hold of him, Bromley—that last round with the cabman nearly put my hancus out."

The huge, hilly, pea-jacketed medical student for such I saw at once he was—laid hold of me on the right tenderly enough, and walked me off between him and the policeman.

I fell again into a faintness, from which I was awakened by being shoved through the folding doors of a gin-shop, into a glare of light and hubbub of blackguardism, and placed on a settle, while my conductor called out,— "Pots round, Mary, and a go of brandy hot with, for the patient. Here, young un, toss it off, it'll make your hair grow."

I feebly answered that I never had drunk anything stronger than water.

"High time to begin then: no wonder you're so ill. Well, if you won't, I'll make you—"

And taking my head under his arm, he seized me by the nose, while another poured the liquor down my throat—and certainly it revived me at once.

A drunken drab pulled another drunken drab off the settle to make room for the "poor young man," and I sat there with a confused notion that something strange and dreadful had happened to me, while the party drained their respective quarts of porter, and talked over the last boat race with the Leander.

TAILOR AND POET

"Now, then, gentlemen," said the policeman, "if you think he's recovered, we'll take him home to his mother; she ought for to take him in, surely."

"Yes, if she has as much heart in her as a dried walnut."

But I resisted stontly, though I longed to vindicate my mother's affection, yet I could not face her. I entreated to be taken to the station house, this denied, in my desperation, to break the bar glasses, which, like Doll Tensheet's abuse, only elicited from the policeman a solemn "Very well," and under the unwonted excitement of the brandy, struggled so fiercely, and talked so incoherently, that the medical students interfered.

"We shall have this fellow in phrenitis, or laryngitis, or dothens-entitis, or some other itis, before long, if he's aggravated."

"And whichever it is, it'll kill him. He has no more stamina left than a yard of pump water."

"I should consider him chargeable to the parish," suggested the bar-keeper.

"Exactly as my Solomon of licensed victuallers. Get a workhouse order for him, Costello."

"And I should consider, also, sir," said the licensed victualler, with increased importance, "having been a guardian myself, and knowing the facts, as the parish couldn't refuse, because they're in power to recover all expenses out of his mother."

"To be sure, it's all the unnatural old witch's fault."

"No, it is not," said I, faintly.

"Wait till your opinion's asked, young man. Go kick up the authorities, policeman."

"Now, I'll just tell you how that it works, gentlemen," answered the policeman, solemnly. "I goes to the overseer—werry good sort o' man—but he's in bed. I knocks for half an hour. He puts he's nightcap on o' windy, and sends me to the relieving officer. Werry good sort of man he too, but he's in bed. I knocks for another half-hour. He puts he's nightcap on o' windy, sends me to the medical officer for a certificate. Medical officer's gone to a midwifery case. I hunts him for an hour or so. He's got hold of a babby with thier heads, or snunnat else, and two more women a-calling out for him like blazes. 'Hell come to morrow morning.' Now, I just asks your opinion of that there most procrastinationest go."

The big student, having cursed the parochial authorities in general, offered to pay for my night's lodging at the public house. The good man of the house demurred at first, but relented on being reminded of the value of a medical student's custom, whereon, without more ado, two of the rough diamonds took me between them, carried me upstairs, undressed me, and put me into bed, as tenderly as it they had been women.

"He'll have tantrums to fore morning, I'm afraid," said one.

"Very likely to turn to typhus," said the other.

"Well, I suppose—it's a horrid bore, but

What must be must. Man is but dust,
If you can't get crumb, you must just eat crust."

Send me up a gin of hot with, and I'll sit up with him till he's asleep, dead, or better."

"Well, then, I'll stay too; we may just as well make a night of it here as well as anywhere else."

And he pulled a short black pipe out of his pocket, and sat down to meditate with his feet on the hobs of the empty grate; the other man went down for the liquor, while I, between the brandy and exhaustion, fell fast asleep, and never stirred till I woke the next morning with aacking headache, and saw the big student standing by my bedside, having, as I afterwards heard, sat by me till four in the morning.

"Hullo, young un, come to your senses? Headache, eh? Slightly comatose, I suppose? We'll give you some soda and salvolatin', and I'll pay for your breakfast."

And so he did, and when he was joined by his companions then way to St George's, they were very anxious, having heard my story, to force a few shillings on me 'for luck,' which, I need not say, I promptly refused, assuming them that I could and would get my own living, and never take a farthing from any man.

"That's a plucky dog, though he's a tailor," I heard them say, as, after overwhelming them with thanks, and vowing amid shouts of laughter, to repay them every farthing I had cost them, I took my way, sick and stunned, towards my dear old Sandy Mackaye's street.

Rough diamonds indeed! I have never met you again, but I have not forgotten you. Your early life may be a course, too often a profligate one—but you know the people, and the people know you, and your tenderness and care, bestowed without hope of repayment, cheers daily many a poor soul in hospital wards and fever-cellars—to meet its reward some day at the people's hands. You belong to us at heart, as the Paris barricades can tell. Alas! for the society which stifles in after life too many of your better feelings, by making you mere flunkys and parasites, dependent for your livelihood on the caprices and luxuries of the rich.

CHAPTER VI

THE DULWICH GALLERY

SANDY MACKAYE received me in a characteristic way, growled at me for half-an hour for quarrelling with my mother, and when I was at my wit's end, suddenly offered me a bed in his house and the use of his little sitting-room—and, bliss too great to hope of his books also, and when I talked of payment, told me to hold my tongue and mind my own business. So I settled myself at once; and that very evening he installed himself as my private tutor, took down a Latin book, and set me to work on it.

"An' mind ye, laddie," said he, half in jest and half in earnest, "gum I find ye playing truant, and reading a' sorts o' nonsense instead of minding the scholastic methods and proprieties, I'll just bring ye in a bill at the year's end o' twa gunnaws a week for lodgings and tuition, and tak' the law o' ye, so mind and read what I tell ye. Do ye comprehend noo?"

I did comprehend, and obeyed him, determining to repay him some day—and somehow—how I did not very clearly see. Thus I put myself more or less into the old man's power, foolishly enough the wise world will say. But I had no suspicion in my character, and I could not look at those keen grey eyes, when, after staring into vacancy during some long preachment, they suddenly flashed round at me, and through me, full of fun and quaint thought, and kindly earnestness, and fancy that man less honest than his face seemed to proclaim him.

By the-by, I have as yet given no description of the old eccentric's abode—an unpardonable omission, I suppose, in these days of Dutch painting and fix. But the omission was correct, both historically and artistically, for I had as yet only gone to him for books, books, nothing but books, and I had been blind to everything in his shop but that fairy land of shelves, filled, in my simple fancy with inexhaustible treasures, wonder working, omnipotent, as the magic seal of Solomon.

It was not till I had been settled and at work for several nights, in his sanctum behind the shop, that I began to become conscious what a strange den that sanctum was.

It was so dark, that without a gaslight in one but he could see to read there, except on very sunny days. Not only were the shelves which covered every inch of wall crammed with books and pamphlets, but the little window was blocked up with them, the floor was piled with bundles of them, in some places three feet deep, apparently in the wildest confusion—though there was some mysterious order in them which he understood, and symbolised, I suppose, by the various strange and ludicrous nick-names of their tickets—for he never was at fault moment if a customer asked for a book though it were buried deep in the chaotic stratum. Out of this book-alluvium a hole seemed to have been dug near the fireplace, just big enough to hold his arm-chair and a table, book-strewn like everything else, and armished with odds and ends of MSS., and a snuffer-tray containing scraps of half-smoked tobacco—"pipe-dotties," as he called them, which were carefully re-smoked over and over again, till nothing but ash was left. His whole culinary utensils—for he looked as well as ate in this strange hole—were an old rusty kettle, which stood on one oh, and a blue plate, which, when washed, stood on the other. A barrel of true Aberdeen meal peered out of a corner, half-buried in hooks, and "a keg o' whusky, the gift o' recus," peeped in like case out of another.

This was his only food. "It was a' wisdom," he used to say, "in London Bread all o' alum and bones, and sic filth—meat over-driven till it was a' braxy—water kipped wi' dead men's juice. Naething was safe but gude Scotch parritch and Athole rose." He carried his water-horror so far as to walk some quarter of a mile every morning to fill his kettle at a favourite pump. "Was he a cannibal, to drink out o' that murrain hand by, right under the kirkyard?" But it was little he either ate or drank—he seemed to live upon tobacco. From four in the morning till twelve at night, the pipe never left his lips, except when he went into the outer shop. "It promoted meditation, and drove awa' the lusts o' the flesh. Ech! it was worthy o' that auld tyrant Jamie, to write his counter-blast to the poor man's fiction! 'The hypocrite' to gang preaching the virtues o' evil-savoured smoke 'ad lemons abigendos'—and then rail again tobacco, as if it was no as gude for the purpose as auld rage and horn shavings!"

Sandy Mackaye had a great fancy for political caricatures, rows of which, there being no room for them on the walls, hung on strings from the ceiling, like clothes hung out to dry—and among them dangled various books to which he had taken an antipathy, principally High Tory and Ben-thamite, crushed, impaled through their covers, and suspended in all sorts of torturing attitudes. Among them, right over the table, figured a copy of Icon Basilike, dressed up in a paper shirt, all drawn over with figures of flames and devils, and surmounted by a peaked paper cap, like a victim at an auto da-fé. And in the midst of all this chaos grinned from the chimney-piece, among pipes and pens, punches of salt and scraps of butter, a tall cast of Michael Angelo's well-known skinless model—his pristine white defaced by a cap of soot upon the top of his scalpless skull, and every muscle and tendon thrown into horrible relief by the dirt which had lodged among the cracks. There it stood, pointing with its ghastly arm towards the door, and holding on its wrist a label with the following inscription.

Here stand, the working man,
Get more off me if you can."

I questioned Mackaye one evening about those hanged and crucified books, and asked him if he ever sold any of them.

"Ou, ay," he said; "if folks are fools enough to ask for them, I'll just answer a fool according to his folly."

"But," I said, "Mr Mackaye, do you think it right to sell books of the very opinions of which you disapprove so much?"

"Hoot, laddie, it's just a spoiling o' the Egyptians, so mind y'r book, and dinna tak' in hand cases o' conscience for ither folk. Ye'll ha' waik enough wi' yer ain before ye're done."

And he folded round his knees his Joseph's coat, as he called it, an old dressing-gown with one plaid sleeve, and one blue one, red shawl skirts, and a black broad-cloth back, not to mention innumerable patches of every imaginable stuff and colour, filled his pipe, and buried his nose in "Harrington's Oceana." He read at least twelve hours every day of his life, and that exclusively old history and politics, though his favourite books were Thomas Carlyle's works. Two or three evenings in the week, when he had seen me safe settled at my studies, he used to disappear mysteriously for several hours, and it was some time before I found out, by a chance expression, that he was attending some meeting or committee of working men. I begged him to take me there with him. But I was stopped by a laconic answer.

"When ye're ready."

"And when shall I be ready, Mr Mackaye?"

"Read yer book till I tell ye."

And he twisted himself into his best coat, which had once been black, squeezed on his little Scotch cap, and went out.

I now found myself, as the reader may suppose, in an element far more congenial to my literary tastes, and which compelled far less privation of sleep and food in order to find time and means for reading, and my health began to mend from the very first day. But the thought of my mother haunted me, and Mackaye seemed in no hurry to let me escape from it, for he insisted on my writing to her in a penitent strain, informing her of my whereabouts, and offering to return home if she should wish it. With feelings strangely mingled between the desire of seeing her again and the dread of returning to the old drudgery of surveillance, I sent the letter, and waited a whole week without any answer. At last, one evening, when I returned from work, Sandy seemed in a state of unusual exhilaration. He looked at me again and again, winking and chuckling to himself in a way which showed me that his good spirits had something to do with my concerns; but he did not open on the subject till I had settled to my evening's reading. Then, having brewed himself an unusually strong mug of whisky-fouldy, and brought out with great ceremony a clean pipe, he commenced

"Alton, laddie, I've been fechtin' Philistines for ye the day."

"Ah! have you heard from my mother?"

"I wadna say that exactly, but there's been a gran' bairn body wi' me that calls himsel' your uncle, and a braw young callant, a bairn o' us, I'm thinking."

"Ah! that's my cousin George; and tell me—do tell me, what you said to them."

"Ou—that'll be mair concern o' mine than o' yourn. But ye're no going back to your mither."

My heart leapt up with—joy, there is no denying it—and then I burst into tears.

"And she won't see me? Has she really cast me off?"

"Why, that'll be verri much as ye prosper, I'm thinking. Ye're an unaccredited hero, the noo, as Thomas Carlyle has it. 'But gin ye do weel by yonself,' saith the Psalmist, 'ye'll find a' men speak well o' ye'—if ye gang thru' gate. But ye're to gang to see your uncle at his shop o' Monday next, at one o'clock. Now stunt your gaitin', and read awa'."

On the next Monday I took a holiday, the first in which I had ever indulged myself, and having spent a good hour in scrubbing away at my best shoes and Sunday suit, started, in fear and trembling, for my uncle's establishment.

I was agreeably surprised, on being shown into the little back office at the back of the shop, to meet with a tolerably gracious reception from the good-natured Maunmonte. He did not shake hands with me, it is true;—was I not a poor relation? But he told me to sit down, commended me for the excellent character which he had of me both from my master and Mackaye, and then entered on the subject of my literary tastes. He heard I was a precious clever fellow. No wonder, I came of a clever stock, his poor dear brother had plenty of brains for everything but business. "And you see, my boy" (with a glance at the big ledgers and lousy shop without), "I knew a thing or two in my time, or I should not have been here. But without capital, I think brains a curse. Still we must make the best of a bad matter; and if you are inclined to help to raise the family name—not that I think much of book writers myself—poor starving dovels—half of them—but still people do talk about them—and a man might get a snug thing as news paper editor, with interest, or clerk to something or other—always some new company in the wind now—and I should have no objection, if you seemed likely to do us credit, to speak a word for you. I've none of your mither's confounded Puritanical notions, I can tell you, and, what's more, I have, thank Heaven, as fine a city connexion as any man. But you must mind and make yourself a good accountant—learn double entry on the Italian method—that's a good practical study; and if that old Sawney is soft enough to teach you other things gratis, he may as well teach you that too. I'll bet he knows something about it—the old Scotch fox. There now—that'll do—there's five shillings for you—mind you don't lose them—and if I hear a good account of you, why, perhaps—but there's no use making promises."

At this moment a tall, handsome young man, whom I did not at first recognise as my cousin George, swung into the office, and shook me cordially by the hand.

"Hallo, Alton, how are you? Why, I hear you're coming out as a regular genius—breaking out in a new place, upon my honour! Have you done with him, governor?"

"Well, I think I have. I shall have a talk with him, my boy. I'm sorry I can't see more of him, but I have to meet a party on business at the West End at two, and Alderman Tumbail and family dine with us this evening, don't they? I think our small table will be full."

"Of course it will. Come along with me, and we'll have a chat in some quiet out-of-the-way place. This city is really so noisy that you can't hear your own ears, as our dean says in lecture."

So he called me off, down back streets and alleys, a little puzzled at the extreme cordiality of his manner. Perhaps, it sprang, as I learned afterward to suspect, from his consistent and perpetual habit of ingratiating himself with every one whom he approached. He never cut a chimney sweep if he knew him. And he found it pay. The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light.

Perhaps it sprang also, as I began to suspect in the first hundred yards of our walk, from the desire of showing off before me the university clothes, manners, and gossip, which he had just brought back with him from Cambridge.

I had not seen him more than three or four times in my life before, and then he appeared to me merely a tall, handsome, conceited, sluggish boy. But I now found him much improved—in all externals at least. He had made it his business, I know, to perfect himself in all athletic pursuits which were open to a Londoner. As he told me that day—he found it pay, when one got among gentlemen. Thus he had gone up to Cambridge a capital skater, rower, pugilist—and billiard player. Whether or not that last accomplishment ought to be classed in the list of athletic sports, he contrived, by his own account, to keep it in that of paying ones. In both these branches he seemed to have had plenty of opportunities of distinguishing himself at college, and his tall, powerful figure showed the fruit of these exercises in a stately and confident, almost martial, carriage. Something jaunty, perhaps swaggering, remained still in his air and dress, which yet sat not ungracefully on him; but I could see that he had been mixing in society more polished and artificial than that to which we had either of us been accustomed, and in his smart Rochester, well-cut trousers, and delicate French boots, he excited, I will not deny it, my boyish admiration and envy.

"Well," he said, as soon as we were out of the shop, "which way? Got a holiday? And how did you intend to spend it?"

"I wanted very much," I said, meekly, "to see the pictures at the National Gallery."

"Oh! ah! pictures don't pay, but, if you like—much better once at Dulwich—that's the place to go to—you can see the others any day—and at Dulwich, you know, they've got why, let me see—" And he ran over half-a-dozen outlandish names of painters, which, as I have never again met with them, I am inclined on the whole to consider as somewhat extemporaneous creations. However, I agreed to go.

"Ah! capital—very nice quiet walk, and convenient for me—very little out of my way home. I'll walk there with you."

"One word for your neighbour and two for yourself," thought I, but on we walked. To see good pictures had been a long-cherished hope of mine. Every thing beautiful in form or colour was beginning of late to have an intense fascination for me. I had, now that I was emancipated, gradually dared to feed my greedy eyes by passing sturs into the paint shop windows, and had had from them a thousand new notions, new emotions, new longings after beauties of Nature, which seemed destined never to be satisfied. But pictures alone were no ones—had been, in my mother's eyes, Anathema Marmatha, as vile I speak and Pagan vanities, the rage of the smart woman no less than the simple itself. And now, when it came to the point, I hesitated at an act of such awful disobedience, even though unknown to her. My cousin, however, laughed down my scruples, told me I was out of the leading strings now, and, which was true enough, that it was "a * * * deal better, to amuse oneself in picture galleries without leave, than live a life of sneaking and lying under petticoat government, as all householders were sure to do in the long run." And so I went on, while my cousin kept up a running fire of chat the whole way, intermixing shrewd, bold observations upon every woman who passed, with snatches at the fellows of the college to which we were going—their idleness and luxury—the large grammar-school which they were bound by their charter to keep up, and did not—and hints about private interest in high quarters, through which their wealthy uselessness had been politely overlooked, when all similar institutions in the kingdom were subject to the searching examination of a government commission. Then there were stories of boat races and gay noblemen, breakfast parties, and lectures on Greek plays, flavoured with a spice of Cambridge slang, all equally new to me—glimpses into a world of wonders, which made me feel, as I shambled along at his side, trying to keep step with his stides, more weakly, and awkward, and ignorant than ever.

We entered the gallery. I was in a fever of expectation.

The rich sombre light of the rooms, the rich heavy warmth of the stove-heated air, the brilliant and varied colouring and gilded frames which embroidered the walls, the hushed earnestness of a few artists who were copying, and a few visitors who were lounging from picture to picture, struck me at once with mysterious awe. But my attention was in a moment concentrated on one figure opposite to me at the farthest end. I hurried straight towards it. When I had got half way up the gallery I looked round for my companion. He had turned aside to some picture of a Venus which caught my eye also, but which, I remember now, only raised in me then a shudder and a blush, and a fancy that the clergyman must be really as bad as my mother had taught me to believe, if they could allow in their galleries pictures of undressed women. I have learnt to view such things differently now, thank God. I have learnt that to the pure all things are pure. I have learnt the meaning of that great saying—the foundation of all art, as well as all modesty, all love, which tells us how “the man and his wife were both naked, and not ashamed.” But this book is the history of my mental growth, and my mistakes as well as my discoveries are steps in that development, and may bear a lesson in them.

How I have tumbled! But as that day was the turning point of my whole short life, I may be excused for lingering upon every feature of it.

Timidly, but eagerly, I went up to the picture and stood entranced before it. It was Guido's St Sebastian. All the world knows the picture, and all the world knows, too, the defects of the master, though in this instance he seems to have risen above himself, by a sudden inspiration, into that true naturalness, which is the highest expression of the Spiritual. But the very defects of the picture, its exaggeration, its theatricality, were especially calculated to catch the eye of a boy awaking out of the narrow dulness of Puritanism. The breadth and vastness of light and shade upon those manly limbs, so grand and yet so delicate, standing out against the background of lurid night, the helplessness of the bound arms, the arrow quivering in the shrinking side, the upturned brow, the eyes in whose dark depths enthusiastic faith seemed conquering agony and shame, the parted lips, which seemed to ask, like those martyrs in the Revelations, reproachful, half-resigned, “O Lord, how long?”—Gazing at that picture since, I have understood how the idolatry of painted saints could arise in the minds even of the most educated, who were not disciplined by that stern regard for fact which is—or ought to be—the strength of Englishmen. I have understood the heart of that Italian girl, whom some such picture of St Sebastian, perhaps this very one, excited, as the Venus of Praxiteles the Grecian boy, to hopeless love, madness, and death. Then I had never heard of St Sebastian. I did not dream of any connection between that, or indeed any picture, and Christianity, and yet, as I stood before it, I seemed to be face to face with the ghost of my old Puritan forefathers, to see the spirit which supported them on pillories and scaffolds—the spirit of that true St Margaret, the Scottish maiden whom Claverhouse and his soldiers chained to a post on the sea sands to die by inches in the rising tide, till the sound of her hymns was slowly drowned in the dash of the hungry leaping waves. My heart swelled within me, my eyes seemed bursting from my head with the intensity of my gaze, and great tears, I knew not why, rolled slowly down my face.

A woman's voice close to me, gentle, yet of deeper tone than most, woke me from my trance.

“You seem to be deeply interested in that picture.”

I looked round, yet not at the speaker. My eyes, before they could meet hers, were caught by an apparition the most beautiful I had ever yet beheld. And what what have I seen equal to her since? Strange, that I should love to talk of her. Strange, that I fret at myself now because I cannot set down on paper line by line, and hue by hue, that wonderful loveliness of which—But no matter. Had I but such an imagination as Petrarch, or rather, perhaps, had I his delicate cold self-consciousness, what volumes of simile and conceits I might pour out, connecting that peerless face and figure with all lovely things which heaven and earth contain. As it is, because I cannot say all, I will say nothing, but repeat to the end again and again,—Beautiful, beautiful, beautiful, beyond all statue, picture, or poet's dream. Seventeen—slight but rounded, a masque and features delicate and regular, as if fresh from the chisel of Praxiteles—I must try to describe after all, you see—a skin of alabaster (præter flowers, Horace and Aristotle would have said, more true to Nature), stained with the faintest flush, auburn hair, with that peculiar cupped wave seen in the old Italian pictures, and the warm, dark hazel eyes which so often accompany it, lips like a thread of vermilion, somewhat too thin, perhaps—but I thought little of that then, with such perfect finish and grace in every line and hue of her features and her dress, down to the little fingers and nails which showed through her thin gloves, that she seemed to my fancy fresh from the innermost chamber of some enchanted palace, “where no air of heaven could visit her cheek too roughly.” I dropped my eyes, quite dazzled. The question was repeated by a lady who stood with her, whose face I remarked then as I did to the last, alas!—too little, dazzled at the first by outward beauty, perhaps because so utterly unaccustomed to it.

"It is indeed a wonderful picture," I said, timidly. "May I ask what is the subject of it?"

"Oh! don't you know?" said the young beauty, with a smile that thrilled through me. "It is St Sebastian."

"I—I am very much ashamed," I answered, colouring up, "but I do not know who St Sebastian was. Was he a Popish saint?"

A tall, stately old man, who stood with the two ladies, laughed kindly. "No, not till they made him one against his will, and at the same time, by putting him into the mill which grinds old folks young again, converted him from a grizzled old Roman tribune into the young Apollo of Popery."

"You will puzzle you hearer, my dear uncle," said the same deep toned woman's voice which had first spoken to me. "As you volunteered the saint's name, Lillian, you shall also tell his history."

Simply and shortly, with just feeling enough to send through me a fresh thrill of delighted interest, without trenching the least on the most stately reserve, she told me the well-known history of the saint's martyrdom.

If I seem minute in my description, let those who read my story remember that such courteous dignity, however natural, I am bound to believe, it is to them, was to me an utterly new excellence in human nature. All my mother's Spartan nobleness of manner seemed unexpectedly combined with all my little sister's careless ease.

"What a beautiful poem the story would make!" said I, as she recovered my thoughts.

"Well spoken, young man," answered the old gentleman. "Let us hope that you seeing a subject for a good poem will be the first step towards your writing one."

As he spoke, he bent on me two clear gray eyes, full of kindness, mingled with practised discernment. I saw that he was evidently a clergyman, but what his tight silk stockings and peacock hat denoted I did not know. There was about him the air of a man accustomed equally to thought, to men, and to power. And I reminded somewhat maliciously, that my cousin, who had strutted up towards us on sheer, no talking to two ladies, the instant he caught sight of those black silk stockings and that strange hat, fell suddenly in countenance, and sidling off somewhat meekly into the background, became absorbed in the examination of a Holy Family.

I answered something humbly, I forget what, which led to a conversation. They questioned me as to my name, my mother, my business, my studies; while I revelled in the delight of stolen glances at my now-found Venus Victrix, who was as forward as any of them in her questions and her interest. Perhaps she enjoyed, at least she could not help seeing, the admiration for herself which I took no pains to conceal. At last the old man cut the conversation short by a quiet "Good morning, sir," which astonished me. I had never heard words whose tone was so courteous and yet so chillingly peremptory. As they turned away, he repeated to himself once or twice, as if to fix them in his mind, my name and my master's, and awoke in me, perhaps too thoughtlessly, a tumult of vague hopes. Once and again the beauty and her companion looked back towards me, and seemed talking of me, and my face was burning scarlet, when my cousin swung up in his hard, off-hand way.

"By Jove, Alton, my boy! you're a knowing fellow. I congratulate you! At your years, indeed! to use a dean and two beauties at the first throw, and hook them fast!"

"A dean!" I said, in some trepidation.

"Ay, a live dean—didn't you see the cloven foot sticking out from under his shon-buckle? What news for your mother! What will the ghosts of your grandfathers to the seventh generation say to this, Alton? Colloguing in Pagan picture-galleries with shovel-hatted Philistines! And that's not the worst, Alton," he ran on, "those daughters of Moab—those daughters of Moab—"

"Hold your tongue," I said, almost crying with vexation.

"Look there, if you want to save your good temper. There, she is looking back again—not at poor me, though. What a lovely girl she is! and a real lady—/au noble—the real genuine girl, as Sam Slick says, and no mistake. By Jove, what a face, what hands! what feet! what a figure—in spite of crinolines and all abominations! And didn't she know it? And didn't she know that you knew it too?"

And he ran on, descending coarsely on beauties which I dared not even have profaned by naming, in a way that made me, I knew not why, mad with jealousy and indignation. She seemed mine alone in all the world. What right had any other human being, above all, he, to dare to mention her? I turned again to my St Sebastian. That movement only brought on me a fresh volley of banter.

"Oh, that's the dodge, is it? to catch intellectual ladies?—to fall into an extatic attitude before a picture—But then we must have Alton's genius, you know, to find out which the fine pictures are. I must read up that subject, by-the-by. It might be a paying one among the dons. For the present, here goes in for an attitude. Will this do, Alton?" And he arranged himself admiringly before the picture in an attitude so absurd and yet so graceful, that I did not know whether to laugh at him or hate him.

"At all events," he added, dryly, "it will be as good as playing the evangelical at Carus's tea-parties, or taking the sacrament regularly for fear one's testimonials should be refused." And then he looked at me, and through me, in his intense, confident way, to see that his hasty words had not injured him with me. He used to meet one's eye as boldly as any man I ever saw, but it was not the simple gaze of honesty and innocence, but an imperious, searching look, as if defying scrutiny. His was a true mesmeric eye, if ever there was one. No wonder it worked the miracles it did.

"Come along," he said, suddenly seizing my arm. "Don't you see they're leaving?" Out of the gallery after them, and get a good look at the carriage and the arms upon it. I saw one standing there as we came in. It may pay us, you, that is, to know it again."

We went out, I holding him back, I knew not why, and arrived at the outer gate just in time to see them enter the carriage and drive off. I gazed to the last, but did not stir.

"Good boy," he said, "knowing still. If you had looked, or showed the least sign of recognition, you would have broken the spell."

But I hardly heard what he said, and stood gazing stupidly after the carriage as it disappeared. I did not know then what had happened to me. I know now, alas! too well.

CHAPTER VII

TRUE LOVE

THAT I said, I did not know what had happened to me. I did not attempt to analyse the intense, overpowering instinct which from that moment made the lovely vision I had seen the focal point of all my thoughts. Even now, I can see nothing in those feelings of mine but simple admiration—adoration if you will of physical beauty. Doubtless there was more—doubtless I had seen pretty faces before, and know that they were pretty, but they had passed from my retina, like the prints of beauties which I saw in the shop windows, without exciting a thought—even a conscious emotion of complacency. But this face did not pass away. Day and night I saw it, just as I had seen it in the gallery. The same playful smile—the same glance alternately turned to me, and the glowing picture above her head, and that was all I saw or felt. No child ever nestled upon a father's shoulder with feelings more reverentially pure, than those with which I counted over day and night each separate fragment of that ever-in-loveliness. Romantic? extravagant? Yes, if the world be right in calling a passion romantic just in proportion as it is not merely hopeless, but pure and unselfish, drawing its delicious power from no hope or faintest desire of enjoyment but merely from simple delight in its object—then my passion was most romantic. I never thought of disparity in rank. Why should I? That could not blind the eyes of my imagination. She was beautiful, and that was all, and all in all, to me, and had my stations been exchanged, or mine then exchanged, had I been King Cophetua, and she the beggar maid, I should have gloried in her just as much.

Beloved sleepless hours, which I spent in picturing that scene to myself, with all the brilliancy of fresh recollection! Beloved hours! how soon you passed away! Soon—soon my imagination began to fade, the traces of her features on my mind's eye became confused and dim, and then came over me the fierce desire to see her again, that I might renew the freshness of that charming image. There grew upon an agony of longing—an agony of weeks, and months, and years. Where could I find that fair again? was my ruling thought from morning until eve. I knew that it was hopeless to look for her at the gallery where I had first seen her. My only hope was, that at some place of public resort at the West End I might catch, it but for a moment, an inspiring glance of that radiant countenance. I lingered round the Brompton and Hyde Park Gates, but in vain. I peered into every carriage, every hansom that passed me in the thoroughfares in vain. I stood patiently at the doors of exhibitions, and concerts, and playhouses, to be shoved back by policemen, and insulted by footmen, but in vain. Then I tried the fashionable churches, one by one, and sat in the free seats, to listen to prayers and sermons, not a word of which, alas! I cared to understand, with my eyes searching carefully every pew and gallery, face by face, always fancying, in self-termining waywardness, that she might be just in the part of the gallery which I could not see. Oh! miserable days of hope deferred, making the heart sick! Miserable growing of disappointment with which I returned at nightfall, to force myself down to my books! Equally miserable rack of hope on which my nerves were stretched every morning when I rose, counting the hours till my days work should begin, and my mind search begin again! At last "my torment did by length of time become my friend." I remained steadily as ever to the studies which I had at first neglected, much to Mickle's wonder and disgust, and the vain hunt after that face became a part of my daily task, to be got through with the same dull, sullen effort, with which all I did was now transacted.

Mickle, I suppose, at first attributed my absence and idleness to my having got into bad company. But it was some weeks before he gently enough told me his suspicions, and they were answered by a burst of tears, and a passionate denial, which set him at rest forever. But I had not courage to tell him what was the matter with me. A sacred modesty as well as a sense of the impossibility of explaining my emotions, held me back. I had a half dead, too, to confess the whole truth, of his ridiculing a fancy, to say the least, so utterly impracticable, and my only confidant was a picture in the National Gallery, in one of the faces of which I had discovered some likeness to my Venus, and there I used to go and stand at spite half hours, and feel the happier for staring and staring, and whispering to the dead canvas the extravagances of my idolatry.

But soon the bitter draught of disappointment began to breed harsher thoughts in me. Those fine gentlemen who rode past me in the park, who rolled by in carriages, sitting face to face with ladies, as richly dressed, if not as beautiful, as she was—they could see her when they liked—why not I? What right had their eyes to a feast denied to mine? They, too, who did not appreciate, whose that hearty as I did—for who could worship her like me? At least they had not sullied for her as I had done, they had not stood in rain and frost, fatigue and blank despair—watching—watching—month after month, and I was making coats for them! The very garment I was stitching fit, night, in a day's time, be in her presence touching her dress, and its wearers howling, and smiling, and whispering—he had not bought that bliss by watching in the rain. It made me mad to think of it.

I will say no more about it. That is a period of my life on which I cannot even now look back without a shudder.

At least, after perhaps a year or more, I summoned up courage to tell my story to Sandy Mackaye, and burst out with complaints more pardonable, perhaps, than reasonable.

"Why have I not as good a right to speak to her, to move in the same society in which she moves, as any of the fops of the day? Is it because these aristocrats are more intellectual than I? I should not fear to measure brains against most of them now, and gave me the opportunities which they have, and I would do if I did not outstrip them. Why have I not the opportunities? Is that fault of others to be visited on me? Is it because they are more refined than I? What right have they, if this refinement be so necessary a qualification, a difference so deep—that without it, there is to be an everlasting gulf between man and man—what right have they to refuse to let me share in it, to give me the opportunity of acquiring it?"

"Wad ye ha' them set up a dancing academy for working-men, wi' 'manners tocht here to the lower classes?' They'll no break up their ain monopoly; trust them for it! Na, if ye want to get among them, I'll tell ye the way o't. Write a book o' poems, and ca' it 'A Voice fra' the Goose, by a Working Tailor'—and then—why, afit, a dozen years or so of starving and scribbling for your bread, ye'll ha' a chance o' finding yoursel' a lion, and a flunkie, and a licker o' trenchers—ane that jokes for his dinner, and sells his soul for a fine lady's smile—till ye presume to think they're in earnest, and fancy yoursel' a man o' the same blude as they, an' fa' in love wi' one of them—and then they'll teach you your level, and send ye off to gangie whisky like him, or leave ye to die in a ditch as they did wi' poor Thom."

"Let me die, anywhere or anyhow, if I can but be near her—see her!"

"Married to another body?—and nursing another body's bairns? Ah, boy, hoy—da ye think that was what ye were made for, to please yoursel' wi' a woman's smiles, or e'en a woman's kisses—o' to please yoursel' at all? How dave expect ever to be happy, or strong, in a minute, as long as ye go on looking to enjoy yoursel'—yoursel'?" I ha' tried it. Money was the year I looked for nought but my ain pleasure, and got it too, when it was a'—

Sandy Mackaye, bonny Sandy Mackaye,
There he sits singing the long number's day,
Lassie's gae to him,
And kiss him, and woo him,
Na but is sa merry as Sandy Mackaye.

An' muckle good can't o't. Ye may fancy I'm talking like a soul, disappointed and cauld. But I tell ye nae. I've got that's worth living for, though I am down hearted at times, and fancy us wrong, and there's na hope for us on earth, we be a' sic hairs—a' hairs, I think, 'a universal hairs-rock substratum,' as Mr Carlyle says. I'm a great fan often mysel', specially when I'm praying. Do ye think I'd live on here in this mescal dille, crankit an' lame-baird o' a body, if it was not for The Cause, and for the poor young fellows that come in to me whiles to get some book learning about the gran' an' Roulin times, when folks didna care for themselves, but for the nation, and a man counted wife, and him, and money, as dross and dung, in comparison with the great Roman city, that was the mother of them a', and wad last on, free and glorious, after they and their bairns were i' dead thegither? Hoot, man! If I hadna The Cause to care for and to work for, whether I ever see it triumphant on earth or no—I'd just tak' the cauld-water cure off Waterloo Bridge, and mak' mysel' a case for the Humane Society."

"And what is The Cause?" I asked.

"Wad I tell ye? We want no ready-made fictions o' The Cause. I dinna haud it that French indoctrinating pedants, that took to stick free opinions into a man as ye'd stick pins into a pincushion, so far out again the first shake. Na—The Cause must find a man, and tak' haud o' him, willy-nilly, and grow up in him like an inspiration, till he can see nocht but in the light o't. Poor bairn!" he went on, looking with a half sad, half comic face at me—"poor bairn—like a young bear, wi' a' yon sorrows before ye! This time seven years ye'll ha' no need to come speeing and questioning what The Cause is, and the Gran' Cause, and the Only Cause worth working for on the earth o' fidd! And now gang ye gite, and mak' hne feathers for foul birds, I'm gaun wha ye'll be gangin' too, before long."

As I went sully out o' the shop, he called me back.

"Stay a wee, harrn, there's the Roman History for ye. There ye'll read what The Cause is, and how they that seek then an aro no worthy thereof."

I took the book, and found in the legends of Brutus, and Cæsar, and Scævola, and the retreat to the Mons Sacri, and the Gladiator's war, what The Cause was, and forgot awhile in those tales of antique heroism and patriotic self-sacrifice my own selfish longings and sorrows.

But, after all, the very advice which was meant to cure me of those selfish longings, only tended, by diverting me from my living inward life, to turn my thoughts more than ever inward, and tempt them to feed on their own substance. I passed whole days on the workroom floor in brooding silence—my mind peopled with an incoherent rabble of phantasies patched up from every object of which I had ever read. I could not control my day-dreams; they swept me away with them over sea and land, and into the bowels of the earth. My soul escaped on every side from my civilised dungeon of brick and mortar, into the great free world from which my body was debased. Now I was the corsair in the pride of freedom on the dark blue sea. Now I wandered in fairy caverns among the bones of primeval monsters. I fought at the side of Leonidas, and the Maccabees who stabbed the Sultan's elephant, and saw him crushed beneath its falling bulk. Now I was a hunter in tropic forests—I heard the parrots scream, and saw the humming-birds flit on from gorgeous flower to flower. Gradually I took a voluntary pleasure in calling up these images, and working out their details into words with all the accuracy and care for which my small knowledge gave me materials. And as the self-indulgent habit grew on me, I began to live two lives—one mechanical and outward, one inward and imaginative. The thread passed through my fingers without my knowing it, I did my work as a machine might do it. The dingy, stinking room, the wan faces of my companions, the scanty meals which I snatched, I saw dimly, as in a dream. The tropics, and Greece, the imaginary battles which I fought, the phantasies into whose mouths I put my thoughts, were real and true to me. They met me when I woke—they floated along beside me as I walked to work—they acted their fantastic dramas before me through the sleepless hours of night. Gradually certain figures among them became familiar—certain personages grew into coherence, as embodiments of those few types of character which had struck me the most, and played an analogous part in every fresh fantasia. Sandy Mackaye's face figured inconspicuously enough as Leonidas, Brutus, a Pilgrim Father, and gradually, in spite of myself and the fear with which I looked on the recurrence of that dream, Lillian's figure re-entered my fairyland. I saved her from a hundred dangers, I followed her through dragon-guarded caverns and the corridors of magic castles. I walked by her side through the forests of the Amazon.

And now I began to crave for some means of expressing these fancies to myself. While they were mere thoughts, parts of me, they were unsatisfactory, however delicious. I longed to put them outside me, that I might look at them and talk to them as permanent, independent things. First I tried to sketch them on the white washed walls of my garret, on scraps of paper begged from Mackaye, or picked up in the workroom. But from my ignorance of any rules of drawing, they were utterly devoid of beauty, and only excited my disgust. Besides, I had thoughts as well as objects to express—thoughts strange, sad, wild, about my own feelings, my own destiny, and drawing could not speak them for me.

Then I turned instinctively to poetry with its rules I was getting rapidly conversant. There were dreams of imitation urged me on, and when I tried, the grace of rhyme and metre covered a thousand defects. I tell my story, not as I saw it then, but as I see it now. A long and lonely voyage, with its monotonous days and sleepless nights—its sickness and heart loneliness—has given me opportunities for analysing my past history which were impossible then, until the ceaseless rush of new images, the ceaseless ferment of their recombination, in which my life was passed from sixteen to twenty-five. The poet, I suppose, must be a seer as long as he is a worker, and a seer only. He has no time to philosophise—to "think about thinking," as Goethe, I have somewhere read, says that he never could do. It is too often only in sickness and prostration and sheer despair, that the hazy vanity and swift digestion of his soul can cease, and give him time to know himself and God's dealings with him, and for that reason it is good for him, too, to have been afflicted.

I do not write all this to boast of it, I am ready to bear snickers at my romance—my day-dreams—my impractical habits of mind, for I know that I deceive them. But such was the appointed growth of my uneducated mind, no more unhealthy a growth, if I am to believe books, than that of many a carefully trained one. High born gentlemen, they tell me, have their idle visions as well as we workmen; and Oxford has seen of late years as wild Imaginations conceived as ever were fathered by a real republic. For, indeed, we have the same flesh and blood, the same God to teach us, the same devil to mislead us, whether we choose to believe it or not. But there were excuses for me. We Londoners are not accustomed from our youth to the poems of a great democratic genius, as the Scotchmen are to their glorious Burns. We have no chance of such an early acquaintance with poetic wit as that which enabled John Bethune, one of the great unrepresented—the starving Scotch day labourer, breaking stones upon the parish roads, to write at the age of seventeen such words as these Hail, hallow'd evening! sacred hour to me!

Thy clouds of grey, thy vocal melody,
Thy deep silence oft to me have brought
A sweet exchange from toil to peaceful thought
Ye purple heavens! how often has my eye,
Wearied with its long gaze on drudgery,
Look'd up and found refreshment in the hues
That gild thy vast with colouring profuse!

O, evening grey! how oft have I admired
Thy airy tenuity, when rich upon thee
The glowing murmur of the olden time
Until their very souls flow'd forth in rhyme
And I have listened, till my spirit grew Familiar with their deathless strains, and drew
From the same source some portion of the glow
Which fill'd their spirits when from earth below
They soared thy golden nothings! And I
Have consecrated thee, bright evening sky,
My fount of inspiration! and I fling
My spirit on thy clouds an offering
To the great Deity of living day,
Who bathed transfigured o'er thee this purple ray

After all, our dreams do little harm to the rich. Those who consider Chartistism as synonymous with devil-worship, should bless and encourage them, for the very reason for which we working men ought to dread them, for, quickened into pious activity by the low, novel, ungering press, they help to excavate and to set all but the noblest minds among us. Here and there a Thomas Cooper, sitting in Stafford gaol, after a youth spent in cobbling shoes, vents his treasures of classical and historical learning in a "Paragon of Suicides," or a prince becomes the poet of the poor, no less for having fed his boyish fancy with "The Arabian Nights" and "The Pilgrim's Progress." But, with the most of us, sedentary and monotonous occupations, as has long been known, create of themselves a morbidly meditative and fantastic turn of mind. And what else, in Heaven's name, ye fine gentlemen what else can a working-man do with his imagination, but dream? What else will you let him do with it, oh ye education pedants, who fancy that you can teach the masses as you would drill soldiers, every soul alike, though you will not bestir yourselves to do even that? Are there no differences of rank—(God's rank, not man's—among us? You have discovered, since your schoolboy days, the fallacy of the old nomenclature which civilly classed us all together as "the snobs," "the blackguards," which even—so strong is habit—tempted Burke himself to talk of us as "the swinish multitude." You are finding yourselves wrong there. A few more years' experience, not in mis-educating the poor, but in watching the poor really educate themselves, may teach you that we are not all by nature dolts and idiots; that there are differences of brain among us, just as great as there is between you, that there are those among us whose education ought not to end, and will not end, with the putting off of the parish cup and liveries, whom it is cruelty, as well as folly, to toss back into the hell of more material drudgery, as soon as you have—if, indeed, you have been even so honestful as that excited in them a new thirst of the intellect and imagination. If you provide that craving with no wholesome food, you at least have no right to blame it if it shall gorge itself with poison.

Dare for once to do a strange thing, and let yourself be laughed at, go to a workman's meeting—a Chartist meeting, if you will, and look honestly at the faces and brows of those so called mechanics, whom your venal caricaturists have taught you to believe a mixture of cur-dog and baboon—we, for our part, shall not be ashamed to show foreheads against your laughing House of Commons—and then say, what employment can those men find in the soulless routine of mechanical labor for the mass of brain which they almost universally possess? They must either dream or agitate, perhaps they are now learning how to do both to some purpose.

But I have found, by sad experience, that there is little use in declamation. I had much better simply tell my story, and leave my readers to judge of the facts, if, indeed, they will be so far courteous as to believe them.

CHAPTER VIII

FOUNT IN A DARK PLACE

So I made my first attempt at poetry—need I say that my subject was the beautiful Lillan? And need I say, too, that I was as utterly disgusted at my attempt to express her in words, as I had been at my trial with the pencil? It chanced also, that after humming out half a dozen verses, I met with Mr. Tennyson's poems, and the unequalled sketches of women that I found there, whither they had, with the rest of the book, a new and abiding influence on my mind, were quite enough to show me my own fatal incompetency in that line. I throw my verses away, never to resume them. Perhaps I perceived thereby the depth of my affection. On mightiest feelings are always those which remain most unspoken. The most intense lovers and the greatest poets have generally, I think, written very little personal love poetry, while they have shown in fictitious characters a knowledge of the passion too painfully intimate to be spoken of in the first person.

But to escape from my own thoughts, I could not help writing something, and to escape from my own private sorrows, writing on some matter with which I had no personal concern. And so, after much casting about for subjects, Childe Harold and the old missionary records contrived to celebrate a spiritual wedding in my brain, of which occasional marriage came a proportionately abundant offspring.

My hero was not to be a pirate, but a pious sea rover, who, with a crew of saints, or at least uncommonly fine fellows, who could be very manly and jolly, and yet all be good Christians of a somewhat vague and Unitarian cast of doctrine (for my own was becoming rapidly so), set forth under the red cross flag to colonise and convert one of my old paradises,—a South Sea Island.

I forgot most of the lines—they were probably great trash, but I hugged them to my bosom as a young mother does her first child.

"Twas sunset to the lone Pacific world,
The rich gleams falling in the western sky,
Within the still lagoon the sails were furled,
The red cross flag alone was flaming high.
Before them was the low and palm-fringed shore,
Behind, the outer ocean a baffled roar.

After which valiant plunge in medium verse, came a great lump of description, after the manner of youths—of the island, and the white houses, and the banana groves, and above all, the single volcano towering over the whole, which,

Shaking a awful Isle with thundering shocks
Reproved the worshippers of stunes and stocks

"Then how a line of foam appears on the Lagoon, which is supposed at first to be a shoal of fish, but turns out to be a troop of naked island beauties, swimming out to the ship. The decent missionaries were certainly guiltless of putting that into my head, whether they ever saw it or not—a great many things happening in the South Seas at which they find it convenient to say nothing. I think I picked it up from Wallis, or Cook, or some other plain-spoken voyager.

The crew gaze in pardonable admiration, but the hero, in a long speech, reproves them for their light-mindedness, reminds them of their sacred mission, and informs them that—

The soldiers of the cross should turn their eyes
From carnal lusts and heathen vanities

Beyond which inimitable assertion I never got, for this being about the fiftieth stanza, I stopped to take breath a little, and reading and re-reading, patching and touching continually, grew so accustomed to my lant lug's face, that, like a mother, I could not tell whether it was handsome or hideous, in sense or nonsense. I have since found out that the true plan, for myself at least, is to write off as much as possible at a time, and then lay it by and forget it for weeks, if I can, for months. After that, on returning to it, the mind regards it as something altogether strange and new, and can, or rather ought to, judge of it as it would of the work of another pen.

But really, between content and disgust, fancying myself one day a great new poet, and the next a mere twaddler, I got so puzzled and anxious, that I determined to pluck up courage, go to Mackaye, and ask him to solve the problem for me.

"Heh, son, poetry! I've been expecting it. I suppose it's the appointed gift of a workman's intellectual life, that some lust of versification. Awel, awel—let's hear."

Blushing and trembling, I read my verses aloud in as resonant and magnificent a voice as I could command. I thought Mackaye's upper lip would never stop quivering on his lower lip protruding. He chuckled intensely at the unfortunate rhyme between "shocks" and "stocks." Indeed it kept him in chuckling matter for a whole month afterwards, but when I had got to the shoal of naked girls, he could bear no more, and burst out—

"What the devil's there in harlotry and idolatry here in England, that ye can grasp cringing after it in the 'Cannibal Islands'! Are ye gonn to be like they poor distressed bodies, that wud sinna be an Hahm dog howl, than an English nightgale sing, and wimma haken to Mr. John Thomas till he calls himself Giovanni 'Ghomassino', or do ye tak' yonself for a singing bird, to go all yon days twiddledumdeeing out into the lift, just for the lust o' being yon an' clan chatter? Will ye be a man or a hintie? 'Coral Islands' Pacific! What do ye ken about Pacifics? Are ye a Cockney or a Cambridged Islander? Dinna stand there, ye gowk, as fastidious as a docken, but tell me thit Where do ye live?"

"What do you mean, Mr. Mackaye?" asked I, with a doleful and disappointed visage.

"Mean why, if God had meant ye to write about Pacifics, He'd ha put ye there—and because He means ye to write about London town He's put ye there—and given ye an aften sharp taste o' the ways o' it, and I'll gie ye another. Come along wi' me."

And he seized me by the arm, and hastily giving me time to put on my hat, marched me out into the streets, and away through Chancery Market to St. Giles's.

It was a foul, chilly, foggy Saturday night. From the butchers' and greengrocers' shops the gaslights flared and flickered, wild and ghastly, over haggard groups of shipshod duty women, bargaining for scraps of stale meat and frost-bitten vegetables, wrangling about short weight and bad quality. Fishstalls and fruit stalls hued the edge of the grassy pavement, sending up odours as foul as the language of sellers and buyers. Blood and sewer-water crawled from under doors and out of spouts, and reeked down the gutters among offal, animal and vegetable, in every stage of putrefaction. Foul vapours rose from cowsheds and slaughter-houses, and the doorways of undrained alleys, where the inhabitants carried the filth out on their shoes from the back-yard into the court, and from the court up into the main street, while above, hanging like chills over the streets—those narrow, howling torrents of filth, and poverty, and sin—the houses with their teeming hail of life were piled up into the dingy cho—night. A ghastly, deafening, sickening sight it was. Go, scented Bol Giovanni! and see what London is! and then go to the library which God has given thee—no often fears in vain—and see what science says this London might be!

"Ay," he muttered to himself, as he strode along, "sing awa, get yourself wi' child wi' pretty fancies and gair' words, like the rest of the poets, and gang to hell for it."

"To hell, Mr. Mackaye?"

"Ay, to a vera real hell, Alton Locke, hullo—a worse one than any hells' kitchen, or subterranean in Smithfield that ye'll hear o' in the pulpits—the hell on earth o' being a Banker, and a humbug, and a useless peacock, wasting God's gifts on your ain lusts and pleasures—and kenning it—and not being able to get out o' it, for the chains o' vanity and self-indulgence. I've warned ye. Now, look there—"

He stopped suddenly before the entrance of a miserable alley—

"Look! there's not a soul down that yard but's either beggar, drunkard, thief, or worse. Write about that! Say how ye saw the mouth o' hell, and the twa pillars thereof at the entry—the pawnbroker's shop o' one side and the gin palace at the other—twae monstrous devils, eating up men, and women, and bairns, body and soul. Look at the jaws o' the monsters, how they open and open, and swallow in another victim and another. Write about that."

"What jaws, Mr. Mackaye?"

"They faulding-doors o' the gin-shop, gouse. Are na they a mair dunnable man-devouring na than any red-hot statue Moloch, or wicker Gogmagog, wherein the auld Britons burnt their prisoners? Look at these barefooted, bare-backed hizzies, with their arms round the men's necks, and their mouths full o' vitriol and beastly words. Look at that Irishwoman pouring the gin down the babbie's throat. Look at that rail o' a boy gaun out o' the pawnshop, where he's been pilking the handkerchief he stole i' the morning, into the gin-shop, to buy beer poisoned wi' grains o' paradise, and cocculus indicus, and nut, and a dunnable, maddenin', thirst-breeding, lust-breeding drugs!

Look at that girl that went in wi' a shawl on her back and cam' out wi'out ane! Drunkards frae the breasts—harlots frae the cradle!—damned before they're born! John Calvin had an inkling o' the truth there, I'm a'most driven to think, wi' his reprobation devil's doctrines!"

"Will—but—Mr. Mackaye, I know nothing about these poor creatures."

"Then ye ought. What do ye ken about the Pacht? Which is, maist to your business?—thae bare-backed hizzies that play the harlot o' the other side o' the world, or these—these thousands o' bare-backed hizzies that play the harlot o' your ain side—made out o' your ain flesh and blude? You a poet! True poetry, like true charity, my laddie, begins at home. If ye'll be a poet at a', ye mair be a Cockney poet, and while the Cockneys be what they be, ye mair write, like Jeremiah of old, a' lamentation, and mourning, and woe, for the sins o' your people. Gin ye want to learn the spirit o' a people's poet, down wi' your Bible and read thae auld Hebrew prophets, gin ye wad learn the style, read your Burns frae morning till night; and gin ye'd learn the matter, just gang after your nose, and keep your eyes open, and ye'll no miss it."

"But all this is so—so unpoetical!"

"Hush! Is there na the heaven above them there, and the hell beneath them? and God frowning, and the devil grinning? No poetry that! Is no the vera idea of the classic tragedy defined to be, man conquered by circumstances? Canna ye see it there? And the vera idea of the modern tragedy, man conquering circumstances?—and I'll show ye that, too—in many a garret where no eye but the good God's enters, to see the patience, and the fortitude, and the self-sacrifice, and the love stronger than death, that's shining in thae dark places o' the earth. Come wi' me, and see."

We went on through a back street or two, and then into a large, miserable house, which, a hundred years ago, perhaps, had witnessed the luxury, and mingled to the laughter of some one great fashionable family, alone there in their glory. Now every room of it held its family, or its group of families—a phalanx of all the fiends!—its grand staircase, with the carved balustrades rotting and crumbling away piecemeal, converted into a common sewer for all its inmates. Up stair after stair we went, while wails of children, and curses of men, steamed out upon the hot stifling rush of air from every doorway, till, at the topmost story, we knocked at a garret door. We entered. Bare it was of furniture, comfortless, and freezing cold; but, with the exception of the plaster dropping from the roof, and the broken windows patched with rags and paper, there was a scrupulous neatness about the whole, which, contrasted strangely with the filth and slovenliness outside. There was no bed in the room—no table. On a broken chair by the chimney sat a miserable old woman, fancying that she was warming her hands over embers which had long been cold, shaking her head, and rattling to herself with palsied lips about the guardians and the workhouse; while upon a few rags on the floor lay a girl, ugly, small-pox marked, hollow eyed, emaciated, her only bedclothes the skirt of a large band-some new riding habit, at which two other girls, wan and tawdry, were still lunging busily, as they sat right and left of her on the floor. The old woman took no notice of us as we entered, but one of the girls looked up, and, with a pleased gesture of recognition, put her finger up to her lips, and whispered, "Ellen's asleep."

"I'm not asleep, dems," answered a faint, uncertainly voice, "I was only praying 'Is that Mr. Mackaye?'"

"Ay, my lassie, but ha' ye gotten na fire the night?"

"No," said one of them, bitterly, "we've earned no fire to night, by fair trade or foul either."

The sick girl tried to raise herself up and speak, but was stopped by a frightful fit of coughing and expectation, as painful, apparently, to the sufferer as it was, I confess, disgusting even to me.

I saw Mackaye slip something into the hand of one of the girls, and whisper, "A half hundred of souls," to which she replied with an eager look of gratitude that I never can forget, and hurried out. Then the sufferer, as if taking advantage of her absence, began to speak quickly and eagerly.

"Oh, Mr. Mackaye - dear, kind Mr. Mackaye - do speak to her, and do speak to poor Lizzy here! I'm not afraid to say it before her, because she's more gentle like, and hasn't learnt to say bad words yet - but do speak to them, and tell them not to go the bad way, like all the rest. Tell them I'll never prosper. I know it is want that drives them to it, as it drives all of us - but tell them it's best to starve and the honest girls, than to go about with the shame and the curse of God on their hearts, for the sake of keeping this poor, miserable, vile body together a few short years more in this world o' sorrow. Do tell them, Mr. Mackaye."

"I'm thinking," said he, with the tears running down his old, withered face, "ye'll mak' a better preacher at that text than I shall, Ellen."

"Oh no, no, who am I, to speak to them? - 'tis no merit o' mine, Mr. Mackaye, that the Lord's kept me pure through it all. I should have been just as bad as any of them, if the Lord had not kept me out of temptation, in His great mercy, by making me the poor, ill-favored creature I am. From that time I was burnt when I was a child, and had the small pox after wards, oh! how sinful I was, and I pinned and rebelled against the Lord!" And now I see it was all His blessed mercy to keep me out of evil, pure and unspotted for my dear Jesus, when He comes to take me to Himself. I saw him last night, Mr. Mackaye, as plain as I see you now, all in a flame of beautiful white fire, smiling at me so sweetly, and He showed me the wounds in His hands and His feet, and He said, "Ellen, my own child, those that suffer with me here, they shall be glorified with me hereafter, for I'm coming very soon to take you home."

Sandy shook his head at all this with a strange expression of face, as if he sympathized and yet disagreed, respected and yet smiled at the shape which her religious ideas had assumed, and I remarked to the meantime that the poor girl's neck and arm were all scoured and distorted, apparently from the effects of a burn.

"Ah," said Sandy, at length, "I tauld ye ye were the better preacher of the two, ye've more comfort to gie Sandy than he has to gie the like o' ye. But how is the wound in your back the day?"

Oh, it was wonderfully better! the doctor had come and given her such blessed ease with a great tank leather he had put under it, and then she did not feel the boards through so much. "But oh, Mr. Mackaye, I'm so afraid it will make me live longer to keep me away from my dear Saviour. And there's one thing, too, that's breaking my heart, and making me long to die this very minute, even if I didn't go to Heaven at all, Mr. Mackaye." (And she burst out crying, and between her sobs it came out, as well as I could gather, that her notion was, that her illness was the cause of keeping the girls in "the bad way," as she called it.) "For Lizzy here, I did hope that she had repented of it after all my talking to her, but since I've been so bad, and the girls have had to keep me most o' the time, she's gone out of nights just as bad as ever."

Lizzy had laid her face in her hands the greater part of this speech. Now she looked up passionately, almost fiercely.

"Repent - I have repented - I repent of it every hour - I hate myself, and hate all the world because of it, but I must - I must. I cannot see her starve, and I cannot starve myself. When she first fell sick she kept on as long as she could, doing what she could, and then between us we only earned three shillings a week, and there was ever so much to take off for fire, and twopenny for the rent, and twopenny for candles, and then we were always getting fined, because they never gave us out the work till too late, on purpose, and then they lowered prices again, and now Ellen can't work at all, and there's four of us with the old lady, to keep off two's work that couldn't keep themselves alone."

"Doesn't the parish allow the old lady anything?" I ventured to ask.

"They used to allow half a crown for a bit, and the doctor ordered Ellen things from the parish, but it wasn't half o' 'em she ever got, and when the meat came, it was half times not fit to eat, and when it was, her stomach turned against it. If she was a lady she'd be cockered up with all sorts of soups and jellies, and nice things, just the minute she fancied 'em, and lie on a water bed instead of the bare floor—and she ought, but where's the parish 'll do that? And the hospital wouldn't take her in because she was incurable, and, besides, the old m' wouldn't let her go—not into the union neither. When she's in a good humour like, she'll sit by her by the hour, holding her hand and kissing of it, and nursing of it for all the world like a doll. But she won't hear of the workhouse, so now, these last three weeks, they takes off all her pay, because they says she must go into the house, and not kill her daughter by keeping her out—as if they want a killing her themselves."

"No workhouse—no workhouse!" said the old woman, turning round suddenly, in a clear, lofty voice. "No workhouse, su, for an officer's daughter."

And she relapsed into her stupor.

At that moment the other girl entered with the coals—but without staying to light the fire, ran up to Ellen with some tumpety duntty she had bought, and tried to persuade her to eat it.

"We have been telling Mr Mackaye everything," said poor Tazzy.

"A pleasant story, isn't it? Oh! if that tin. Truly, as we're making that riding-habit for, would just spare only half the money that goes in dressing her up to ride in the park, to send us out to the colonies, wouldn't I be an honest girl there—maybe an honest man's wife! Oh! my God! wouldn't I save my fingers to the bone for him! Wouldn't I mend my life tiffen! I couldn't help it—it would be like getting into heaven out of hell. But now—we must—we must—I tell you I shall go mad soon, I think, or take to drink. When I passed the gin shop down there just now, I had to run like mad for fear I should go in—and if I once took to that—Now then to work again. Make up the fire, Miss * * * *, please do!"

And she sat down and began stitching frantically at the riding habit, from which the other girl had hardly lifted her hands or eyes for a moment during our visit.

We made a motion as if to go.

"God bless you," said Ellen; "come again soon, dear Mr Mackaye."

"Good bye," said the chier girl, "and good night to you. Night and day's all the same here—we must have this home by even o'clock to-morrow morning. My lady's gang to ride early they say, whoever she may be, and we must just sit up all night. It's often we haven't had one a week together, from four in the morning till two the next morning sometime still! Still, still! 'Somebody's' wrote about that—I'll learn to do it'll sound fitting like, up here."

"Better sing hymns," said Ellen.

"Hymns for * * * * *" answered the other, and then burst into a peculiar wild, ringing, and fiendish laugh—has my reader never heard it?

I pulled out the two or three shillings which I possessed, and tried to make the girls take them, for the sake of poor Ellen.

"No, you're a working-man, and we won't feel on you—you'll want it some day—all the trade's going the same way as we, as fast as ever it can!"

Sandy and I went down the stairs.

"Poetic element! You lassie, rejoicing in her dishonourment and not her beauty, like the miss of Peterborough in auld time, —is there na poetry there? That poor lassie, dying on the bare boards and seeing her Saviour in her dreams, is there na poetry there, callant? That auld body owie the fire, wi' her 'an officer's dochter,' is there na poetry there? That ither, prostituting herself to buy food for her freen—is there na poetry there?—tragedy?"

'With hues as when some mighty painter dips
His pen in dyes of earthquake and eclipse.'

Ay, Shelley's gran', always gran', but Frost is grander—God and Satan are grander. All around ye, in every gin shop and costermonger's cellar, are God and Satan at death-grips, every garret is a hell or Paradise. Last of Paradise regained—and will ye think it beneath ye to be the 'People's Poet'?"

CHAPTER IX

POETRY AND POETS.

IN the history of individuals, as well as in that of nations, there is often a period of sudden blossoming—a short luminous summer, not without its tornadoes and thunder-gleams, in which all the best seeds of past observation leap forth together into life, and form, and beauty. And such with me were the two years that followed. I thought—I talked poetry to myself all day long. I wrote nightly on my return from work. I am astonished, on looking back, at the variety and quantity of my productions during that short time. My subjects were intentionally and professedly Cockney ones. I had taken Mackaye at his word. I had made up my mind, that if I had any poetic power, I must do my duty therewith in that station of life to which it had pleased God to call me, and look at everything simply and faithfully as a London artisan. To this, I suppose, is to be attributed the little variety and originality for which the public have kindly praised my verses,—a grandeur which sprang not from the atmosphere whence I drew, but from the honesty and single-mindedness with which, I hope, I laboured. Not from the atmosphere, indeed —that was ungemal enough; crime and poverty, all-devouring competition, and hopeless struggles against Mammon and Moloch, amid the roar of wheels, the ceaseless stream of pile, hard faces, intent on gain, or brooding over woe, and endless prison-walls of brick, beneath a lurid, crushing sky of smoke and mist. It was a dark, noisy, thunderous element, that London life, a troubled sea that could not rest, casting up noise and dirt, resonant of the clanking of chains, the grinding of remorseless machinery, the wail of lost spirits from the pit. And it did its work upon me, it gave a gloomy coloring, a glare as of some Dantean "Inferno," to all my utterances. It did not excite me, or make me fierce—I was too much inured to it—but it crushed and subdued me, it deepened in me that peculiar melan choly of intellectual youth, which Mr. Carlyle has christened forever by one of his momentary nicknames, "Weltschmerz." I buttoned on my own melancholy. I believed, I loved to believe, that every face I passed bore the traces of discontent as deep as was my own—and was I so far wrong? Was I so far wrong either in the gloomy tone of my own poetry? Should not a London poet's work just now be to cry, like the Jew of old, about the walls of Jerusalem—"Woe, woe to this city!" Is this a time to listen to the voices of singing men and singing women? or to cry, "Oh, that my heart were a fountain of tears, that I might weep for the sins of my people!" Is it not unbecomingly, also, that it is in this vein that the London poets have always been greatest? Which of poor Hood's lyrics have an equal chance of immortality with "The Song of the Shirt" and "The Bridge of Sighs," among, as they do, right out of the depths of that Inferno, sublime from their very sympathy? Which of Charles Mackay's lyrics can compare for a moment with the Eschylean grandeur, the terrible rhythmic lilt of his "Cholera Chant"?—

"Dance on the stream the vapours lay,
Thick as wool on the cold highway,
Spongy and slim each hoary lump,
Shone over the street so dull and damp,
The monotonous mild not pierce the cloud
That swathed the city like a shroud
There stood three shapes on the bridge alone,
Three figures by the cooling stone,
Gaunt and tall and undefined,
Specter blith of mist and wind

"I see his footmarks east and west—
He's a little bit of a poet,
He's a little bit of a poet,
He's a little bit of a poet,
Were men as wise as men might be,
They would not work for you, for me,
For him that cometh over the sea,
But they will not hear the warning voice
The children come—He's a little bit of a poet,
He shall be lord of the swarming town,
And mow them down, and mow them down!"

Not that I neglected, on the other hand every means of extending the wanderings of my spirit into sunnier and more verdant pathways. If I had to tell the gay ones above of the gloom around me, I had also to go forth into the sunshine to bring home if it were but a wild flower guland to those that sat in darkness and the shadow of death. That was all that I could offer them. The reader shall judge, when he has read this book throughout, whether I did not at last find for them something better than even all the beauties of Nature.

But it was on canvas, and not among realities, that I had to choose my garlands, and herein the picture galleries became more than ever my favorite haunt, I was going to say, but, alas! it was not six times a year that I got access to them. Still, when once every May I found myself, by dint of a hard saved shilling, actually within the walls of that, to me, enchanted palace, the Royal Academy Exhibition. Oh, ye rich! who gaze round you at will upon your prints and pictures, if hunger is, as they say, a better teacher than any Ule invents, and fasting itself may become the handmaid of luxury, you should spend, as I did perform, weeks and months shut out from every glimpse of Nature, if you would taste her beauties even on canvas, with perfect richness and childish self-abandonment. How I loved and like those painters! how I thanked Christ for very transparent, shink-chimmed pool, holding for every rain cloud down, Cooper, for every knot of quiet cattle beneath the cool, grey willows, Stanfield, for every snowy peak, and sheet of foam-fringed supphur—each and everyone of them a leaf out of the magic book which else was ever closed to me. Again, I say, how I loved and blest those painters! On the other hand, I was not neglecting to read as well as to write poetry, and, to speak first of the highest, I know no book, always excepting Milton, which at once so quickened and excited my poetical view of man and his hisory, as that great prose poem, the single epic of modern days, Thomas Carlyle's "French Revolution." Of the general effect which his works had on me, I shall say nothing. It was the same as they have had, thank God, on thousands of my class and of every other. But that book above all first recalled me to the overwhelming and yet counseling knowledge that there was such thing as Duty, to teach me to see in history not the mere farcical tragedy of man's crimes and follies, but the dealings of a righteous Ruler of the universe, whose ways are in the great deep, and whom the sins and errors, as well as the virtues and discoveries of man, must obey and justify.

Then, in a happy day, I fell on Alfred Tennyson's poetry, and found there, astonished and delighted, the embodiment of thoughts about the earth around me which I had conceived because I fancied them peculiar to myself. Why is it that the latest poet has generally the greatest influence over the minds of the young? Surely not for the mere claim of novelty? The reason is, that he, living amid the same hopes, the same temptations, the same sphere of observation as they, gives niterance and outward form to the very questions which, vague and wordless, have been exercising their hearts. And what endeared Tennyson especially to me, the working man, was, as I afterwards discovered, the altogether democratic tendency of his poems. True, all great poets are by their other democrats, seers of man only as man, singers of the joys, the sorrows, the aspirations common to all humanity, but in Alfred Tennyson there is an element especially democratic, truly levelling, not his political opinions, about which I know nothing, and care less, but his handling of the trivial every-day sights and sounds of Nature brought up as I understand, in a part of England which possesses not much of the picturesque and nothing of that which the vulgar call sublime, he is leant to see thit in all Nature, in the hedgerow and the sand-hank, as well as in the alp-peak and the ocean waste, is a world of true sublimity, — a minute infinite, — an over-fertile garden of poetic images, the roots of which are in the unfathomable and the eternal, as truly as any phenomena which astonishes and awes thit ye. The descriptions of the desolate pools and creeks where the dying swin floated, the hint of the silvery marsh mosses by Mamma's mead, came to me like revelations. I always knew there was something beautiful, wonderful, sublime, in those flowery dykes of Battersea Fields, in the long gravelly sweep of that lone tidil shore, and here was a man who had put them into words for me! This is what I call democratic — the revelation of the poetry which lies in common things. And surely all the age is tending in that direction — in Landseer and his dogs — in Fielding and his downs with a host of noble fellow-artists — and in all authors who have really seized the nation's mind, from Crabbe and Burns, and Wordsworth, to Hood and Dickens, the great tide sets ever onward, outward, towards that which is common to the many, not that which is exclusive to the few — towards the likeness of Him who causes His rain to fall on the just and on the unjust, and His sun to shine on thit evil and the good, who knoweth the crittle upon a thousand hills, and all the beasts of the field are in His sight.

Well — I must return to my story. And here someone may ask me, "But did you not find this true spiritual democracy, this universal knowledge and sympathy, in Shakespeare whae all other poets?" It may be my shame to have to confess it, but though I find it now, I did not then. I do not think, however, my case is singular from what I can ascertain, there is even with regularly educated minds a period of life at which that great writer is not appreciated, just on account of his very greatness, on account of the deep and large experience which the true understanding of his plays requires — experience of man, of history, of art, and above all of those sorrows whereby, as Hazekiah says, and as I have learnt almost too well — "whereby men live, and in all which is the life of the spirit." At seventeen, indeed, I had devoured Shakespeare, though merely for the food to my fancy which his plots and incidents supplied, for the gorgeous colouring of his scenery; but at the period of which I am now writing, I had exhausted that source of mere pleasure, I was craving for more explicit and dogmatic teaching than any which he seemed to supply, and for three years, strange as it may appear, I hardly ever looked into his pages. Under what circumstances I afterwards returned to his exhaustless treasures, my readers shall in due time be told.

So I worked away manfully with such tools and stock as I possessed, and of course produced, at first, like all young writers, some sufficiently servile imitations of my favourite poets.

"Fie!" said Sandy, "wha wants mon gels atween Burns and Tennyson? A guid stock birth, but gi' ye'd cross the braid ye in munnle the squits, and no the manner, o' the men. Wha munn ilk a one the noo stile his neebor's harness before he glints out o' windows? Mak' a style for yoncel, laddie, ye're na man Scotch him than ye are Lancashire him, see ging ye an gate and leave them to ging thurs, and just mak' a gran', brode, simple Saxon style for yours!"

"But how can I, till I know what sort of a style it ought to be?"

"Oh! but yeon's amazing like Foin Sheulan's answer to his father. 'Tom,' says the auld man, 'I'm thinking ye munn tak' a wife.' 'Verri wel, father,' says the puer skellam, 'and wha's wife shall I tak'?' 'Wha's style shall I tak'?' say all the oddunts the noo. Mak' a style as ye would mak' a wife, by marrying her a' to yoncel', and ye'll mune munn ken what's your style till it's made, than ye'll ken what your wife's like till she's been mony a year by your milt."

"My dear Mackaye," I said, "you have the most unmerciful way of jussing difficulties, and then leaving poor fellows to lay the ghost for themselves."

"Hech, then, I'm a'thogither a negative teacher, as they ca' it, than the new lallans. I'll gang out o' my gate to tell a man his kye are laired, but I'm no obligate thereto to pu' them out for him. After a', nae man is rid o' a difficulty till he's conquered it single-handed for himself. And a, I'm nae poet, munn s the guide hap for you."

"Why, then?"

"Och, och! they're puer, fockless, cfabbat, unpractical hodies, they poets. But if it's yon doom, ye munn dree it; and I'm sair aford ye ha' gottin the disense o' genius, mair's the pity, and maun writo, I suppose, willy-nilly. Some's folks hoodels are that made o' catgut, that they canna star without charruping and serocking."

However, astro percutus, I wrote on, and in about two years and a half had got to gether "Songs of the Highway," enough to fill a small octavo volume, the circumstances of whose birth shall be given hereafter. Whether I ever attained to anything like an original style, readers must judge for themselves—the readers of the said volume, I mean, for I have inserted none of those poems in this, my autobiography, first, because it seems too like pulling my own works, and next, because I do not want to injure the as yet not over-giant sale of the same. But, if anyone's emotion is so far excited that he wishes to see what I have accomplished, the best advice which I can give him is, to go forth and buy all the working men's poetry which has appeared during the last twenty years, without favour or exception, among which he must needs, of course, find mine, and also, I am happy to say, a great deal which is much better and more instructive than mine.

CHAPTER X.

HOW FOLK TURN CHARTISTS.

THOSE who read my story only for amusement, I advise to skip this chapter. Those, on the other hand, who really wish to ascertain what working-men actually do suffer—to see whether their political discontent has not its roots, not merely in fanciful ambition, but in misery and slavery most real and agonising—those in whose eyes the accounts of a system, or rather inhuman absence of all system, which involves starvation, nakedness, prostitution, and long imprisonment in dungeons worse than the cells of the Inquisition, will be invested with something at least of tragic interest, may, I hope, think it worth their while to learn how the clothes which they wear are made, and to listen to a few occasional statistics, which, though they may seem to the wealthy mere lists of dull figures, are to the workmen symbols of terrible physical realities—of hunger, degradation, and despair.

Well, one day our employer died. He had been one of the old sort of fashionable West-End tailors in the fast decreasing honourable trade, keeping a modest shop, hardly to be distinguished from a dwelling-house, except by his name on the window blinds. He paid good prices for work, though not as good, of course, as he had given twenty years before, and pinned himself upon having all his work done at home. His workrooms, as I have said, wore no Elysiums, but still as good, alas! as those of three tailors out of four. He was proud, luxurious, foppish, but he was honest and kindly enough, and did many a generous thing by men who had been long in his employ. At all events, his journeyman could live on what he paid them.

But his son, succeeding to the business, determined like Rehoboam of old, to go a-head with the times. Fined with the great spirit of the nineteenth century—at least with that one which is vulgarly considered its especial glory—he resolved to make it so to be rich. His father had made money very slowly of late. While dozens, who had begun business long after him, had now retired to luxurious ease and suburban villas. Why should he remain in the minority? Why should he not get rich as fast as he could? Why should he stick to the old, slow-going, honourable trade? Out of some 450 West-End tailors, there were not one hundred left who were old-fashioned and stupid enough to go on keeping down their own profits by having all their work done at home and at first-hand. Honourable scruples! The Government knew none such. Were not the army clothes, the post-office clothes, the policeman's clothes, furnished by contractors and sweatshops, who hired the work at low prices, and let it out again to journeyman at still lower ones? Why should he pay his men two shillings where the Government paid them one? Were there not cheap houses even at the West End, which had saved several thousands a year merely by reducing their workmen's wages? And if the workmen chose to take lower wages, he was not bound actually to make them a present of more than they asked for! They would go to the cheapest market for anything they wanted, and so must he. Besides, wages had really been quite exorbitant. Half his men threw each of them as much money away in gin and beer yearly, as would pay two workmen at a cheap house. Why was he to be robbing his family of comforts to pay for their extravagance? And charging his customers, too, unnecessarily high prices—it was really robbing the public!

Such, I suppose, were some of the arguments which led to an official announcement, one Saturday night, that our young employer intended to enlarge his establishment, for the purpose of commencing business in the "show trade," and that, emulous of Messrs Aaron, Levi, and the rest of that class, magnificent alterations were to take place in the premises, to make room for which our workrooms were to be demolished, and that for that reason—for of course it was only for that reason—all work would in future be given out, to be made up at the men's own homes.

* Facts still worse than those which Mr Locke's story contains have been made public by the Morning Chronicle in a series of noble letters on "Labour and the Poor," which we entreat all Christian people to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest. "That will be better for them," as Mahomet, in similar cases, used to say.

Our employer's arguments, if they were such as I suppose, were reasonable enough according to the present code of commercial morality. But strange to say, the auditory, inaudible to the delight with which the public would view the splendid architectural improvements with taste too grovelling to appreciate the glories of plate glass shop fronts and large scroll work—too selfish to rejoice, for its own sake, in the beauty of arabesques and chandeliers, which, though they never might behold, the astonished public would with souls too niggardly to leap for joy at the thought that gents would henceforth buy the registered gaudy vest, and the perfect classic cream seasonless pale top hat a crown cheaper than ever—or that needy noblemen would pay three pounds ten, instead of five pounds, for their footmen's liveries—received the words, eldritch as they were, in sullen silence, and actually, when they got into the street, broke out in to-morrows, perhaps into execrations.

"Silence!" said Crossthwaite, "wills have us—come down to the nearest house of call, and talk it out like men, instead of gawling in the street, like fish-fags."

So down we went. Crossthwaite, taking my arm, staid on in moody silence—once muttering to himself bitterly, —

"Oh yes, all right and natural! What can the little sharks do but follow the big ones?"

We took a room, and Crossthwaite coolly saw us all in, and locking the door, stood with his back against it.

"Now then, mind, 'One and all,' as the Corn-lawmen say, and no peaching. If any man is scandalous enough to carry tales, I'll —"

"Do what?" asked Jimmy Dawnes, who had settled himself on the table with a pipe and a pot of porter. "You and the King of the L'indal Islands, as I know of, to cut a corner out of?"

"No, but if a poor man's prayer can bring God's curse down upon a traitor's head—it may stay on his rascally shoulders till it rots."

"If its soul was pots and pans—look at Sheela's bones, that sold penknives in the street six months ago, now a raving in his own carriage, all along of turning sweater. If God's curse is like that I'll be happy to take any man's share of it."

Some new idea seemed twinkling in the fellow's cunning idiotic face as he spoke. I, and others also, shuddered at his words, but we all forgot them a moment afterwards, as Crossthwaite began to speak.

"We were all bound to expect this Every working tailor must come to this at last, on the present system, and we are only lucky in having been spared so long. You all know where this will end—in the same misery as fifteen thousand out of twenty, thousand of our class are enduring now. We shall become the slaves, often the bodily prisoners, of Jews, maddlemen, and swelters, who draw their livelihood out of our starvation. We shall have to face, as the next have, ever decreasing prices of labour, ever-increasing profits made out of that labour by the contractors who will employ us—arbitrary fines, inflicted at the caprice of henchlings—the competition of women, and children, and starving Irish—our hours of work will increase one-third, our actual pay decrease to less than one half, and in all this we shall have no hope, no chance of improvement in wages, but ever more penury, slavery, misery, as we are pressed on by those who are sucked by tithe—almost by hundreds yearly, out of the honourable trade in which we were brought up, into the infernal system of contract work, which is devouring our trade and many others, body and soul. Our wives will be forced to sit up night and day to help us—our children must labour from the cradle without chance of going to school, hardly of breathing the fresh air of Heaven—our boys, as they grow up, must turn beggars or paupers—our daughters, as thousands do, must eke out their miserable earnings by prostitution. And after all, a whole family will not gain what one of us had been doing, as yet, single handed. You know there will be no hope for us. There is no use appealing to Government or Parliament. I don't want to talk politics here. I shall keep them for another place. But you can collect as we as I can, when a deputation of us went up to a member of Parliament—one that was reputed a philosopher, and a political economist, and a liberal—and set before him the ever-increasing pauperism and misery of our trade and of those connected with it, you recollect his answer—that, however glad he would be to help us, it was impossible—he could not alter the laws of nature that wages were regulated by the amount of competition among the men themselves, and that it was no business of Government, or anyone else, to interfere in contracts between the employer and employed, that those things regulated themselves by the laws of political economy, which it was madness and suicide to oppose. He may have been a wise man. I only know that he was a rich one. Everyone speaks well of the bridge which carries him over. Everyone favours the laws which fill his pockets to be God's laws. But I say this: If neither Government nor members of Parliament can help us, we must help ourselves. Help yourselves, and Heaven will help you. Combination among ourselves is the only chance. One thing we can do—sit still."

"And starve?" said someone.
"Yes, and starve! Better starve than sit still—say, it is a to give me, to the system. It is a sin to add our weight to the crowd of citizens who are now choking and strangling each other to death, as the prisoners did in the Black Hole of Calcutta. Let those who will, turn beasts of prey, and feed upon their fellows, but let us at least keep ourselves pure. It may be the law of political civilisation, the law of nature, that the rich should eat up the poor, and the poor eat up each other. Then I here rise up and curse that law, that civilisation, that nature. Either I will destroy them, or they shall destroy me. As a slave, as an incarcerated labourer on my fellow-sufferers, I will not live. So help me God! I will take no work home to my house, and I call upon everyone here to combine, and to sign protest to that effect."

"What's the use of that, my good Mr. Crosshwaite?" interrupted someone, quietly. "Don't you know what came of the strike a few years ago when this price and sweating came in? The masters made fine promises and never kept 'em, and the men who stood out had their places filled up with poor devils who were glad enough to take the work at any price—just as ours will be. There's no use kicking against the pricks. All the rest have come to it, and so must we. We must live some how, and half a loaf is better than no bread, and even that half loaf will go into other men's mouths, if we don't stir up at it at once. Besides, we must force others to strike. We may strike and starve ourselves, but what's the use of a dozen striking out of 20,000?"

"Will you sign the protest, gentlemen, or not?" asked Crosshwaite, in a determined voice.

Some half dozen said they would, if the others would.

"And the others won't. Well, after all, one man must take full responsibility, and I am that man. I will sign the protest by myself. I will sweep a sweeping—I will turn cross gatherer, rag picker, I will starve myself, and see my wife starve with me, but do the wrong thing I will not! The Cause wants martyrs. If I must be one, I must."

All this while my mind had been under going a strange perturbation. The notion of escaping that infernal workroom and the company I met there—of taking my work home, and thereby, as I hoped, gaining more time for study—at least, having my head on the spot roundly at every odd moment, was most enticing. I had hailed the proposed change as a blessing to me, till I heard Crosshwaite's arguments; not that I had not known the facts before, but it had never struck me till then that it was a real sin against my class to make myself a party in the system by which they were allowing themselves (under temptation enough, God knows) to be enslaved. But now I looked with horror on the gulf of poverty before me, into the vortex of which not only I, but my whole trade, seemed irresistibly sucked. I thought with shame and remorse of the few shillings which I had earned at various times by taking piecework home, to buy my candles for study. I whispered my doubts to Crosshwaite as he sat, pale and determined, watching the excited and querulous discussions among the other workmen.

"What? So you expect to have time to read? Study, after sixteen hours a day stitching? Study, when you cannot earn money enough to keep you from wasting and shrinking away day by day? Study, with your heart full of shame and indignation, fresh from daily insult and injustice? Study, with the black bond of despair and poverty in front of you? Little time, or little strength will you have to study, if you are making the same coats you make now, at half the price."

I put my name down beneath Crosshwaite's on the paper which he handed me, and went out with him.

"Ay," he muttered to himself, "be slaves—what you are worthy to be, that you will be! You are not combing your hair, not starving, you are not idle, and therefore you are not free. Oh! for six hundred men like Barabbas's Marseillais—who knew how to die!"

"Surely, Crosshwaite, if matters were properly represented to the Government, they would not, for their own existence sake, to put conscience out of the question, allow such a system to continue growing."

"Government? Government? You are a tailor, and not know that Government are the very authors of this system!" Not to know that they first set the example by getting the army and navy clothes made by contractors, and taking the lowest tenders! No to know that the police clothes, the postman's clothes, the convicts' clothes, are all contracted for on the infamous plan by sweaters, and sweaters' sweaters, and sweaters' sweaters' sweaters, till Government work is just a long list of lowest resort to which a poor starved out wretch betakes himself to keep body and soul together! Why, the Government prices, in almost every department, are half, and less than half, the very lowest living price. I tell you, the senseless iniquity of Government at these things will come out some day. It will be known, the whole abomination, and future generations will curse it with the tyrannies of the Roman emperors and the Norm barons. Why, it is a fact, that the colonels of the regiments—noblemen most of them—make their own vile profit out of us tailors—out of the pauperism of the men, the slavery of the children, the prostitution of the women. They get so much a uniform allowed them by Government to clothe the men with, and then—then, they let out the jobs to the contractors at less than half what Government give them, and pocket the difference. And then you talk of appealing to (Government)!"

"Upon my word," I said, bitterly, "we tailors seem to owe the army a double grudge. They not only keep under other artisans, but they help to starve us first, and then shoot us, if we complain too loudly."

"Oh ho! your blood's getting up, is it? Then your in the humor to be told what you have been hankering to know so long—where Mackaye and I go at night. We'll strike while the non's hot, and go down to the Chartist meeting at * * * * *

"Parlon me, my dear fellow, I said. "I cannot bear the thought of being mixed up in conspiracy—join up in revolt and bloodshed. Not that I am afraid. Heaven knows, I am not. But I am too much harassed, miserable, already. I see too much wretchedness around me, to lend my aid in increasing the sum of suffering, by a single atom, among rich and poor, even by righteous vengeance."

"Conspiracy! Bloodshed! What has that to do with the Charter? It suits the venal Maimonite press well enough to jubilate them together, and cry 'Murder, rape, and robbery,' whenever the six points are mentioned, but they know, and every man of common sense ought to know, that the Charter is just as much an open political question as the Reform Bill, and ten times as much as Magna Charta was, when it got passed. What have the six points, right or wrong, to do with the question whether they can be obtained by moral force, and the pressure of opinion alone, or require what we call ultra necessities to get them acquired? Come along!"

So with him I went that night.

"Well, Alton! where was the treason and murder? Your nose must have been a sharp one, to smell out any there. Did you hear anything that astonished your weak mind so very exceedingly, after all?"

"The only thing that did astonish me, was to hear men of my own class—and lower still, perhaps, some of them—speak with such fluency and eloquence. Such a fund of information—such excellent English. Where did they get it all?"

"From the God who knows nothing about tanks. They're the unknown great—the unaccredited heroes, as Master Thomas Carlyle would say, whom the flunkies aloft have not acknowledged yet—though they'll be forced to, some day, with a vengeance. Are you convinced, once for all?"

"I really do not understand political questions, Crossthwaite."

"Does it want so very much wisdom to understand the rights and the wrongs of all that? Are the people represented? Are you represented? Do you feel like a man that's got anyone to fight your battle in Parliament, my young friend, oh?"

"I'm sure I don't know—"

"Why, what in the name of common sense—what interest or feeling of yours or mine, or any man's you ever spoke to, except the shopkeeper, do Alderman A * * * or Lord C * * * D * * * represent? They represent property—and we have none. They represent rank—we have none. Vested interests—we have none. Large capitals—those are just what crush us. Irresponsibility of employers, slavery of the employed, competition among masters, competition among workmen, that is the system they represent—they preach it—they glory in it. Why, it is the very ogre that is eating us all up. They are chosen by the few, they represent the few, and they make laws for the many—and yet you don't know whether or not the people are represented."

We were passing by the door of the Victoria Theatre, it was just half-past time—and the beggary and rascality of London were pouring in to their low amusement, from the neighbouring gin-palaces and thieves' cellars. A herd of ragged boys, vomiting forth slang, filth, and blasphemy, pushed past us, compelling us to take good care of our pockets.

"Look there! look at the amusements, the training, the civilisation, which the Government permits to the children of the people!—these licensed pits of darkness, tips of temptation, profligacy, and ruin, triumphantly yawning night after night—and then tell me that the people who see their children thus kidnapped into hell, are represented by a Government who licenses such things!"

"Would a change in the franchise cure that?"

"Household suffrage mightn't—but give us the Charter, and we'll see about it. Give us the Charter, and we'll send workmen into Parliament that shall soon find out whether something better can't be put in the way of the ten thousand boys and girls in London who live by theft and prostitution, than the tender mercies of the Victoria—a pretty name! They say the Queen's a good woman—and I don't doubt it. I wonder often if she knows what her precious namesake here is like?"

"But, really, I cannot see how a mere change in representation can cure such things as that."

"Why, didn't they tell us, before the Reform Bill, that extension of the suffrage was to cure everything? And how can you have too much of a good thing? We've only taken them at their word, we Chartists. Haven't all politicians been preaching for years that England's national greatness was all owing to her political institutions—to Magna Charta, and the Bill of Rights, and representative Parliaments, and all that? It was but the other day I got hold of some Tory paper, that talked about the English constitution, and the balance of queen, lords, and commons, as the 'Talismanic Palladium' of the country. 'Gad, we'll see if a move onward in the same line won't better the matter. If the balance of classes is such a blessed thing, the sooner we get the balance equal, the better, for its rather lopsided just now, no one can deny. So, representative institutions are the talismanic palladium of the nation, are they? 'The palladium of the classes that have them, I dare say, and that's the very best reason why the classes that haven't got 'em should look out for the same palladium for themselves. What's sauce for the gander is sauce for the goose, isn't it?' We'll try—we'll see whether the talisman they talk of has lost its power all of a sudden since '32—whether we can't rub the magic ring a little for ourselves, and call up geni to help us out of the mire, as the shopkeepers and the gentlemen have done."

From that night I was a Chartist, heart and soul—and so were a million and a half more of the best artisans in England—at least, I had no reason to be ashamed of my company. Yes, I too, like Crossthwaite, took the upper classes at their word, bowed down to the idol of political institutions, and pinned my hopes of salvation on "the possession of one ten thousandth part of a taker in the national palace." True, I desired the Charter, at first (as I do, indeed, at this moment), as a means to glorious ends—not only because it would give a chance of elevation, a free sphere of action, to lowly worth and talent, but because it was the path to reforms,—social, legal, sanitary, educational,—to which the wisest Tories—certainly not the great and good Lord Ashley—would not object. But soon, with me, and I am afraid with many, many more, the means became, by the frailty of poor human nature, an end, an idol in itself. I had so made up my mind that it was the only method of getting what I wanted, that I neglected, alas! but too often, to try the methods which lay already by me. "If we had but the Charter"—was the excuse for a thousand lazinesses, procrastinations. "If we had but the Charter"—I should be good, and free, and happy. Fool that I was! It was within, rather than without, that I needed reform.

And so I began to look on man (and too many of us, I am afraid, are doing so) as the creature and puppet of circumstances—of the particular outward system, social or political, in which he happens to find himself. An abominable heresy, no doubt, but, somehow, it appears to me just the same as Benthamites, and economists, and high churchmen, too, for that matter, have been preaching for the last twenty years, with great applause from their respective parties. One set informs the world that it is to be regenerated by cheap bread, free trade, and that peculiar form of the "freedom of industry" which, in plain language, signifies "the despotism of capital," and which, whatever it means, is merely some outward system, circumstance or "dodge," about man, and not in him. Another party's nostrum is more churches, more schools, more clergymen—excellent things in their way—better even than cheap bread, or free trade, provided only that they are excellent—that the churches, schools, clergymen, are good ones. But the party of whom I am speaking seem to us workmen to consider the quality quite a secondary consideration, compared with the quantity. They expect the world to be regenerated, not by becoming more a Church—none would gladly help them in bringing that about than the Chartists themselves, paradoxical as it may seem—but by being dosed somewhat more with a certain "Church system," circumstance, or "dodge." For my part, I seem to have learned that the only thing to regenerate the world is not more of any system, good or bad, but simply more of the spirit of God.

About the supposed omnipotence of the Charter I have found out my mistake. I believe no more in "Morrison's Pills-remedies," as Thomas Carlyle calls them. Talismans are worthless. The age of spirit-compelling spells, whether of parchment or carbuncle, is past if, indeed, it ever existed. The Charter will no more make men good, than political economy, or the observance of the Church Calendar—a fact which we workmen, I really believe, have, under the pressure of wholesome defeat and Godsent affliction, found out sooner than our more "enlightened" fellow-aiders. But, at that time, as I have confessed already, we took our letters at their word, and believed in Morrison's Pills. Only, as we looked at the world from among a class of facts somewhat different from theirs, we differed from them proportionably as to our notions of the proper ingredients in the said Pills.

But what became of our protest?

It was received—and disregarded. As for turning us off, we had, de facto, like Conolmans, banished the Romans, turned our master off. All the other hands, some forty in number, submitted and took the yoke upon them, and went down into the house of bondage, knowing whether they went. Every man of them is now a beggar, compared with what he was then. Many are dead in the prime of life of consumption, bad food and lodging, and the peculiar diseases of our trade. Some have not been heard of lately—we fancy them imprisoned in some sweaters' dens—but thereby hangs a tale, whereof more hereafter.

But it was singular, that everyone of the six who had merely professed their conditional readiness to sign the protest, were continuously discharged the next day, without any reason being assigned. It was evident that there had been a traitor at the meeting, and everyone suspected Jimmy Downes, especially as he fell into the new system with suspiciously strange alacrity.

But it was as impossible to prove the offence against him as to punish him for it. Of that wretched man, too, and his subsequent career, I shall have somewhat to say hereafter. Verily, there is a God who judgeth the earth!

But now behold me and my now intimate and beloved friend, Crossthwaite, with nothing to do—a gentlemanlike occupation, but, unfortunately, in our class involving starvation. What was to be done? We applied for work at several "honourable shops," but at all we received the same answer. Their trade was decreasing—the public ran daily more and more to the cheap show shops—and they themselves were forced, in order to compete with these latter, to put more and more of their work out at contract prices. Pecunia domans Alton! Having once been hustled out of the serious crowd of competing workmen, it was impossible to force our way in again. So, a week or ten days past, our little stocks of money were exhausted. I was downhearted at once, but Crossthwaite bore up gallantly enough.

"Katie and I can pick a crust together without snarling over it. And, thank God, I have no children, and never intend to have, if I can keep true to myself, till the good times come."

"Oh! Crossthwaite, are not children a blessing?"

"Would they be a blessing to me now? No, my lad—let these bring slaves into the world who will! I will never forget children to swell the numbers of those who are trampling each other down in the struggle for daily bread, to multiply in ever deepening poverty and misery to the rich man's luxury—perhaps his lust."

"Then you believe in the Malthusian doctrine?"

"I believe them to be an infernal lie, Alton Locke, though good and wise people like Miss Martineau may sometimes be deluded into preaching them. I believe there's room on English soil for twice the number there is now, and when we get the Charter we'll prove it, we'll show that God meant living human heads and hands to be blessings and not curses, to do and not to moulder. But in such times as these, let those who have wives be as though they had none—as St Paul said, when he told his people under the Roman emperor to be above begetting slaves and martyrs. A man of the people should keep himself as free from accumulations as he can just now. He will find it all the more easy to do and suffer for the people, when their turn comes."

And he set his teeth firmly, almost savagely.

"I think I can earn a few shillings, now and then, by writing for a paper. I know of if that won't do, I must take up agitating for a while and live by spouting, as many a Tory member as well as Radical ones do. A man may do worse, for he may do nothing

At all events, my only chance now is to help on the Charter, for the sooner it comes the better for me. And if I die—why, the little woman won't be long in coming after me, I know that well, and there's a tough business got well over for both of us!"

"Heeh," said Sam, —

"To every man
Death cometh but once a life—" as my countryman, Mr Macanlay, says, in those grand Roman ballads o' his. But for ye, Alton, lad, ye're owie young to start off in the People's Church. Wechtant, s'ie just bide wi' me, and the laird o' meal in the corner there wina waste,—nae mair than it did wi' the widow o' Zacheus, a tale which comical as weel wi' the everlastin' righteousnesses, that I'm at times no inclined to consider it a' the gither my them."

But I, with thankfulness which vented itself through my eyes, hushing my lips alone too narrow for it, refused to eat the bread of idleness.

"Aweel, then, ye'll just mind the shop, and dust the books whiles, I'm getting auld and stiff, and ha'e need o' help in the laundries."

"No," I said, "you say so out o' kindness, but if you can afford no greater comforts than these, you cannot afford to keep me in addition to yourself."

"Heeh, then! How do ye ken that the auld Scot eats a' he mikes? I wusna him the spending sile o' Tweed, my man. But gin ye dant, why dunn ye pack up your deids, and the poems wi' them, and gang till your camus to the university? he'll surely put you in the way o' publishing them. He's bound to it by blude, and there's na shame in asking him to help you towards reaping the fruits o' your ain labours. A few pounds on a bond for repayment when the edition was auld, noo, I'd dae that for mysel', but I'm thinking ye'd better try to get a list o' subscribers. Dinna mind your independence, it's but spending the Egyptians, ye ken, and thae bit ballads will be their money's worth, I'll warrant, and tell them a wheen facts they're no that well acquainted wi'. Heeh! Johnnie, my Charist!"

"Why not go to my uncle?"

"I'm aye and spae selling bairn bodie! as there aught in his lugel about poetry, and the incommensurable value o' the products o' genius? Gang till the young scholars he's a canny me, too, and he'll ken it to be worth his while to fash himself a wee amount."

So I packed up my little bundle, and lay awake all that night in a fever of expectation about the as yet unknown world of green fields and woods through which my road to Cambridge lay.

CHAPTER XL

"THE YARD WHERE THE GENTLEMEN LIVE"

I MAY be forgiven, surely, if I run somewhat into detail about this my first visit to the country.

I had, as I have said before, literally never been farther afield than Fulham or Battersea Rise. One Sunday evening, indeed, I had got as far as Wandsworth Common, but it was March, and, to my extreme disappointment, the heath was not in flower.

But, usually, my Sundays had been spent entirely in study; which to me was rest, so worn out were both my body and my mind with the incessant drudgery of my trade, and the slender fare to which I restricted myself. Since I had lodged with Mackaye, certainly, my food had been better. I had not required to stint my appetite for money where with to buy candles, ink, and pens. My wages, too, had increased with my years, and altogether I found myself gaining in strength, though I had no notion how much I possessed till I set forth on this walk in Cambridge.

It was a glorious morning at the end of May, and when I escaped from the pall of smoke which hung over the city, I found the sky a sheet of cloudless blue. How I watched for the ending of the rows of houses, which lined the road for miles—the great roots of London, running far out into the country, up which poured past me an endless stream of food, and merchandise, and human beings—the sap of the huge metropolitan life tree! How each turn of the road opened a fresh line of terraces or villas, till hope deferred made the heart sick, and the country seemed—like the place where the rainbow touches the ground, or the El Dorado of Raleigh's (innocent settlers always a little farther off)! How, between gaps in the houses right and left, I caught tantalising glimpses of green fields, shut from me by dull lines of high-spiked palings! How I peeped through gates and over fences at trim lawns and gardens, and longed to stay, and admire, and speculate on the names of the strange plants and gaudy flowers, and then hurried on, always expecting to find something still finer ahead—something really worth stopping to look at—till the houses thickened again into a street, and I found myself, to my disappointment, in the midst of a town! And then more villas and palings, and then a village,—when would they stop, those endless houses?

At last they did stop. Gradually the people whom I passed began to look more and more rural, and more toil worn and ill-fed. The houses ended, cattle-yards and farm-buildings appeared; and right and left, far away, spread the low rolling sheet of green meadows and corn-fields. Oh, the joy! The lawns with their high elms and firs, the green hedgerows, the delicate hue and scent of the fresh clover fields, the steep clay banks, where I stopped to pick up eggs of wild flowers, and became again a child,—and then recollected my mother, and a walk with her on the river bank towards the Red House. I hurried on again, but could not be unhappy, while my eyes ranged free, for the first time in my life, over the chequered squares of cultivation, over glittering meadows, and hills quivering in the green haze, while above hung the skylarks, pouring out their souls in melody. And then, as the sun grew hot, and the larks dropped one by one into the growing grain, the new daylight of the blessed silence! I listened to the stillness, for none had been my native element, I had become in London quite unconscious of the ceaseless roar of the human sea, casting up mire and dirt. And now, for the first time in my life, the rushing, confusing hubbub had blown away, and left my brain calm and free. How I felt at that moment a capability of clear, bright meditation, which was new to me, as I believe it would have been to most Londoners in my position. I cannot help saying that our material atmosphere of excitement, physical as well as moral, is to blame for very much of the working men's restlessness and fierceness. As it was, I felt that every step forward, every breath of fresh air, gave me new life. I had gone fifteen miles before I recollected that for the first time for many months, I had not coughed since I rose.

So on I went, down the broad, bright road, which seemed to beckon me forward into the unknown expanses of human life.

"The world was all before me, where to choose and I saw it both with my eyes and my imagination, in the temper of a boy broke loose from school. My heart kept hollering I loved and blessed the lands which lifted past me, and the cows which lay dreaming on the sward. I recollect stopping with delight at a picturesque descent into the road, to watch a nursery garden, full of roses of every shade, from brilliant yellow to darkest purple, and as I wondered at the innumerable variety of beauties which man's art had developed from a few poor and wild species, it seemed to me the most delightful life on earth, to follow in such a place the primordial trade of gardener Adam, to study the secrets of the flower world, the laws of soil and climate, to create new species, and gloat over the living fruit of one's own science and perseverance. And then I recollected the tailor's shop, and the Clutter, and the starvation, and the oppression, which I had left behind, and ashamed of my own selfishness, went hurrying on again.

At last I came to a wood—the first real wood that I had ever seen, not a mere party of stately park trees growing out of smooth turf, but a real wild copse, tangled branches and grey stems fallen across each other, deep, rugged underwood of shrubs, and great ferns like princes' feathers, and gay boils of flowers, blue, and pink, and yellow, with butterflies flitting about them, and trailers that climbed and dangled from bough to bough—a poor, commonplace lot of copse, I dare say, in the world's eyes, but to me a fairy wilderness of beautiful forms, mysterious gleams and shadows, teeming with manifold life. As I stood looking wistfully over the gate, alternately at the inviting vista of the green embowered path, and then at the grim notice over my head, "All trespassers prosecuted," a young man came up the ride, dressed in velvet jacket and leather gaiters, sufficiently bedabbled with mud. A fishing rod and basket bespoke him some sort of destroyer, and I saw in a moment that he was "a gentleman." After all, there is such a thing as looking like a gentleman. There are men whose class no dirt or rags could hide, any more than they could Ulysses. I have seen such men in plenty among workmen, too, but, on the whole, the gentlemen by whom I do not mean just now the rich—have the superiority in that point. But not, please God, forever. Give us the same air, water, exercise, education, good society, and you will see whether this "haggardness," this "coarseness," etc. etc., for the list is too long to specify, be an accident, or a property, of the mind of the people.

"May I go into your wood?" asked I, at a venture, curiosity conquering pride.

"Well! what do you want there, my good fellow?"

"To see what a wood is like—I never was in one in my life."

"Humph! well—you may go in for that, and welcome. Never was in a wood in his life!—poor devil!"

"Thank you!" quoth I. And I slowly clambered over the gate. He put his hand carelessly on the top rail, vaulted over it like a deer, and then turned to stare at me.

"Hullo! I say—I forgot—don't go far in, or ramble up and down, or you'll disturb the pheasants."

I thanked him again for what license he had given me—went in, and lay down by the path-side.

Here, I suppose, by the rules of modern art, a picturesque description of the said wood should follow, but I am the most incompetent person in the world to write it. And, indeed, the whole scene was so novel to me, that I had no time to analyse, I could only enjoy! I recollect lying on my face and fingering over the delicately cut leaves of the weeds, and wondering whether the people who lived in the country thought them as wonderful and beautiful as I did;—and then I recollected the thousands whom I had left behind, who, like me, had never seen the green face of God's earth, and the answer of the poor gamin in St. Giles's, who, when he was asked what the country was, answered, "the yard where the gentlemen live when they go out of town"—significant that, and pathetic,—then I wondered whether the time would ever come when society would be far enough advanced to open to even such as he a glimpse, if it were only once a year, of the fresh, clean face of God's earth,—and then I became aware of a soft mysterious hum, above me and around me, and turned on my back to look whence it proceeded, and saw the leaves, gold—green and transparent in the sunlight, quivering against the deep heights of the empyrean blue, and hanging in the sunbeams that pierced the foliage, a thousand insects, like specks of fire, that poised themselves motionless on thrilling wings, and darted away, and returned to hang motionless again,—and I wondered what they eat, and whether they thought about anything, and whether they enjoyed the sunlight. And then that brought back to me the times when I used to be dreaming in my crib on summer mornings, and watched the flies dancing reels between me and the ceilings,—and that again brought the thought of Susan and my mother, and I prayed for them not sadly—I could not be sad there—and prayed that we might all meet again some day and live happily together, perhaps in the country, where I could write poems in peace, and then, by degrees, my sentences and thoughts grew incoherent, and in happy, stupid animal comfort, I faded away into a heavy sleep, which lasted an hour or more, till I was awakened by the clots of cotton-couprising great black and red ants, who were trying to found a small Algeria in my left ear.

I rose and left the wood, and a gate or two on, stopped again to look at the same sportsman fishing in a clear silver brook. I could not help admiring with a sort of childish wonder the graceful and practised aim with which he directed his tiny bait, and called up mysterious dimples on the surface, which in a moment increased to splishings and stunglings of a great fish, compelled, as if by some invisible spell, to follow the point of the beading rod till he lay panting on the bank. I confess, in spite of all my class prejudices against "game-preserving aristocrats," I almost envied the man, at least I seemed to understand a little of the universally attractive charms which those same outwardly contemptible field sports possess: the fresh air, fresh fields and copses, fresh running brooks, the exercise, the simple freedom, the excitement just sufficient to keep alive expectation and banish thought.—After all, his trout produced much the same mood in him as my turnpike road did in me. And perhaps the man did not go fishing or shooting every day. The laws prevented him from shooting, at least, all the year round, so sometimes there might be something in which he made himself of use. An honest, jolly face too he had—not without thought and strength in it. “Well, it is a strange world,” said I to myself, “where those who can, need not, and those who cannot, must!”

Then he came close to the gate, and I left it just in time to see a little group arrive at it—a woman of his own rank, young, pretty, and simply dressed, with a little boy, decked out as a Highlander, on a shaggy Shetland pony, which his mother, as I guessed her to be, was leading. And then they all met, and the little fellow held up a basket of provisions to his father, who kissed him across the gate, and hung his crook of fish behind the saddle, and patted the mother’s shoulder, as she looked up lovingly and laughingly in his face. Altogether, a joyous, genial bit of—Nature? Yes, Nature. Shall I grudge simple happiness to the few, because it is as yet, alas! impossible for the many?

And yet the whole scene contrasted so painfully with me—with my past, my future, my dreams, my wrongs, that I could not look at it, and with a swelling heart I moved on—all the faster because I saw they were looking at me and talking of me, and the fair wife threw after me a wistful, pitying glance, which I was afraid might develop itself into some offer of food or money—a thing which I scorned and dreaded, because it involved the trouble of a refusal.

Then, as I walked on once more, my heart smote me. If they had wished to be kind, why had I grudged them the opportunity of a good deed? At all events, I might have asked their advice. In a natural and harmonious state, when society really means brotherhood, a man could go up to any stranger, to give and receive, if not succour, yet still experience and wisdom. And was I not bound to tell them what I knew—was sure that they did not know? Was I not bound to preach the cause of my class wherever I went? Here were kindly people who, for aught I knew, would do right the moment they were told what it was wanted, if there was an accused artificial gulf between their class and mine, had I any right to complain of it, as long as I helped to keep it up by my false pride and surly reserve? No! I would speak my mind henceforth—I would testify of what I saw and knew of the wrongs, if not of the rights, of the artisan, before whomsoever I might come. Oh! without conclusion of half-an-hour’s self-tormenting scruple! How I kept it to myself to be shown.

I really fear that I am getting somewhat trivial and prolix. But there was hardly an incident in my two days’ tramping which did not give me some small fresh insight into the terra incognita of the country, and there may be those among my readers, to whom it is not uninteresting to look, for once, at even the smallest objects with a Cockney workman’s eyes.

Well, I trudged on—and the shadows lengthened, and I grew footsore and tired; but every step was new, and gave me forward with fresh excitements for my curiosity.

At one village I met a crowd of little, noisy, happy boys and girls pouring out of a smart new Gothic schoolhouse. I could not resist the temptation of snatching a glance through the open door. I saw on the walls maps, music charts, and pictures. How I envied those little niches! A solemn, starchy elder, in a white cravat, evidently the parson of the parish, was patting children’s heads, taking down names, and laying down the law to a shrewd, prim young schoolmaster.

Presently, as I went up the village, the clergyman strode past me, headlong a thick stick and humming a chant, and joined a motherly looking wife, who, basket on arm, was popping in and out of the cottages, looking alternately serious and funny, cross and kindly—I suppose, according to the sayings and doings of the folks within.

“Come,” I thought, “this looks like work at least.” And as I went out of the village, I accosted a labourer, who was tugging my way, fork on shoulder, and asked him if that was the parson and his wife.

I was surprised at the difficulty with which I got into conversation with the man, at his stupidity, feigned or real. I could not tell which, at the dogged, suspicious reserve with which he eyed me, and asked me whether I was “one of they parts?” and whether I was a Londoner, and what I wanted on the tramp, and so on, before he seemed to think it safe to answer a single question. He seemed, like almost every labourer I ever met, to have something of his mind; to live in a state of perpetual fear and concealment. When, however, he found I was both a Cockney and a prisoner by, he began to grow more communicative, and told me, “Ees—that was the parson, sure enough.”

“And what sort of a man was he?”

“Oh! he was a main kind man to the poor, leastwise in the matter of visiting ‘em, and paying with ‘em, and getting ‘em to put into clubs, and such like, and his lady too. Not that there was any fault to find with the man about money—but ‘twas n’t to be expected of him.”

“Why, was he not rich?”

“Oh, rich enough to the likes of us. But his own tithes here arn’t more than a thirty pounds we hears tell, and if he’d had n’t summat of his own, he couldn’t do not no thing by the poor, as it be, he pays for that ere school all to his own pocket, next pint. All the rest o’ the tithes goes to some great lord or other—they say he draws a matter of a thousand a year out of the parish, and not a foot ever he set into it, and that’s the way with a main lot o’ parishes, up and down.”

This was quite a new fact to me. “And what sort of folks were the parsons all round?”

"Oh, some of all sorts, good and bad. About six and half a dozen. There's two or three nice young gent'lemen come'd round here now, but they're all what's 'em a call it?—sent o' papushes, leastwise, they has prayers in the church every day, and doesn't preach the Gospel, nohow, I hears by my wife, and she knows all about it, along of going to meeting. Then there's one over there now, as had to leave his living—he knows why. He got wife over seas. If he had been a poor man, he'd a been in * * *

"* * * gail, safe enough, and soon enough. Then there's two in the—as goes a hunting—not as I sees no harm in that, if a man's got plenty of money, he ought to enjoy himself, in course—but still he can't be here and there too, to once. Then there's two or three as is bad in their healths, or thinks themselves so, or else has livings summer' else, and they lives summer' or others, and has curates. Main busy chaps as they curates, always, and wonderful hands to preach, but then, just as they gets a little knowing like at it, and folks gets to like 'em, and run to hear 'em, all they jumps to summat better, and in course they're right to do so, and so we country folks get nought but the young cots, afore they're broke, y'en see."

"And what sort of a preacher was his parson?"

"Oh, he preached very good Gospel. Not that he went very often himself, because he couldn't make out the meaning of it, he preached too high, like. But his wife said it was uncommon good Gospel, and surely when he come to visit a body, and talked plain English, like, not acron-ways, he was a very pleasant man to hear, and his lady uncommon kind to nurse folk. They sot up with me and my wife, they two did, two whole nights, when we was in the fever, afore the officer could get us a nurse."

"Well," said I, "there are some good parsons left."

"Oh yes, there's some very good ones each one after his own way, and there'd I none on 'em, if they did but know how bad we labourers is off. Why, bless yo, I mind when they was very different. A new parson is a mighty change for the better, mostwise, we think. Why when I was a boy, we never had no schooling. And now mine goes and learns singing, and jobstafy, and ciphering, and sick like. Not that I sees no good in it. We was a sight better off in the old times, when there weren't no schooling. Schooling haint made wages rise, nor preaching neither."

"But surely," I said, "all this religious knowledge ought to give you comfort, even if you are badly off."

"Oh! religion's all very well for them as has time for it, and a very good thing—we ought all to mind our latter end. But I don't see now a man can hear sermons with an empty belly, and there's so much to fret a man, now, and he's so cruel tired coming home o' nights, he can't nowise go to pray a lot, as gentlefolks does."

"But are you a ill off?"

"Oh! he'd had a good harvesting enough, but then he owed all that for ho's rent, and he's club money wasn't paid up, nor he's shop. And then, with he's wages—" (I forgot the sum—noller ten shillings), "how could a man keep his mouth full, when he had five children?" "And then, folks is so unmerciful. I'll jist tell you what they says to me, now, last time. 'I was over at the Board—'"

And thereon he rambl'd off into a long jumble of medical officers and relieving officers, and Farmer Thos, and Squire Phab, which indented a mind as ill educated as discontented. He curs'd, or rather grumbled at—for he had not spirit, it seem'd, to curse anything—the New Poor Law, because it "ate up the poor, flesh and bone,"—he mourn'd the "Old Law," when "the Vestry was forced to give a man whatsoever he axed for, and if they didn't he'd go to the magistrates and make 'em, and so sure as a man got a fresh child, he went and got another loaf allowed him next vestry, like a Christian,"—and so tinn'd through a gale, and set to work forking up some weeds on a fallow, leaving me many new thoughts to digest.

"That night, I got to some town or other, and there found a night's lodging, good enough for a walking traveller."

CHAPTER XII

CAMBRIDGE

WHEN I started again next mornog, I found myself so stiff and footsore, that I could hardly put one leg before the other, much less walk upright. I was really quite in despair, before the end of the first mile, for I had no money to pay for a lift on the coach, and I knew, besides, that they would not be passing that way for several hours to come. So, with aching back and knees, I made shift to limp along, bent almost double, and ended by sitting down for a couple of hours, and looking about me, in a country which would have seemed dreary enough, I suppose, to anyone but a freshly liberated captive, such as I was. At last I got up and limped on, stiffer than ever from my rest, when a gig drove past me towards Cambridge, drawn by a stout cob, and driven by a tall, fat, jolly looking farmer, who stared at me as he passed, went on, looked back, slacken'd his pace, looked back again, and at last came to a dead stop, and hailed me in a broad, nasal dialect—

"Whor be gangin'g, then, boh?"

"To Cambridge."

"Then'st na gat there that gate. Be'est thee honest man?"

"I hope so," said I, somewhat indignantly
 "Wh' it's trade?"

"A tailor," I said

"Tailor!—guide us! Tailor a trump?
 Barn's accustomed to tramp, then?"

"I never was out of London before," said
 I, meekly; for I was too worn out to be cross-lengthy and impudent as this cross examination seemed

"Oll gie thee lift, doe yow joomp in Gue on, powney! Tailor, then! Oh! ah!
 tailor," saith he

I obeyed most thankfully, and sat crouched together, looking up out of the corner of my eyes at the huge tower of brickcloth by my side, and comparing the two red shoulders of matton which held the rams, with my own wasted, white, woman-like fingers.

I found the old gentleman most inquisitive.
 He drew out of me all my story—questioned me about the way "Lannon folks" lived, and whether they got on shooting or "pit tomming"—whereby I found he meant skating —and broke in, every now and then, with ejaculations of childish wonder, and clumsy sympathy, on my accounts of London labour and London misery

"Oh, father, father! I wonders they hains it. Us'n in the fens wouldn't stand that likes. They'd rot, and rot, and rot, and tak' oot the duck gines to us—they would, as they did five-and-twenty year ago. Never to go beyond the houses—never to go beyond the houses! Kill me in a three months, that would, boy, then!"

"Are you a farmer?" I asked, at last, thinking that my turn for questioning was come

"I be an' varmer, I be yonm born
 Never paid rent in my life, nor never wot
 I farms my own land, and my fathers avore me, this ever so many hundred year. I've got the sword of 'em to home, and the hicknet that they sat with into the wars, then when they chopped off the king's head
 —what was th' name of um?"

"Charles the first?"

"Ees—that's the booy. We was Parliamment side true Britons all we was, down into the fens, and Oliver Cromwell, us dug Botsham hole, to the head of us. You coum down to M tholl, and I'll shaw ye a country I'll shaw 'co some at like hallocks to call, and some at like a field o' beans—I woot,
 —none o' this heve slawed up and downs o' hills" (though the country through which we drove was flat enough, I should have thought, to please myself), "to shinke a body's victuals out of his mwards—all so flat as a barn's floor, for forty mile an end—there's the country to live in—and your sons—or was you on 'em—everyone on 'em fifteen stone in his shoes, to patten agin' any man from Whitsea Mere to Denver Shuce, for twenty pounds o' gold, and there's the rummy to lay down, and let the man as dare cover it, down with his money, and on wi' his pattens, thirteen inch runners, down the wind, again? ether a one o' the barns?"

And he jingled in his pocket a heavy bag of gold, and winked and chuckled, and then suddenly checking himself, repeated in a sad, dubious tone, two or three times, "your on 'em there was you on 'em there was,"
 and relieved his feelings, by springing the pony into a canter till he came to a public-house, where he pulled up, called for a pot of hot ale, and insisted on treating me. I assured him that I never drank fermented liquors

"Aw? Eh? How can you do that then?"

Die o' coudt the fen, that g'de, you woudl love ye then! they as dinnot tak' squits down ther, tak' their pennord o' elevation, then—women folk especial?

"What's elevation?"

"Oh! ho! ho!—you goo into dinggast's shop o' market-day, into Camlandge, and you'll see the little boxes, dozens and dozens, n' truly on the counter, and never a ven man's wife goo by, but what calls in for her pennord o' elevation, to last her out the week. Oh! ho! ho! Well it keeps women-folk quiet, it do, and it's mortal good agin' go pains."

"But what is it?"

"Opium, boy! alive, opium!"

"But doesn't it ruin their health? I should think it the very worst sort of drinkemess."

"Ow, well, you moe say that—mck th 'em cruel thm then, it do, but what can ladies do i' th' age? Not it's a bad thing, it is. Harken you to me. Didst ever know one called Porter, to your trade?"

I thought a little, and recollected a man of that name, who had worked with us a year or two before a great friend of a certain scattered but much liked lady, brother of Crosshwaite's wife

"Well, I did once, but I have lost sight of him twelve months, or more."

The old man fixed sharp round on me, swinging the little gig almost over, and then twisted himself back again, and put on a fine familar like look of doggish, stolid reserve. We rolled on a few minutes in silence

"Doe you consider, now, that a mon mought be lost like, into Lannon?"

"How lost?"

"Why, you told o' they sweaters do you think a mon might get in wi' one o' they and they that mought be looking you in not to vind us?"

"I do, indeed. There was a friend of that man Porter got turned away from our shop, because he wouldn't pay some tyrannical fine for being sane, as they called it, to the shopman, and he went to a sweater's —and then another, and his friends have been tracking him up and down this six months, and can hear no news of him."

"Aw? guile us! And what'n, think you, be gone wi' us?"

"I am afraid he has got into one of those dens, and has pawned his clothes, as dozens of them do, for food, and so can't get out."

"Pawned his clothes for victuals? To think o' that, noo! But if he had work, could he get victuals?"

"On!" I said "there's many a man who, after working seventeen or eighteen hours a day, Sundays and all, without even time to take off his clothes, finds himself brought in in debt to his tyrant at the week's end. And if he gets no work, the villain won't let him leave the house, he has to stay there starving, on the chance of an hour's job. I tell you I've known half-a-dozen men imprisoned in that way, in a little dungeon of a guilt, where they had hardly room to stand upright, and only just space to sit and work between their beds, without breathing the fresh air or seeing God's sun, for months together, with no victuals but a few slices of bread and butter, and a little slop of tea, twice a day, till they were starved to the very bone."

"Oh, my God! my God!" said the old man, in a voice which had a deeper tone of feeling than mine sympathily with others' sorrow was likely to have produced. There was evidently something behind all these enquiries of his. I longed to ask him if his name, too, was not Porter.

"Aw yow known Billy Porter? What was a like?" Tell me, now—what was a like, in the Lord's name! what was a like unto?"

"Very tall and bony," I answered.

"Ah! six feet, and more, and a yard across!—but a was stuv'd; a was a' thin, though, maybe, when yow sawn un? and beautiful fine hair, hadn't a, like a lass's?"

"The man I know had red hair," quoth I.

"Ow, ay, un? that it was, red as a rising sun, and the curls of un like golden ginnies! And thou knew'st Billy Porter! To think o' that, noo—"

Another long silence.

"Could yow find un, dee vow think, noo, into Lammion? Suppose now, there was a mon 'ud gie—maybe five pound—ten pound, twenty pound, by * * *—twenty pound down, for to ha' him brocht home safe and sound!—Could yow do't, bor?" I say, could yow do't?"

"I could do it as well without the money as with if I could do it at all. But have yow no guess as to where he is?"

He shook his head sadly.

"We—that's to say, thy as wants un—hav'n't heard tell of un vor this three year—three year come Whitsuntide is ever was—"

And he wiped his eyes with his cuff.

"If yow will tell me all about him, and where he was last heard of, I will do all I can to find him."

"Will ye, noo? will ye? The Lord bless ye for saying that"—and he grasped my hand in his great iron fist, and fairly burst out crying.

"Was he a relation of yours?" I asked, gently.

"My bairn—my bairn—my eldest bairn. Dinnot yow ax me no moor—linnot then, bor? Gie on yow powwucy, and yow goodleuk vor un."

Another long silence.

"I've a been to Lammion, looking vor un."

Another silence.

"I went up and down, up and down, day and night, day and night, to all pot houses as I could see, vor, says I, he was a ways a main chap to drink, he was. Oh, dooly mo! and I never got right on un—and noo I be most spent, I be—"

And he pulled up at another public-house, and tried this time a glass of brandy. He stopped, I really think, at every inn between that place and Cambridge, and at each tried some fresh compound, but his head seemed, from habit, utterly fit proof.

At last, we reached Cambridge, and began to pass groups of gay horsemen, and then those strange caps and gowns—ugly and unmeaning remnant of obsolete fashion.

The old man insisted on driving me up to the gate of Trinity, and there dropped me, after I had given him my address, entreating me to "vind the bairn, and coom to see him down to Metholl. But dinnot goo ax for Fumor Portol—thoy's all Porters there-away. Yow ax for Wooden-house Boh—that's me, and if I barn't to home, ax for Mucky Billy—that's my bairn!—we're all gutter our names down to ven, and if he barn't to home yow ax for Frog-hall—that's where my sister do live; and they'll all veel ye, and lodge ye, and welcome come. We be all alike one, doon in the ven, and do ye, do ye, vind my bairn!" And he trundled on, down the narrow street.

I was soon directed, by various smart-looking servants, to my cousin's rooms, and after a few mistakes, and wandering up and down noble courts and cloisters, swarming with gay young men, whose jaunty air and dress seemed strangely out of keeping with the stern antique solemnity of the Gothic buildings around, I espied my cousin's name over a door, and, uncertain how he might receive me, I gave a gentle, half-apologetic knock, which was answered by a loud "Come in!" and I entered on a scene even more incongruous than anything I had seen outside.

"If we can only keep away from that d * * * d Jesus as far as the corner, I don't care."

"If we don't run into that first Trinity before the willows, I shall care with a vengeance."

"If we don't, it's a pity," said my cousin. "Wadham ran up by the side of that first Trinity yesterday, and he said that they were as well gruelled as so many posters, before they got to the stile."

This unintelligible, and, to my inexperienced ears, blasphemous conversation, proceeded from half-a dozen powerful young men, in low-crowned sailors' hats and flannel trousers, some in striped jerseys, some in shooting-jackets, some smoking cigars, some beating up eggs in sherry, while my cousin, dressed like "a fancy waterman," sat on the back of a sofa, puffing away at a huge meerschaum.

"Alton! why, what wind on earth has blown you here?"

By the tone, the words seemed rather an inquiry as to what wind would be kind enough to blow me back again. But he recovered his self-possession in a moment.

"Delighted to see you! Where's your portmanteau? Oh—left it at the Bull! Ah! I see. Very well, we'll send the gyp for it in a minute, and order some luncheon. We're just going down to the boat-race. Sorry I can't stop, but we shall all be fined—not a moment to lose. I'll send you in luncheon as I go through the butcheries; then, perhaps, you'd like to come down and see the race. Ask the gyp to tell you the way. Now, then, follow your noble captain, gentlemen—to glory and a supper!" And he bustled out with his crew.

While I was staring about the room, at the jumble of Greek books, boxing gloves, and lascivious prints of pretty women, a shrewd-faced, smart man entered, much better dressed than myself.

"What would you like, sir? Ox-tail soup, sir, or gravy soup, sir? Stilton cheese, sir, or Cheshire, sir? Old Stilton, sir, just now."

Fearing lest many words might betray my rank—and, strange to say, though I should not have been afraid of confessing myself an artisan before the "gentlemen" who had just left the room, I was ashamed to have my low estate discovered, and talked over with his companions, by the flunkey who waited on them—I answered, "Anything I really don't care," in an aristocratic and off-hand tone as I could assume.

"Porter or ale, sir?"

"Water," without a "thank you," I am ashamed to say, for I was not at that time quite sure whether it was well-bred to be civil to servants.

The man vanished, and re-appeared with a savoury luncheon, silver forks, snowy napkins, smart plates—I felt really quite a gentleman.

He gave me full directions as to my "way to the boats, sir," and I started out much refreshed; passed through back streets, dingy, dirty, and profligate-looking enough, out upon wide meadows, fringed with enormous elms, across a ferry, through a pleasant village, with its old grey church and spire, by the side of a sluggish river, alive with wherries, along a towing-path swarming with bold, bedizened women, who jeered with the rowers,—of their profession, alas! there could be no doubt. I had walked down some mile or so, and just as I heard a cannon, as I thought, fire at some distance, and wondered at its meaning, I came to a sudden bend of the river, with a church-tower hanging over the stream on the opposite bank, a knot of tall poplars, weeping willows, rich lawns, sloping down to the water's side, gay with bonnets and shawls; while along the edge of the stream, light, gaily painted boats apparently waited for the race,—altogether the most brilliant and grateful group of scenery which I had beheld in my little travels. I stopped to gaze, and among the ladies on the lawn opposite, caught sight of a figure—my heart leapt into my mouth! Was it she at last? It was too far to distinguish features, the dress was altogether different. But was it not she? I saw her move across the lawn, and take the arm of a tall, venerable looking man, and his dress was the same as that of the dean at the Dulwich College—was it? was it not? To have found her, and a river between us! It was ludicrously miserable—miserably ludicrous. Oh, that accursed river, which debared me from certainty, from bliss! I would have plunged across—but there were three objections—first, that I could not swim, next, what could I do when I had crossed? and thirdly, it might not be she after all.

And yet I was certain—instinctively certain—that it was she, the idol of my imagination for years. If I could not see her features under that little white bonnet, I could imagine them there, they flashed up in my memory as fresh as ever. Did she remember my features, as I did hers? Would she know me again? Had she ever even thought of me, from that day to this? Fool! But there I stood, fascinated, gazing across the river, heedless of the racing boats, and the crowd, and the roar that was rushing up to me at the rate of ten miles an hour, and in a moment more, had caught me and swept me away with it, whether I would or not, along the towing path, by the side of the foremost boats.

Oh, the babel of horse and foot, young and old! the cheering, and the exhorting, and the obstructions of number this, and number that! and the yelling of the most sacred names, intermingled too often with oaths—And yet, after a few moments, I ceased to wonder either at the Cambridge passion for boat racing, or at the excitement of the spectators. "Hon! soit qui mal y pense." It was a noble sport—a sight such as could only be seen in England—some hundred of young men, who might, if they had chosen, been lounging effeminately about the streets, subjecting themselves voluntarily to that intense exertion, for the mere pleasure of toil. The true English stuff came out there, I felt that, in spite of all my prejudices—the stuff which has held Gibraltar and conquered at Waterloo—which has created a Birmingham and a Manchester, and coloured every quarter of the globe—that grim, earnest, stubborn energy, which, since the days of the old Romans, the English possess alone of all the nations of the earth. I was as proud of the gallant young fellows as if they had been my brothers—of their courage and endurance (for one could see that it was no child's play, from the pale faces, and pinching lips), then strength and activity, so fierce and yet so cultivated, smooth, harmonious, as our kept time with our, and every back rose and fell in concert—and felt my soul stirred up to a sort of sweet madness, not merely by the shouts and cheers of the mob around me, but by the loud, fierce pulse of the rowlocks, the swift whispering rush of the long, snake-like eight oars, the swirl and gurgle of the water in their wake, the grim, breathless silence of the straining rowers. My blood boiled over, and fierce tears swelled into my eyes, for I, too, was a man and an Englishman, and when I caught sight of my cousin, pulling stroke to the second boat in the long line, with set teeth and flashing eyes, the great muscles on his bare arms springing up into knots at every rapid stroke, I ran and shouted among the maddest and the foremost.

But I soon tired, and, footsore as I was, began to find my strength fail me. I tried to drop behind, but found it impossible in the press. At last, quite out of breath, I stopped, and instantly received a heavy blow from behind, which threw me on my face. I looked up, and saw a huge long-legged grey horse, with his knees upon my back, in the act of falling over me. His rider, a little ferret visaged boy, dressed in sporting style, threw himself back in the saddle, and conveyed the horse in an instant, with a curse at me, as I rolled down the steep bank into the river, among the laughter and shouts of the women, who seemed to think it quite a grand act on the part of the horseman.

"Well saved, upon my word, my lord!" shouted out a rider beside him.

"Confound the such!" I'm glad he got his ducking. What do the fellows want here, getting in a gentleman's way?"

"For shame, Sandon!" the man is hurt," said another rider, a very tall and handsome man, who pulled up his horse, and, letting the crowd pass, sprang off to my assistance.

"Leave him alone, Lord Lynedale," said one of the women, "let him go home and ask his mamma to hang him out to dry."

"Why do you bother yourself with such muffs?" etc etc etc.

But I had scrambled out, and stood there dripping, and shaking with rage and pain.

"I hope you are not much hurt, my man?" asked the nobleman, in a truly gentlemanlike, because truly gentle voice, and he pulled out half-a-crown, and offered it to me, saying, "I am quite ashamed to see one of my own rank behave in a way so unworthy of it."

But I, in my shame and passion, thrust back at once the coin and the civility.

"I want neither you nor your money," said I,umping off down the bank. "It serves me right, for getting among you enervated aristocrats."

How the nobleman took my answer I did not stay to see, for I was glad to escape the jeers of the bystanding blackguards, male and female, by scrambling over the fences and making my way across the fields back to Cambridge.

CHAPTER XIII

THE LOST HOLE MOUSE

ON my return, I found my cousin already at home, in high spirits at having, as he informed me, "bumped the first Trinity." I excused myself for my dripping state, simply by saying that I had slipped into the river. To tell him the whole of the story, while the insult still rankled fiercely in me, was really too disagreeable both to my memory and my pride.

Then came the question, "What had brought you to Cambridge?" I told him all, and he seemed honestly to sympathize with my misfortunes.

"Never mind, we'll make it all right somehow. Those pecuniary losses you must let me have them and look over them, and I dare say I shall persuade the governor to do something with them. After all, it's no loss for you, you couldn't have gone on tailoring—much too sharp a fellow for that—you ought to be at college, if one could only get you there. These scholarships, now, were meant for just such cases as yours, clever fellows who could not afford to educate themselves, but, like everything in the university, the people for whom they are meant never get them. Do you know what the golden canon is, Alton, for understanding all university questions?"

"No."

"Then I'll tell you. That the employment of any money whatsoever, for any purpose whatsoever, is a certain sign that it was originally meant for some purpose totally different."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Oh! you shall stay here with me a few days, and you'll soon find out. Hush! now, don't come the independent dodge. Our cousin may visit another, I hope, without contracting obligations, and all that. I'll find you a bedroom out of college and you'll live in my rooms all day, and I'll show you a thing or two. How do you like the university?"

"The buildings," I said, "strike me as very noble and reverent."

"They are the only noble and reverent things you'll find here, I can tell you. It's a system of humping, from one end to the other. But the Dons get their living by it, and their livings too, and then bishops, now and then, and I intend to do the same, if I have a chance. Do at Rome as Rome does." And he lighted his pipe, and winked knowingly at me.

I mentioned the profane use of sacred names, which had so disgusted me at the boat-race. He laughed.

"Ah! my dear fellow, it's a very fair specimen of Cambridge—shows what's the matter with us all—putting new wine into old bottles, and into young bottles, too, as you'll see at my supper party to-night."

"Really," I said, "I am not fit for presentation at any such unbecoming amusements."

"Oh! I'll lend you clothes till your own are dried, and as for behaviour, hold your tongue, and don't put your knife in your mouth, as quite rules enough to get any man mistaken for a gentleman here." And he laughed again in his peculiar sneering way.

"By the bye, don't get drunk, for in vino veritas. You know what that means."

"So well," I answered, "that I never intend to touch a drop of fermented liquor."

"Capital rule for a poor man. I've got a young man, in my class, who's a saint, keep sober on principle. It's great fun to have a man taking you into his confidence after the second bottle, and then to see the funk he's in next day, when he recollects he's shown you more of his hand than is good for his own game."

All this sickened me, and I tried to turn the conversation, by asking him what he meant by new wine in old bottles?

"Can't you see? The whole is monastic dress, unmarried fellows, the very names of the colleges. I dare say it did very well for the poor scholars in the Middle Ages, who, three fourths of them, turned either monks or priests, but it won't do for the young gentlemen of the nineteenth century. Those very names of colleges are of a piece with the rest. The colleges were dedicated to various sacred personages and saints, to secure their interest in heaven for the prosperity of the college, but who believes in all that now? And therefore the names must only so be desecrated. The men can't help it. They must call the colleges by their names."

"Why don't they alter the names?" I said.

"Because, my dear fellow, they are afraid to alter anything, for fear of humping the whole rotten old house down about their ears. They say themselves that the slightest innovation will be a precedent for destroying the whole system, but by Jove! Why shouldn't they be afraid of that, if they did not know that the whole system would not bear canvassing an instant? That's why they retain statutes that can't be observed; because they know, if they once begin altering the statutes the least, the world would find out how they have themselves been breaking the statutes. That's why they keep up the farce of swearing to the Thirty-nine Articles, and all that, just because they know, if they attempted to alter the letter of the old forms, it would come out, that half the young men of the university don't believe those words of them at heart. They know the majority of us are at heart neither Churchmen nor Christians, nor even decently moral. But the one thing they are afraid of is scandal. So they connive at the young men's ill doings, they take no real steps to put down profligacy, and, in the meantime, they just keep up the forms of Church of Englandism, and pray devoutly that the whole humping may last out their time."

Then to a hundred who have no personal influence over the gownsmen. A man may live here from the time he's a freshman, to the time he's taken his degree, without ever being spoken to as if he had a soul to be saved, unless he happens to be one of the Summertime party, and they are getting fewer and fewer every year, and in ten years more there won't be one of them left, at the present rate. Besides, they have no influence over the rest of the under-graduates. They are very good, as the fellows in their way, I do believe, but they are not generally men of talent, and they keep entirely to themselves, and know nothing, and care nothing, for the questions of the day."

And so he ramblod on complaining and sneering, till supper-time, when we went out and loitered about the venerable cloisters, while the room was being cleared and the cloth laid.

To desecrate a Cambridge supper party among gay young men is a business as little suited to my taste as to my powers. The higher classes ought to know pretty well what such things are like, and the working men are not altogether ignorant, seeing that Peter Pears and other university men have been running Alma Mater's shame to as lucrative account in their functions as the Irish scribblers have that of their mother country. But I must say, that I was utterly disgusted, and when, after the removal of the tables, the whole party, twelve or fourteen in number, sat to work to drink hard and deliberately at milk punch, and bishop, and copus, and grog, and I know not what other inventions of bacchanalium brevis, and to sing, one after another, songs of the most brutal and low, I was glad to escape into the cool night air, and under pretence of going home, wander up and down the King's Parade, and watch the tall gables of King's College Chapel, and the classic front of the senate house, and the stately tower of St Mary's, as they stood, stern and silent, bathed in the still glory of the moonshine, and seeming to watch, with a steadfast sadness, the scene of frivolity and sin, jhaulism, formalism, hypocrisy, and idleness below.

Noble buildings! and noble institutions! given freely to the people, by those who loved the people, and the Saviour who died for them. They gave us what they had, those mediæval founders—whatever narrowness of mind or superstition defiled their gift was not their fault, but the fault of their age. The best they knew they imparted freely, and God will reward them for it. To monopolise those institutions for the rich, as is done now, is to violate both the spirit and the letter of the foundations, to restrict their studies to the limits of Middle-Age Romanism,¹ their conditions of admission to those fixed at the Reformation, is but a shade less wrongful. The letter is kept—the spirit is thrown away. You refuse to admit any who are not members of the Church of England,—say, rather, any who will not sign the dogmas of the Church of England, whether they believe a word of them or not. Useless formalism! which lets through the reckless, the profligate, the ignorant, the hypocritical, and only excludes the honest and the conscientious, and the mass of the intellectual working-men.

And whose fault is it that you refuse to admit members of the Church of England? Whose fault is it, I ask? Your predecessors neglected the lower orders, till they have ceased to reverence either you or your doctrines,—you confess that, among yourselves, freely enough. You throw the blame of the present widespread dislike to the Church of England on her sins during “the godless eighteenth century.” But so. Why are those sins to be visited on us? Why are we to be shut out from the universities, which were founded for us, because you have let us grow up, by millions, heathens and infidels, as you call us? Take away your snuffbox! It is not merely because we are bad Churchmen that you exclude us, also you would be crowding your colleges, now, with the talented poor of the agricultural districts who, as you say, remain faithful to the Church of their fathers. But are there six labourers’ sons educating in the universities at this moment? No! The real reason for our exclusion, Churchmen or not, is because we are poor—because we cannot pay your exorbitant fees, often, as in the case of bachelors of arts, exacted for tuition which is never given, and residence ¹This, like the rest of Mr Locke’s Cambridge reminiscences, may appear to many exaggerated and unfair. But he seems to be speaking of both universities, and at a time when they had not even commenced the process of reformation. We fear, however, that in spite of many noble exceptions, his picture of Cambridge represents, if not the whole truth, still the impression which she leaves on the minds of too many strangers, and, alas! students also.—Ed.

which is not permitted—because we could not support the extravagance which you not only permit, but encourage, because, by your own unblushing confession, it insures the university “the support of the aristocracy.”

“But, on religious points, at least, you must abide by the statutes of the university.”

Strange argument, truly, to be urged literally by English Protestants in possession of Roman Catholic bequests! If that be true in the letter, as well as in the spirit, you should have given place long ago to the Dominicans and the Franciscans. In the spirit it is true, and the Reformers acted on it when they rightly converted the universities to the uses of the new faith. They carried out the spirit of the founders’ statutes by making the universities as good as they could be, and letting them share in the new light of the Elizabethan age. But was the sum of knowledge, human and divine, perfected at the Reformation? Who gave the Reformers, or you, who call yourselves their representatives, a right to say to the mind of man, and to the teaching of God’s Spirit, “Hitherto, and no farther!” Society and mankind, the children of the Supreme, will not stop growing for your dogmas—much less for your vested interests, and the righteous law of unimpeded development and renovation, applied in the sixteenth century, must be re-applied in the nineteenth, while the spirits of the founders, now purged from the superstitions and ignorances of their age, shall smile from heaven, and say, “So would we have had it, if we had lived in the great nineteenth century, into which it has been your privilege to be born.”

But such thoughts soon passed away. The image which I had seen that afternoon upon the river-banks, had awakened imperiously the frantic longings of past years, and now it reassembled its ancient throne, and tyrannously drove forth every other object, to keep me alone with its own tantalising and torturing bounty. I did not think about her—No; I only stupidly and steadily stared at her with my whole soul and imagination, through that long sleepless night, and in spite of the fatigue of my journey, and the stiffness proceeding from my full and wetting, I lay tossing till the early sun poured into my bedroom window. Then I arose, dressed myself, and went out to wander up and down the streets, gazing at one splendid building after another, till I found the gates of King’s College open. I entered eagerly, through a porch which, to my untutored taste, seemed gorgeous enough to form the entrance to a fairy palace, and stood in the quadrangle, riveted to the spot by the magnificence of the huge chapel on the right.

If I had admired it the night before, I felt inclined to worship it this morning, as I saw the lofty buttresses and spires, fretted with all their gorgeous carving, and "storied windows richly dight," sleeping in the glare of the newly risen sun, and throwing their long shadows due westward down the sloping lawns and across the river which dimpled and gleamed below, till it was lost among the towering masses of cypress clumps and rose-garlanded chestnuts in the rich gardens beyond.

"Was I delighted? Yes—and yet no. There is a painful feeling in seeing anything magnificent which one cannot understand. And perhaps it was a morbid sensitiveness, but the feeling was strong upon me that I was an intruder there—out of harmony with the scene and the system which had created it, that I might be an object of unpleasing curiosity, perhaps of scorn (for I had not forgotten the nobleman at the boat-race), and those monuments of learned luxury. Perhaps, on the other hand, it was only from the instinct which makes us seek for solitude under the pressure of intense emotions, when we have neither language to express them to ourselves, nor loved one in whose silent eyes we may read kindred feelings—a sympathy which wants no words. Whatever the cause was, when a party of men, in their caps and gowns, approached me down the dark avenue which led into the country, I was glad to shrink for concealment behind the weeping willow at the foot of the bridge, and slunk off unobserved to breakfast with my cousin.

We had just finished breakfast, my cousin was lighting his meerschau, when a tall figure passed the window, and the talker of the nobleman, whom I had seen at the boat-race, entered the room with a packet of papers in his hand.

"Here, Loenle mi," my pocket-book—or rather, to stretch a bad pun till it bursts my pocket-dictionary. I require the aid of your benevolently squandered talents for the collection of these proofs. I am, as usual, both idle and lazy this morning, so draw pen, and set to work for me."

"I am exceedingly sorry, my lord," answered George, in his most desquaint tone, "but I must work this morning with all my might. Last night, recollect, was given to triumph, Bu clins, and illness."

"Then find someone who will do them for me, my Ulysses polinechane, pointrope, pamper."

"I shall be most happy (with a half frown and a wince) to play Pamper to your lordship's Pantagruel, on board the new yacht."

"Oh, I am perfect in that character, I suppose? And is she, after all, like Pantagruel's ship, to be loaded with hemp? Well, we must try two or three milder cargoes first. But come, find me some staving genus—some graculus caricus—"

"Who will ascend to the heaven of your lordship's eloquence for the bidding?"

"Five shillings a sheet—there will be about two of them, I think, in the pamphlet."

"May I take the liberty of recommending my cousin here?"

"Your cousin?" And he turned to me, who had been examining with a sad and envious eye the contents of the book-shelves. Our eyes met, and first a faint blush, and then a smile of recognition, passed over his magnificent countenance.

"I thank I had. I am ashamed that I cannot say the pleasure of meeting him at the boat-race yesterday."

My cousin looked inquiringly and vexed at us both. The nobleman smiled.

"Oh, the shame was ours, not his."

"I cannot thank," I answered, "that you have any reasons to remember with shame your own kindness and courtesy. As for me," I went on bitterly, "I suppose a poor journeyman tailor, who ventures to look on at the sports of gentlemen, only deserves to be hidden over."

"Sir," he said, looking at me with a severe and searching glance, "your bitterness is pardonable—but not your sneer. You do not yourself think what you say, and you ought to know that I think it still less than yourself. If you intend your irony to be useful, you should keep it till you can use it courageously against the true offenders."

I looked up at him fiercely enough, but the playful smile which had returned to his face disarmed me.

"Your class," he went on, "hides yourselves and our class as much by wholesale denunciations of us, as we, that 'who should know better, do by wholesale denunciations of you. As you grow older, you will learn that there are exceptions to every rule."

"And yet the exception proves the rule."

"Most painfully, true, Sir. But that argument is two-edged. For next time, and I consider it the exception or the ink, when I am told that you, a journeyman tailor, are able to correct these proofs for me?"

"Next to the rule, I think, than you yet fancy."

"You speak out boldly and well, but how can you judge what I may please to fancy? At all events, I will make trial of you. There are the proofs. Bring them to me by four o'clock this afternoon, and if they are well done, I will pay you more than I should to the average hack writer, for you will deserve more."

I took the proofs. He turned to go, and by a side back at George beckoned him out of the room. I heard a whispering in the passage, and I do not deny that my heart beat high with new hopes, as I caught unawares the words, —

"Such a touch of—such an eye!—such a contour of feature as that!—Loenle mi—that boy ought not to be mending trousers!"

My cousin returned, half-laughing, half-angry.

"Alton, you fool, why did you let out that you were a snip?"

"I am not ashamed of my trade."

"I am, then. However, you've done with it now, and if you can't come the gentleman, you may as well come the rising gonnor. The self-educated dodger pays well just now, and after all, you've hooked his lordship—thank me for that. But you'll never hold him, you independent dog, if you pull so hard on him." He went on, putting his hands in to his coat tail pockets, and sticking himself in front of the fire, like the Delphic Pythoness upon the sacred tripod, in hopes, I suppose, of some oracular allusion. "You will never hold him, I say, if you pull so hard on him. You might to 'My lord' him for months yet, at least. You know, my good fellow, you must take every possible care to pick up what good breeding you can, if I take the trouble to put you in the way of good society, and tell you where my private bird-nests are, like the green schoolboy some poet or other talks of."

"He is no lord of mine," I answered, "in any sense of the word, and therefore I shall not call him so."

"Upon my honour! here is a young gentleman who intends to rise in the world, and then commences by trying to walk through the first post he meets. 'Noodle' can't you do like me, and get out of the carts the way they come by? If you intend to go ahead, you must just dodge in and out, like a dog at a fair. 'She stoops to conquer' is my motto, and a precious good one too."

"I have no wish to conquer Lord Lyneale, and so I shall not stoop to him."

"I have, then, and to very good purpose, too. I am his whetstone, for polishing up that classical wit of his on, till he carries it into Parliament to astonish the country squires. He fancies himself a second Goethe, I haven't forgot his hitting at me, before a large supper party, with a certain epigram of that old turkey cock's about the whale having his unmentionable pursuit—and the great man likewise. While indeed! I bide my time, Alton, my boy—I bide my time, and then let your grand mistlecat look out! If he does not find the supposed whale unmentionable a good stout holding hispoon, with a tough line to it, and a long one, it's a pity, Alton, my boy!"

And he burst into a coarse laugh, tossed himself down on the sofa, and reclined his meerschaum.

"He seemed to me," I answered, "to have a peculiar condescension and liberality of mind towards those below him in rank."

"Oh! he had, had he? Now, I'll just put you up to a dodge. He intends to come the Mirabeau—fancies his mantle has fallen on him—prays before the fellow's bust, I believe, if one knew the truth, for a double portion of his spirit, and therefore it is a part of his game to ingratiate himself with all posy-boy-dom, while at heart he is as proud, exclusive an aristocrat, as ever wore nobleman's hat. At all events, you may get something out of him, if you ply your cards well—or, rather, help me to play mine, for I consider him as my property, and you only as my aide-de-camp."

"I shall play no one's cards," I answered, sulkily. "I am doing work fairly, and shall be fairly paid for it, and keep my own independence."

"Independence! hey day! Have you forgotten that, after all you are my guest, to call it by the mildest term?"

"Do you upbraid me with that?" I said, starting up. "Do you expect me to live on your charity, on condition of doing your dirty work? You do not know me, sir. I leave your roof this instant!"

"You do not?" answered he, laughing loudly, as he sprang over the sofa, and set his back against the door. "Come, come, you Will o' the-Wisp, as full of flights, and fancies, and vagaries as a sick old maid! Can't you see which side your bread is buttered? Sit down, I say! Don't you know that I'm as good natured a fellow as ever lived, although I do parade a little old Blas morality now and then, just for fun's sake? Do you think I should be so open with it, if I meant anything very dishonest? Here—sit down, and don't go into King Charles's room, or Queen Elizabeth's, either, which you seem inclined to do."

"I know you have been very generous to me," said I, penitently, "but a kindness becomes none when you are upbraided with it."

"So say the copybooks. I deny it. At all events, I'll say no more, and you shall sit down there, and write as still as a mouse, till two, while I tuckles this never to be enough-by-unhappy-third-years-men-execrated Griffin's Optics."

At four that afternoon, I knocked, proofs in hand, at the door of Lord Lyneale's rooms in the Kings Parade. The door was opened by a little elderly groom, grey-coated, grey gaitered, grey hained, grey-visaged. He had the look of a respectable old family retainer, and his exquisitely neat groom's dress gave him a sort of interest in my eyes. Class costumes, robes though they are of feudalism, carry a charm with them. They are symbolic, definite, they bestow a personality on the wearer, which satisfies the mind, by enabling it instantly to classify him, to connect him with a thousand stories and associations, and to my young mind, the wiry, shrewd, honest, grim old serving-man seemed the incarnation of all the wonders of Newmarket, and the hunting kennel, and the steeplechase, of which I had read, with alternate admiration and contempt, in the newspapers.

From between his legs peeped out a mass of shaggy grizzled hair, containing a Skye-terrier's eyes, and a long snout, which, by its twisting and unthrusting, seemed investigatwhether my trousers come within the biting degree of shabbiness.

"And what do you want here, young man?"

"I was bidden by Lord Lynedale to come here at four with these papers."

"Oh, yes, very likely! that's an old story, and to be paid money, I guess."

"And to be paid money."

"Not a doubt on't. Then you must wait a little longer, like the rest of your blood suckers. Go back, and tell your master, that he needn't send you sort here any more, with his post obits and post mortems, and the like devilry. The old culls good to last these three months more, the Lord be praised. Therefore, come, on—you go back to your master, and take him my compliments, and *****"

"I have no master," quoth I, puzzled, but half laughing, for I liked the old fellow's non honest visage.

"No master, eh?" then darned if you shall come in. Comes on your own account, eh? Got a little bit of paper for his lordship in that bundle?"

"I told you already that I had," said I, prevailingly.

"Very good, but you didn't tell me whether they come from the bayleaves or not."

"Nonsense. Take the papers in yourself, as you like."

"Oh, you young wight! and! Do you take me for Judas Iscariot? And what do you expect—to set a man on scriveng a writ on a man's own master? Wait a bit, till I gets the hom'ship, that's all, and I'll show you what's what."

If I could not understand him, the dog did, for he ran instantly at my legs, seized a huge piece of my best trousers, and was returning for a second, if I had not, literally, in my perplexity, thrust the clean proofs into his mouth which he worried and slobbered, as if they had been the grandfather of all white mice. At this moment, the inner door opened, and Lord Lynedale appeared. There was an explanation, and a laugh, in which I could not but join, in spite of the torn trousers, at the expense of the groom. The old man retired, mungling his growls with those of the tinner, and evidently quite disappointed at my not being a dun—an honest, dence barn door fowl, and not sera nature, and fan game for his sporting propensities.

Lord Lynedale took me into the inner room, and bade me sit down while he examined the proofs. I looked round the low wainscotted apartment, with its narrow millioned windows, in extreme curiosity. What a real nobleman's abode could be like, was naturally worth examining, to one who had, all his life, heard of the aristocracy as of some mythic Titans—whether friends or gods, being yet a doubtful point—altogether overshadowed on "cloudy Olympus," invisible to mortal ken. The shelves were gay with Moroccan, Russian leather, and gilding not much used, as I thought, till my eye caught one of the gorgeously bound volumes lying on the table in a loose cover of polished leather—a refinement of which poor I should never have dreamt. The walls were covered with prints, which soon turned my eyes from everything else, to range delighted over Landseers, Turners, Robert's Eastern sketches, the ancient Italian masters, and I recognised, with a sort of friendly affection, an old print of my favourite St Sebastian, in the Dulwich Gallery. It brought back to my mind a thousand dreams, and a thousand ones. Would those dreams be ever realised? Might this new acquaintance possibly open some pathway towards their fulfilment? some visit towards the attainment of a station where they would, at least, be less chimerical?—And at that thought, my heart beat loud with hope. The room was clocked up with chains and tables, of all sorts of strange shapes and problematical uses. The floor was strewed with skins of ben, deer, and seal. In a corner lay hunting whips and fishing rods, foils, boxing gloves, and gun cases, while over the chimney piece, an array of rich Turkish pipes, all amber and enamel, contrasted curiously with quaint old swords and daggers—bronze classic vases, upon Gothic oak brackets, and fantastic scraps of continental carving. On the centre table, too, reigned the same rich profusion, or, if you will, confusion. "MISS 'No'ra in Egypt," "Goethe's Walderwandschatten," "Marius's Hand books," and "Plato's Republic." What was there not there? And I chuckled inwardly, to see how 'Bell's Life in London' and the 'Eclectic' had, between them, set down 'McCulloch on Trigonometry' and were sitting, arm in arm, triumphantly astride of him. Everything in the room, even to the flagrant flowers in a German glass, spoke of a travelled and cultivated luxury—inifold tastes and powers of self enjoyment and self improvement, which Heaven forgive me if I envied, as I looked upon them. If I, now, had had one twentieth part of those books, prim's, that experience of life, not to men in that physical strength and beauty, which stood towering there before the fire so simple so utterly unconscious of the innate nobleness and grace which shone out from every motion of those stately limbs and features—all the delicacy which blood can give, combined, as no one does sometimes see, with the broad strength of the proletarian—so different from poor me!—and so different too, as I recollected with perhaps a savage pleasure, from the miserable, stunted specimen of over-bred unhealth which had ridden over me the day before! A strange question that of birth! and one in which the philosopher, in spite of himself, must come to democratic conclusions. For, after all, the physical and intellectual superiority of the high-born is only preserved, as it was in the old Norman times, by the continual practical abnegation of the very caste he on which they built themselves—by continual innovation of their race, by interminging with the ranks below them. The blood of Otho flowed in the veins of Norman William, true—and so did the tanner's of Falaise!

At last he looked up, and spoke courteously,—

"I'm afraid I have kept you long, but now, here is for your corrections, which are capital. I have really to thank you for a lesson in writing English." And he put a sovereign into my hand.

"I am very sorry," said "but I have no change."

"Never mind that. Your work is well worth the money."

"But," I said, "you agreed with me for five shillings a sheet, and—I do not wish to be rude, but I cannot accept your kindness. No working men make a rule of abiding by our wages, and taking nothing which looks like—"

"Well, well—and a very good rule it is, I suppose, then, I must find out some way for you to earn more. Good afternoon." And he motioned me out the room, followed me downstairs, and turned off towards the College Gardens.

I wandered up and down, feeling my grieved eyes, till I found myself again upon the bridge where I had stood that morning, gazing with admiration and astonishment at a scene which I have often expected to see painted or described, and which, nevertheless, in spite of its unique magnificence, seems strangely overlooked by those who cater for the public taste with pen and pencil. The vista of bridge, one after another, spanning the stream, the long line of great monastic palaces, all unlike, and yet all in harmony, sloping down to the stream, with their trim lawns and ivied walls, their towers and buttresses, and opposite them, the range of rich gardens and noble timber-trees, dimly seen through which, at the end of the gorgeous river avenue, towered the lofty buildings of St John's. The whole scene, under the glow of a rich May afternoon, seemed to me a fragment out of the "Arabian Nights" or Spenser's "Faery Queen." I leaned upon the parapet, and gazed, and gazed, so absorbed in wonder and enjoyment, that I was quite unconscious, for some time, that Lord Lynedale was standing by my side, engaged in the same enjoyment. He was not alone. Hanging on his arm was a lady, whose face, it seemed to me, I ought to know. It certainly was one not to be easily forgotten. She was beautiful, but with the face and figure rather of a Juno than a Venus—dark, imperious, restless—the lips almost too fully set, the brow almost too massive and projecting—a queen, rather to be feared than loved—but a queen still, as truly royal as the man into whose face she was looking up with eager admiration and delight, as he pointed out to her eloquently the several beauties of the landscape. Her dress was as plain as that of any Quaker, but the grace of its arrangement, of every line and fold, was enough, without the help of the heavy gold bracelet on her wrist, to proclaim her a fine lady, by which term I wish to express the result of that perfect education in taste and manner, down to every gesture, which Heaven forbid that I, professing to be a poet, should undervalue. It is beautiful, and therefore I welcome it, in the name of the Author of all beauty. I value it so highly, that I would fain see it extend, not merely from Belgravia to the tradesman's villa, but thence, as I believe it one day will, to the labourer's hovel, and the needlewoman's garret.

Half in bashfulness, half in the pride which shrinks from anything like intrusion, I was moving away, but the nobleman, recognising me with a smile and a nod, made some observation on the beauty of the scene before us. Before I could answer, however, I saw that his companion's eyes were fixed intently on my face.

"Is this," she said to Lord Lynedale, "the young person of whom you were speaking to me just now?" I fancy that I recalled him, though, I dare say he has forgotten me.

If I had forgotten the face, that voice, so peculiarly rich, deep, and marked in its pronunciation of every syllable, recalled her instantly to my mind. It was the dark lady of the Dulwich Gallery.

"I met you, I think," I said, "at the picture gallery at Dulwich, and you were kind enough, and—and some persons who were with you, to talk to me about a picture there."

"Yes, Guido's St Sebastian. You seemed fond of reading, then. I am glad to see you at college."

I explained that I was not at college. That led to fresh gentle questions on her part till I had given her all the leading points of my history. There was nothing in it of which I ought to have been ashamed.

She seemed to become more and more interested in my story, and her companion also.

"And have you tried to write?" I recalled my uncle advising you to try a poem on St Sebastian. It was spoken, perhaps, in jest, but it will not, I hope, have been labour lost, if you have taken it in earnest."

"Yes—I have written on that and on other subjects, during the last few years."

"Then you must let us see them, if you have them with you. I think my uncle, Arthur, might like to look over them, and if they were fit for publication, he might be able to do something towards it."

"At all events," said Lord Lynedale, "a self-educated author is always interesting. Bring any of your poems, that you have with you, to the Eagle this afternoon, and leave them there for Dean Winmstay, and to-morrow morning, if you have nothing better to do, call there between ten and eleven o'clock."

He wrote me down the dean's address, and maddening a civil good-morning, turned away with his queenly companion, while I stood gazing after him, wondering whether all noblemen and high born ladies were like them in person and in spirit—a question which, in spite of many noble exceptions, some of them well known and appreciated by the working men, I am afraid must be answered in the negative.

I took my MS. to the Eagle, and wandered out once more, instinctively, among those same magnificent trees at the back of the colleges, to enjoy the pleasing torment of expectation. "My much!" was he the same old man whom I had seen at the gallery, and if so, was Lillian with him? Delicious hope! And yet, what if she was with him—what to me! But yet I sat silent, dreaming, all the evening, and hurried early to bed—not to sleep, but to lie and dream on and on, and rise almost before light, eat no breakfast, and pace up and down, waiting impatiently for the hour at which I was to find out whether my dream was true.

And it was true! The first object I saw, when I entered the room, was Lillian, looking more beautiful than ever. The child of sixteen had blossomed into the woman of twenty. The ivory and vermilion of the complexion had blended down together into still richer hues. The dark hazel eyes shone with a more liquid lustre. The figure had become more rounded, without losing a line of that fairy lightness, with which her light morning dress, with its delicate French scintillations of colour, gay, and yet not gaudy, seemed to harmonise. The little plump jewelled hands—the transparent chestnut hair, banded round the beautiful oval margin—the tiny feet, which, as Smocking has it,—

6 "The little feet; (these) Take little notice of the road and —"

I could have ridden down, fool that I was! and worshipped what? I could not tell then, for I cannot tell even now.

The dean smiled recognition, bade me sit down, and disposed my queries, meditatively, on his knee. I obeyed him, trembling, cowering—my eyes devouring my idol—forgetting why I had come, seeing nothing but her—listening for nothing but the opening of those lips. I believe the dean was some sentences deep in his oration, before I became conscious thereof.

"—And I think I may tell you, at once, that I have been very much surprised and gratified with them. They evince, on the whole, a far greater acquaintance with the English classic models, and with the laws of rhyme and melody, than could have been expected from a young man of your class—made virtute puer. Have you read any Latin?"

"A little." And I went on staring at Lillian, who looked up, furtively, from her work, every now and then, to steal a glance at me, and set my poor heart thumping still more fiercely against my side.

"Very good, you will have the less trouble, then, in the preparation for college. You will find out for yourself, of course, the immense disadvantages of self education. The fact is, my dear lord" (turning to Lord Lyncdale), "it is only useful as an indication of a capability of being educated by others. One never opens a book written by working-men, without shuddering at a hundred faults of style. However, there are some very tolerable attempts among these—especially the imitations of Milton's 'Comus'."

Poor, I had by no means intended them as imitations, but such, no doubt, they were.

"I am sorry to see that Shelley has had so much influence on your writing. He is a guide as irregular in taste, as unorthodox in doctrine, though there are some pretty things in him now and then. And you have caught his melody tolerably here, now—"

"Oh, that is such a sweet thing!" said Lillian. "Do you know, I read it over and over last night, and took it upstairs with me. How very fond of beautiful things you must be, Mr. Locke, to be able to describe so passionately the longing after them!"

That voice once more! It intoxicated me, so that I hardly knew what I stammered out—something about working men having very few opportunities of indulging the taste for—I forget what. I believe I was on the point of running off into some absurd compliment, but I caught the dark lady's warning eye on me.

"Ah, yes! I forgot. I dare say it must be a very stupid life. So little opportunity, as he says. What a pity he is a tailor's papa! Such an unimaginative employment! How delightful it would be to send him to college, and make him a dogymn!"

Fool that I was! I fancied—what did I not fancy? Never seeing how that very "he" bespoke the indifference—the gulf between us. I was not a man—an equal, but a thing—a subject, who was to be talked over, and examined, and made into something like themselves, of their supreme and undeserved benevolence.

"Gently, gently, fair lady! We must not be—be talking as some people would kindly wish to be. If this young man really has a proper desire to rise into a higher station, and I find him a fit object to be assisted in that praiseworthy ambition, why, I think he ought to go to some training-college, St. Marks, I should say, on the whole, might, by its strong Church principles, give the best antidote to any little remaining taint of sans chlotheism. You understand me, my lord? And, then, if he distinguished himself there, it would be time to think of getting him a bishopric."

"Poor Pegasus in harness!" half smiled, half-sighed, the dark lady.

"Just the sort of youth," whispered Lord Lynedole, loud enough for me to hear, "to take out with us to the Mediterranean, as secret ny—s'il y avait là de la morale, of course—"

Yes, and of course, too, the tailor's boy was not expected to understand French. But the most absurd thing was, how everybody, except perhaps the dark lady, seemed to take for granted that I felt myself exceedingly honoured, and must consider it, as a matter of course, the greatest possible stretch of kindness thus to talk me over, and settle everything for me, as if I was not a living soul, but a plant in a pot. Perhaps they were not unsupported by experience. I suppose too many of us would have thought it so, there are blunkeys in all ranks, and to spare. Perhaps the true absurdity was the way in which I sat, demented, incalculable, staring at Lillian, and only caring for any word which seemed to augur a chance of seeing her again, instead of saying, as I felt, that I had no wish whatever to rise above my station, no intention whatever of being sent to training schools or colleges, or anywhere else at the expense of other people. And therefore it was that I submitted blindly, when the dean, who looked as kind, and was really, I believe, as kind as ever was human being, turned to me with a solemn, authoritative voice—

"Well, my young friend, I must say that I am, on the whole, very much pleased with your performance. It indicates, my dear lord, the assertion, for which I have been so often ridiculed, that there are many real men, capable of higher things, scattered up and down among the masses. Attend to me, sir!" (a hint which I suspect I very much wanted). "Now, recollect, if it should be in your power to assist your prospects in life, you must give up, once and for all, the latter tone against the higher classes, which I am sorry to see in your MSS. As you know more of the world, you will find that the poor are not by any means so ill used as they are taught, in these days, to believe. The rich have their sorrows too—no one knows it better than I" (and he played pensively with his gold pencil case).

"And good and evil are pretty equally distributed among all ranks, by a just and merciful God." I advise you most earnestly, as you value your future success in life, to give up reading those unimprinted authors whose aim is to excite the evil passions of the multitude, and to shut your eyes sometimes to the extravagant calumnies of demagogues, who make tools of enthusiastic and imaginative minds, for their own selfish aggrandisement. Avoid politics, the workman has no more to do with them than the clergyman. We are told, on divine authority, to fear God and the king, and oblige not with those who are given to change. Rather put before yourself the example of such a man as the excellent Dr. Brown, one of the richest and most respected men of the university, with whom I hope to have the pleasure of dining this evening—and yet that man actually, for several years of his life, worked at a carpenter's bench!"

I too had something to say about all that. I too knew something about demagogues and working-men—but the sight of Lillian made me a coward, and I only sat silent as the thought flashed across me, half-indignant, half-painful, by its contrast, of another who once worked at a carpenter's bench, and fulfilled his mission—not by an old age of wealth, respectability, and port wine, but on the cross of Calvary. After all, the worthy old gentleman gave me no time to answer.

"Next I think of showing these MSS. to my publisher, to get his opinion as to whether they are worth printing just now. Not that I wish you to build much on the chance. It is not necessary that you should be a poet. I should prefer mathematics for you, as a methodic discipline of the intellect. Most active minds write poetry, at a certain age—I wrote a good deal, I recollect, myself. But that is no reason for publishing. This haste to rush into print is one of the bad signs of the times—a symptom of the unhealthy activity which was first called out by the French Revolution. In the Elizabethan age, every decently educated gentleman was able, as a matter of course, to write a sonnet to his mistress's eyebrow, or an epigram on his enemy, and yet he never dreamt of printing them. One of the few rational things I have met with, Eleanor, in the works of your very objectionable pet, Mr. Carlyle though indeed his style is too intolerable to have allowed me to read much—is the remark that 'speech is silver'—'silver'—he calls it poetically—'while silence is golden'."

At this point of the sermon, Lillian fled from the room, to my extreme disgust. But still the old man pressed.

"I think, therefore, that you had better stay with your cousin for the next week. I hear from Lord Lynedole, that he is a very studious moral, rising young man, and I only hope that you will follow his good example. At the end of the week I shall return home, and then I shall be glad to see more of you at my house at D * * *, about * * * miles from this place. Good morning."

I went in rapture at the last announcement, and yet my conscience smote me. I had not stood up for the working men. I had heard them calumniated, and held my tongue. But I was to see Lillian. I had let the dean fancy I was willing to become a pensioner on his bounty—that I was a member of the Church of England, and willing to go to a (rich training school—but I was to see Lillian. I had lowered myself in my own eyes—but I had seen Lillian. Perhaps I exaggerated my own offences, however that may be, love soon silenced conscience, and I almost danced into my cousin's room on my return.

That week passed rapidly and happily. I was half-amused with the change in my cousin's demeanour. I had evidently risen immensely in his eyes, and I could not help applying, in my heart, to him, Mr. Carlyle's dictum about the valter-sackers—how they never honour the unaccredited hero, having no eye to find him out still properly accredited, and countersigned, and accredited with full uniform and diploma by that great god, Public Opinion. I saw through the motive of his new-helged respect for me—and yet I encouraged it, for it flattered my vanity. The world must forgive me. It was something for the poor tailor to find himself somewhat appreciated at last, even outwardly. And besides, this said respect took which was very tempting to me now. Through the week before, it was just the one which I should have repelled with scorn. Things became very curious to find me money, to order me clothes at his own tailor's, and set me up in various little toilet refinements, that I might make a respectable appearance at the dinner. I knew that he considered rather the honour of the family, than my good, but I did not know that his aim was also to bring me into his power, and I refused more and more weakly at each fresh offer, and at last on credit, in an evil hour, to sell my own independence, for the sake of indulging my love dream, and appearing to be what I was not.

I saw a good deal more of the young university men that week. I cannot say that my recollections of them were pleasant. A few of them were very lagged Tractarians, some of whom seemed to fancy that a difficile admission for crinoides and Gothic architecture was a form of religion, which, by its extreme perfection, made the virtues of chastity and sobriety quite unnecessary, and the rest, of a more ascetic and moral turn, seemed as narrow, bitter, disappointed, and unearnest young men as I had ever met, dealing in second-hand party statements gathered, as I could discover, entirely from periodicals of their own party—talking pride in reading nothing but what was made for them, indulging in the most violent nicknames and railing, and escaping from anything like severe argument by a sneer or an expression of the trivial humorist so "painful" a notion. I had good opportunities of seeing what they were really like; for my cousin seemed to take delight in tormenting them—making them contradict themselves, getting them into dilemmas, and putting them into passions,—while the whole time he professed to be of their party, as indeed he was. But his consciousness of power, and his natural craft, seemed to make him consider his own party as his private preserve for sporting over, and when he was tired with the amusement, he used to try to call me in, and sit me by the cars with his guests, which he had no great trouble in doing. And then, when he saw me at all confused, or borne down by statements from authors, of whose very names I had never heard, or by expressions of horror and surprise which made me suspect that I had unconsciously committed myself to an absurdity, he used to come "hulking into the midst of the press," like some knight at a tournament, or Socrates when he saved Alcibiades at Delium, and, by a dexterous repartee, turn the tide of battle, and get me off safe, taking care, by the bye, to hint to me the obligation which he considered himself to have conferred upon me.

But the great majority of the young men whom I met were even of a lower stamp. I was utterly shocked and disappointed at the contempt and misbelief with which they seemed to regard everything beyond mere animal enjoyment, and here and there the selfish advantage of a bad degree. They seemed, if one could judge from appearance, to despise and disbelieve everything generous, enthusiastic, enlarged. Thoughtfulness was a "hoax,"—earnestness, "romantic." Above all, they seemed to despise the university itself. The "Dons" were "idle, fat old humbugs," "lispel," "humbug too," tutors, "humblings" too, who pined into the trade men's hands, and changed men high fees for lectures not worth attending, so that any man who wanted to get on, was forced to have a private tutor, besides his college one. The university studies were "a humbug, no use to man in after life. The masters of arts were "humbugs" too, for "they know all the evils, and clamoured for reform till they became Dons themselves, and then, as soon as they found the old system gave, they settled down on their heels, and grew fat on port wine, like those before them." They seemed to consider themselves in an atmosphere of smog—living in a lie out of which he-element the whole was very right in making the most, for the gaining of fame or money. And the tone which they took about everything—the conservatism, hollowiness, Oh! Bliss selfishness—was just what might have been expected. Whether they were right or wrong in their complaints, I, of course, have no means of accurately knowing. But it did seem strange to me, as it has to others, to find in the mouths of almost all the gownsmen, those very same charges against the universities which, when working men dare to make them, excite outcries of "educumny," "olition," "vulgar radication," "attacks on our time-honoured institutions," etc. etc.

CHAPTER XIV

A CATHEDRAL TOWN

At length the wished-for day had arrived and, with my cousin I was whirling along full of hope and desire, towards the cathedral town of D * - (through a flat fen country, which, though I had often heard it described as ugly, struck my imagination much. The vast height and width of the sky arch, as seen from those flats as from an ocean—the grey haze shrouding the horizon of our narrow land-view, and closing us in, till we seemed to be floating through infinite space, on a little platform of earth, the rich poplar fringed fairs, with their heads of dappled oxen—the luxuriant crops of oats and beans—the tender green of the tall rape, a plant till then unknown to me—the long, straight, silver dykes, with their gaily carpets of strange floating water-plants, and their black banks, studded with the remains of buried forests—the innumerable draining-mills, with their creaking sails and groaning wheels—the endless rows of pollard willow through which the breeze moaned and sung, as through the strings of some vast Arabian harp, the little island knolls in that vast sea of fen, each with its long village street, and delicately taper spire, all this seemed to me to contain an element of new and peculiar beauty.

"Why?" exclaims the reading public, if perchance it ever sees this tale of mine, in its usual patient longing after anything like personal gossip, or scandalous anecdote—"why, there is no cathedral town which begins with a D." Through the fen, too! He must mean either Ely, Lincoln, or Peterborough, that's certain." Then, at one of those places, they find there is a dean—not of the name of Winnstay, true—but his name begins with a W, and he has a pretty daughter—no, a niece, well, that's very near it,—it must be him. No, at another place—there is not a dean, true—but a canon, or an archdeacon—something of that kind, and he has a pretty daughter, really, and his name begins—not with W, but with Y, well, that's the last letter of Winnstay, if it is not the first—that must be the poor man! What a shame to have exposed his family secrets in that way!" And then a whole circle of myths grow up round the man's story. It is officially ascertained that I am the man who broke into his house last year, after having made love to his housemaid, and stole his writing desk and plate—else, why should a burglar steal family letters, if he had not some interest in them? And before the matter dies away, some worthy old gentleman, who has not spoken to a working man since he left his living, thirty years ago, and hates a Radical as he does the Pope, receives two or three anonymous letters, condoling with him on the cruel betrayal of his confidence—base ingratitude for undeserved condensation, etc. etc., and, perhaps, with an enclosure of good advice for his lovely daughter.

But, wherever D * * * is, we arrived there; and with a beating heart, I—and I now suspect my cousin also—walked up the sunny slopes, where the old convent had stood, now covered with walled gardens and noble timber trees, and crowned by the richly fitted towers of the cathedral, which we had seen, for the last twenty miles, growing gradually larger and more distinct across the level flat. "Ely?" "No, Lincoln!" "Oh! but really, it's just as much like Peterborough!" Never mind, my dear reader; the essence of the fact, as I think, lies not quite so much in the name of the place, as in what was done there—to which I, with all the little respect which I can muster, entreat your attention.

It is not from false shame at my necessary ignorance, but from a fear lest I should bore my readers with what seems to them trivial, that I refrain from dwelling on many a thing which struck me as curious in this my first visit to the house of an English gentleman. I must say, however, though I suppose that it will be numbered, at least, among trite remarks, if not among trivial ones, that the all around me certainly struck me, as it has others, as not very much in keeping with the office of one who professed to be a minister of the Gospel of Jesus of Nazareth. But I saved over that feeling, being desirous to see everything in the brightest light, with the recollection that the dean had a private fortune of his own, though it did seem at moments, that if a man has solemnly sworn to devote himself, body and soul, to the cause of the spiritual welfare of the nation, that vow might be not unreasonably construed to include his money, as well as his talents, time, and health—unless, perhaps, money is considered by spiritual persons as so worthless a thing, that it is not fit to be given to God—a notion which might seem to explain how a really pious and universally respected archbishop, living within a quarter of a mile of one of the worst infernos of destitution, disease, filth, and profligacy—can yet find it in his heart to save £120,000, out of Church revenues, and leave it to his family, though it will not explain how Irish bishops can reconcile it to their consciences to leave behind them, one and all, large fortunes—for I suppose from fifty to a hundred thousand pounds is something—saved from fees and tithes, taken from the pockets of the Roman Catholic population, whom they have been put there to convert to Protestantism for the last three hundred years—with what success, all the world knows. Of course, it is a most impudent, and almost a blasphemous thing, for a working man to dare to mention such subjects. Is it not "speaking evil of dignities?" Strange, by the bye, that merely to mention facts, without note or comment, should be always called "speaking evil." Does not that argue ill for the facts themselves? Working men think so, but what matter what "the swinish multitude" think?

When I speak of wealth, I do not mean that the dean's household would have been considered by his own class at all too luxurious. He would have been said, I suppose, to live in a "quiet, comfortable, gentleman like way"—"everything very plain and very good." It included a butler—a quiet, good natured old man—who ushered us into our bedrooms, a footman, who opened the door—a sort of animal for which I have an extreme aversion—young, silly, conceited, over-fed, florid—who looked just the man to sell his soul for a living, twice as much food as he needed, and the opportunity of unlimited flattery with the maids, and a coachman, very like other coachmen, whom I saw taking a pair of handsome carriage horses out to exercise, as we opened the gate.

The old man, silently and as a matter of course, unpacked for me my little portmanteau (lent me by my cousin), and placed my things neatly in various drawers went down, brought up a jug of hot water, put it on the washing-table—told me that dinner was at six—that the half hour bell rung at half past five—and that, if I wanted anything, the footman would answer the bell (bells seeming a prominent idea in his theory of the universe) and so left me, wondering at the strange fact that free men, with free wills, do sell themselves, by the hundred thousand, to perform menial offices for other men, not for love, but for money, becoming, to denote them strictly, bell answering animals, and are honest, happy, contented, in such a life. A man servant, a soldier, and a Jesuit, are to me the three great wonders of humanity—three forms of moral suicide, for which I never had the slightest gleam of sympathy, or even comprehension.

At last we went down to dinner, after my personal abashments had been carefully superintended by my cousin, who gave me, over and above, various warnings and exhortations as to my behaviour, which, of course, to its due effect, in making me as nervous, constrained, and affected, as possible. When I appeared in the drawing-room, I was kindly welcomed by the dean, the two ladies, and Lord Lynedale.

But as I stood fidgeting and blushing, sticking my arms, and legs, and head, into all sorts of quaint positions—trying one attitude, and thinking it looked awkward, and so exchanging it for another, more awkward still—my eye fell suddenly on a slip of paper, which had conveyed itself, I never knew how, upon the pages of the Illustrated Book of Ballads, which I was turning over—

"Be natural, and you will be gentleman like. If you wish others to forget you, think, do not forget it yourself. If you wish others to remember you with pleasure, forget yourself, and be just what God has made you."

I could not help fancying that the lesson, whether intentionally or not, was meant for me, and a pressing impulse made me take up the slip, fold it together, and put it in my bosom. Perhaps it was Lillian's handwriting? I looked round at the ladies, but their faces were each buried behind a book.

We went in to dinner, and, to my delight, I sat next to my goddess, while opposite me was my cousin. Luckily, I had got some directions from him as to what to say and do, when my wonders, the servants, thrust eatables and drinkables over my shoulders.

Lillian and my cousin chatted away about church architecture, and the restorations which were going on at the cathedral, while I, for the first half of dinner, feasted my eyes with the sight of a beauty, in which I seemed to discover every moment some new excellence. Every time I looked up at her my eyes dazzled, my face blushed, my heart sank, and soft thrills ran through every nerve. And yet, Heaven knows, my emotions were as pure as those of an infant. It was beauty, longed for, and found at last, which I adored as a thing not to be possessed, but worshipped. The desire, even tho' thought, of calling her my own, never crossed my mind. I felt that I could gladly die, if by death I could purchase the permission to watch her. I understood, then, and forever after, the pure devotion of the old knights and troubadours of chivalry. I seemed to myself to be their brother—one of the holy guild of poet-lovers. I was a new Petrarch, basking in the light rays of a new Lillian. I gazed, and gazed, and found new life in gazing, and was content.

But my simple bliss was perfected, when she suddenly turned to me, and began asking me questions on the very points on which I was best able to answer. She talked about poetry, Tennyson and Wordsworth; asked me if I understood Browning's Sordello, and then comforted me, after my stammering confession that I did not, by telling me she was delighted to hear that, for she did not understand it either, and it was so pleasant to have a companion in ignorance. Then she asked if I was much struck with the buildings in Cambridge?—had they inspired me with any verses yet?—I was bound to write something about them—and so on, making the most commonplace remarks look brilliant, from the ease and liveliness with which they were spoken, and the tact with which they were made pleasant to the listener. While I wondered at myself, for enjoying from her lips the flippant, sparkling talk, which had hitherto made young women to me objects of unspeakable dread, to be escaped by crossing the street, hiding behind doors, and rushing blindly into back-yards and cow-holes.

The ladies left the room, and I, with Lillian's face glowing bright in my imagination, as the crimson silk remains on the retina of the closed eye, after looking intently at the sun, sat listening to a pleasant discussion between the dean and the nobleman, about some country in the East, which they had both visited, and greedily devouring all the new facts which they incidentally brought forth out of the treasures of their highly cultivated minds.

I was agreeably surprised (don't laugh, reader) to find that I was allowed to drink water, and that the other men drank not more than a glass or two of wine, after the ladies had retired. I had, somehow, got both lords and deans associated in my mind with infinite swillings of port wine, and bacchanalian orgies, and sat down, at first, in much fear and trembling, lest I should be compelled to join, under penalties of salt and water, but I had made up my mind, stoutly, to learn anything rather than get drunk, and so I had all the merit of a temperance martyr, without any of its disagreeables.

"Well," said I to myself, smiling in spirit, "what would my Charist friends say if they saw me here?" Not even Crosshwaite himself could find a flaw in the appreciation of merit for its own sake, the courtesy and condensation—ah! but he would complain of it, simply for being condensation." But, after all, what else could it be? Were not these men more experienced, more learned, older than myself? They were my superiors, it was in vain for me to attempt to hide it from myself. But the wonder was, that they themselves were the ones to appear utterly unenvious of it. They treated me as a equal, they welcomed me—the young vicar and the learned dean—on the broad ground of a common humanity, as I believe hundreds more of their class would do, if we did not ourselves take a pride in estimating them from us, telling them that fraternisation between our classes is impossible, and then cursing them for not fraternising with us. But of that, more hereafter.

At all events, now my bliss was perfect. No! I was wrong—a higher enjoyment than all awaited me, when, going into the drawing-room, I found Lillian singing at the piano. I had no idea that music was capable of expressing and conveying emotions so intense and ennobling. My experience was confined to strict music and to the howling at the chapel. And as yet, Mr. Hullah had not risen into a power more enviable than that of kings, and given to every workman a free entrance into the magic world of harmony and melody, where he may prove his brotherhood with Mozart and Weber, Beethoven and Mendelssohn. Great unconscious demagogue!—leader of the people, and labourer in the cause of divine equality!—thy reward is with thy Father of the people!

The luscious softness of the Italian airs overcame me with a delicious oblivion. Every note, every interval, each shade of expression spoke to me—I knew not what and yet they spoke to my heart of delights. A spirit out of the infinite heaven seemed calling to my spirit, which longed to answer and was dumb—and could only vent itself in tears, which welled unconsciously forth, and eased my heart from the painful tension of excitement.

* * *

Her voice is hovering o'er my soul—it lingers,
 Oershadowing it with soft and thrilling wings,
 The blood and life within those snowy fingers
 Teach witchcraft to the instrumental strings
 My brain is wild, my breath comes quick,
 The blood is lifting in my frame
 And thronging shudders, fast and thick
 Fall on my overflowing eyes
 My heart is quivering like a fluted,
 As morning dew that in the sunbeam dries,
 I am dissolved in those celestial strains.

The dark lady, Miss Stannton, as I ought to call her, saw my emotion, and, as I thought unkindly, checked the cause of it at once.

"Pray do not give us any more of those die-away Italian airs, Lillian. Sing some thing manful, German or English, or anything you like, except those sentimental wailings."

Lillian stopped, took another book, and commenced, after a short prelude, one of my own songs. Surprise and pleasure overpowered me more utterly than the soft southern melodies had done. I was on the point of springing up and leaving the room, when my impulses were checked by our host, who turned round, and stopped short in an oration on the geology of Upper Egypt.

"What's that about brotherhood and freedom, Lillian?" We don't want anything of that kind here."

"It's only a popular London song, papa," answered she, with an arch smile.

"Oh! likely to become so," added Miss Stannton, in her marked dogmatic tone.

"I'm very sorry for London, then." And he returned to the deacons.

CHAPTER XV

THE MAN OF SCIENCE.

AFTER breakfast the next morning, Lillian retired, saying laughingly, that she must go and see after her clothing club and her dear old woman at the almshouse, which, of course, made me look on her as more an angel than ever. And while George was left with Lord Lynedale, I was summoned to a private conference with the dean, in his study.

I found him in a room lined with cabinets of curiosities, and hung all over with strange bones, bones, and slabs of fossils. But I was not allowed much time to look about me, for he commenced at once on the subject of my studies, by asking me whether I was willing to prepare myself for the university by entering on the study of mathematics.

I felt so intense a repugnance to them, that at the risk of offending him—perhaps, for aught I knew, fatally—I dared to demur. He smiled—

"I am convinced, young man, that even if you intended to follow poetry as a profession—and a very poor one you will find it—yet you will never attain to any excellence therein, without the strictest mental discipline than any to which you have been accustomed. That is why I abominate our modern poets. They talk about the glory of the poetic vocation, as if they intended to be kings and world makers, and all the while they indulge themselves in the most loose and desultory habits of thought. Sir, if they really believed their own grandiloquent assumptions, they would find that the responsibility of their mental training was greater, not less, than anyone else's. Like the Quakers, they fancy that they honour inspiration by supposing it to be only extraordinary and proxysmic. The true poet, like the rational Christian, believing that inspiration is continual and orderly, that it reveals harmonious laws, not merely excites sudden emotions—You understand me?"

I did, tolerably, and subsequent conversations with him fixed the thoughts sufficiently in my mind, to make me pretty sure that I am giving a faithful verbal transcript of them.

"You must study some science. Have you read any logic?"

I mentioned Watts' "Logic," and Locke "On the Use of the Understanding"—two books well known to reading artisans.

"Ah," he said, "such books are very well, but they are merely popular. 'Aristotle,' 'Ritter on Induction,' and Kant's 'Prolegomena' and 'Logic'—when you had read them some seven or eight times over, you might consider yourself as knowing some what about the matter."

"I have read a little about induction in Whately."

"Ah, very good book, but popular. Did you find that your method of thought received any benefit from it?"

"The truth is—I do not know whether I can quite express myself clearly—but logic, like mathematics, seems to tell me too little about things. It does not enlarge my knowledge of man or nature, and those are what I thirst for. And you must remember—I hope I am not wrong in saying it—that the case of a man of your class, who has the power of travelling, of reading what he will, and seeing what he will, is very different from that of an artisan, whose chances of observation are so sadly limited. You must forgive us, if we are unwilling to spend our time over books which tell us nothing about the great universe outside the shop windows."

He smiled compassionately. "Very true, my boy. There are two branches of study, then, before you, and by either of them a competent subsistence is possible, with good interest. Philology is one. But in for you could arrive at those depths in it which connect with etymology, history, and geography, you would require a lifetime of study. There remains yet another. I see you stealing glances at those natural curiosities. In the study of them, you would find, as I believe more and more daily, a mental discipline superior even to that which language or mathematics give. If I had been blest with a son—but that is neither here nor there—it was my intention to have educated him almost entirely as a naturalist. I think I should like to try the experiment on a young man like yourself."

Sandy Mackay's definition of legislation for the masses, "First experimentum in corpore vihi," rose up in my thoughts, and, half unconsciously, pressed my lips. The good old man only smiled.

"That is not my reason, Mr. Locke. I should choose, by preference, a man of your class for experiments, not because the material is coarser, or less precious in the scale of creation, but because I have a notion, for which, like many others, I have been very much laughed at, that you are less sophisticated, more simple and fresh from Nature's laboratory, than the young persons of the upper classes who begin from the nursery to be more or less trimmed up, and painted over by the artificial state of society—a very excellent spite, mind, Mr. Locke. Civilization is, next to Christianity of course, the highest blessing, but not so good a state for trying anthropological experiments on."

I assured him of my gratitude to be the subject of such an experiment, and was encouraged by his smile to tell him something about my intense love for natural objects, the mysterious pleasure which I had taken, from my boyhood, in trying to classify them, and my visits to the British Museum, for the purpose of getting at some general knowledge of the natural groups.

"Excellent," he said, "young man, the very best sign I have yet seen in you. And what have you read on these subjects?" I mentioned several books—Bingley, Bewick, "Humboldt's Travels," "The Voyage of the Beagle," various scattered articles in the Penny and Saturday Magazines, &c. &c.

"Ah!" he said, "popular—you will find, if you will allow me to give you my experience—"

I assured him that I was only too much honoured and I truly felt so. I knew myself to be in the presence of my rightful superior—my master on that very point of education which I idolised. Every sentence which he spoke gave me fresh light on some matter or other, and I felt a worship for him, totally irrespective of any vulgar and slavish respect for his rank or wealth. The working man has no want for real reverence. Mr. Carlyle's homage a "gentleman" has not injured his influence with the people. On the contrary, it is the artisan's intense longing to find his real lords and guides which makes him despise and execrate his sham ones. Whereof let society take note.

"Then," continued he, "your plan is to take up some one section of the subject and thoroughly exhaust that. Universal laws manifest themselves only by particular instances. They say, man is the microcosm, Mr. Locke, but the man of science finds every worm and beetle a microcosm in its way. It exemplifies, directly or indirectly, every physical law in the universe, though it may not be two lines long. It is not only a part, but a mirror, of the great whole. It has a definite relation to the whole world, and the whole world has a relation to it. Really, by the bye, I cannot give you a better instance of what I mean, than in my little diary on the Goryon Trifurcifer, a small reptile which I found, some years ago, inhabiting the mud of the salt lakes of Balkhan, which fills up a long-desired link between the Chelonians and the Porosini branchiata Batrachians, and, as I think, though Professor Brown differs from me, connects both with the Ichthyosaurs (Cetacea).—Professor Brown is an exceedingly talented man, but a little too cautious in accepting anyone's theories but his own. There it is," he said, as he drew out of a drawer a little pamphlet of some thirty pages—"an old man's railing. I consider that book the outcome of thirteen years' labour."

"It must be very deep," I replied, "to have been worth such long continued study."

"Oh! science is her own reward. There is hardly a great physical law which I have not brought to bear on the subject of that one small animal, and above all—what is in itself worth a life's labour. I have, I believe, discovered two entirely new laws of my own, though one of them, by the bye, has been broached by Professor Brown since, in his lectures. He might have mentioned my name in connection with the subject, for I certainly imputed my ideas to him, two years at least before the delivery of those lectures of his. Professor Brown is a very great man, certainly, and a very good man, but not quite so original as is generally supposed. Still, a scientific man must expect his little disappointments and injustices. If you were behind the scenes in the scientific world, I can assure you, you would find as much party spirit, and unfairness, and jealousy, and emulation there, as anywhere else. Human nature, human nature, everywhere!"

I said nothing, but thought the more, and took the book, promising to study it carefully.

"There is Cuvier's 'Animal Kingdom,' and a dictionary of scientific terms to help you; and mind, it must be got up thoroughly, for I purpose to set you an examination or two in it, a few days hence. Then I shall find out whether you know what is worth all the information in the world."

"What is that, sir?"

"The art of getting information—artem ascendit, Mr. Locke, wherewith the world is badly provided just now, as it is over-stocked with the artem legends—the knack of running the eye over books, and fanning that it understands them, because it can talk about them. You cannot ply that trick with my Goryon Trifurcifer, I assure you, he is as dry and tough as his name. But, believe me, he is worth mastering, not because he is mine, but simply because he is tough."

I promised all diligence.

"Very good. And be sure, if you intend to be a poet for these days (and I really think you have some faculty for it), you must become a scientific man. Science has made vast strides, and introduced entirely new modes of looking at nature, and poets must live up to the age. I never read a word of Goethe's verse, but I am convinced that he must be the great poet of the day, just because he is the only one who has taken the trouble to go into the details of practical science. And, in the meantime, I will give you a lesson myself. I see you are longing to know the contents of these cabinets. You shall assist me by writing out the mummies of this lot of shells, just come from Australia, which I am now going to arrange."

I set to work at once, under his directions, and passed that morning, and the two or three following, delightfully. But I question whether the good dean would have well satisfied, had he known how all his scientific teaching confirmed my democratic opinions. The mere fact, that I could understand those things which they were set before me, as well as anyone else, was to me a simple demonstration of the equality in worth, and therefore in privilege, of all classes. It may be answered, that I had no right to argue from myself to the mob, and that other working gentlemen have no right to demand universal enfranchisement for the whole class, just because they, the exceptions, are fit for it. But surely it is hard to call such an error, if it be one, "the insolent assumption of democratic conceit," etc. etc. Does it not look more like the humility of men who are unwilling to assert for themselves peculiar excellence, peculiar privileges, who, like the apostles of old, want no glory, save that which they cannot share with the outcast and the slave? Let society, among other matters, take note of that.

CHAPTER XVI

CULTIVATED WOMEN.

I WAS thus brought in contact, for the first time in my life, with two exquisite specimens of cultivated womanhood, and they, naturally, as the reader may well suppose, almost entirely engrossed my thoughts and interest.

Lillian, for so I must call her, became daily more and more agreeable, and tried, as I fancied, to draw me out, and show me off to the best advantage, whether from the desire of pleasing herself, or pleasing me, I know not, and do not wish to know—but the consequences to my boyish vanity were such as are more easy to imagine than pleasant to describe. Miss Stanton, on the other hand, because, I thought, more and more unpleasant, not that she ever, for a moment, outstepped the bounds of the most perfect courtesy, but her manner, which was soft to no one except to Lord Langdale, was, when she spoke to me, especially dictatorial and abrupt. She seemed to make a point of carping at chance words of mine, and of setting me down suddenly, by breaking in with some severe, pithy observation, on conversations to which she had been listening unobserved. She seemed, too, to view with dislike anything like cordiality between me and Lillian—a dislike, which I was actually at moments vain enough (such a creature is man!) to attribute to jealousy!!! till I began to suspect and hate her, as a proud, haughty, and exclusive aristocrat. And my suspicions and hatred received their confirmation, when, one morning, after an evening even more charming than usual, Lillian came down, reserved, peevish, all but sulky, and showed that that bright heaven of sunny features had been in it for a cloud, and that unglory one. But I, poor fool, only pitied her, made up my mind that someone had ill-used her, and looked on her as a martyr—perhaps to that harsh cousin of hers.

That day was taken up with writing out answers to the deans' puzzling questions on his pamphlet, in which I believe, I acquitted myself tolerably, and he seemed far more satisfied with my commentary than I was with his text. He seemed to ignore utterly anything like religion, or even the very notion of God, in my claims of argument. Nature was spoken of as the willer and producer of all the marvels which he describes, and every word in the book, to my astonishment, might have been written, just as easily, by an Atheist, as by a dignitary of the Church of England.

I could not help, that evening hunting this defect, as delicately as I could, to my good host, and was somewhat surprised to find that he did not consider it a defect at all.

"I am in nowise anxious to weaken the antithesis between natural and revealed religion. Science may help the former, but it has absolutely nothing to do with the latter. She stands on her own ground, has her own laws, and is her own reward. Christianity is a matter of faith and of the teaching of the Church. It must not go out of its way for science, and science must not go out of her way for it, and where they seem to differ, it is our duty to believe that they are reconcilable by fuller knowledge, but not to clip truth in order to make it match with doctrine."

"Mr Carlyle," said Miss Stanton, in her abrupt way, "can see that the God of Nature is the God of man."

"Nobody denies that, my dear."

"Except in every word and action, else why do they not write about Nature as if it was the expression of a living, loving spirit, not merely a dead machine?"

"It may be very easy, my dear, for a Deist like Mr Carlyle to see his God in Nature, but if he would accept the truths of Christianity, he would find that there were deeper mysteries in them than trees and animals can explain."

"Pardon me, sir," I said, "but I think that a very large portion of thoughtful working men agree with you, though, in their case, that opinion has only increased their difficulties about Christianity. They complain, that they cannot identify the God of the Bible with the God of the world around them, and one of their great complaints against Christianity is, that it demands assent to mysteries which are independent of, and even contradictory to, the laws of Nature."

The old man was silent.

"Mr Carlyle is no Deist," said Miss Stanton, "and I am sure, that unless the truths of Christianity contrive soon to get themselves justified by the laws of science, the higher orders will believe in them as little as Mr Locke informs us that the working-class do."

"You prophesy confidently, my darling."

"Oh, Eleanor is in one of her prophetic moods to night," said Lillian, slyly. "She has been harping on me I know not what misery and misfortune, just because I choose to amuse myself in my own way."

And she gave another sly, pointing look at Eleanor, and then called me to look over some engravings chatting over them so charmingly!—and stealing every now and then, a pretty, sunny look at her cousin, which seemed to say, "I shall do what I like in spite of your predictions."

This confirmed my suspicions, that Eleanor had been trying to separate us, and the suspicion received a further confirmation, indirect, and perhaps very natural from the lecture which I got from my cousin after I went upstairs.

He had been flattering me very much lately about "the impression" I was making on the family, not tormenting me by compliments on the clever way in which I "played my cards," and when I denied indignantly any such intention, putting me on the back, and laughing me down in a knowing way, as much as to say that he was not to be taken in by my professions of simplicity. He seemed to judge everyone by himself, and to have no notion of any middle characters, between the mere greenhorn and the deliberate schemer. But to night, after commencing with the usual compliments, he went on:

"Now, first let me give you one hint, and be thankful for it. Mind your game with that Eleanor—Miss Staunton. She is a regular tyrant, I happen to know, a strong-minded woman, with a vengeance. She manages everyone here, and unless you are in her good books, don't expect to keep your footing in this house, my boy. So just mind and pay her a little more attention, and Miss Lillian a little less. After all, it is worth the trouble. She is uncommonly well read, and says confounded clever things too, when she wakes up out of the sulks, and you may pick up a wrinkle or two from her, worth pocketing. You mind what she says to you. You know she is going to be married to Lord Lyndale."

I nodded assent.

"Well, then, if you want to hook him, you must secure her first."

"I want to hook no one, George, I have told you that a thousand times."

"Oh no! certainly not—ly, no means! Why should you?" said the artful dodger. And he swung, laughing, out of the room, leaving in my mind a strange suspicion, of which I was ashamed, though I could not shake it off, that he had remarked Eleanor's wish to cool my admiration for Lillian, and was willing, for some purpose of his own, to further that wish. The truth is, I had very little respect for him, or trust in him, and I was learning to look, habitually, for some selfish motive in all he said or did. Perhaps, if I had acted more boldly upon what I did see, I should not have been here now.

CHAPTER XVII

SPERMOS IN STONES

THE next afternoon was the last but one of my stay at D. We were to dine late, after sunset, and, before dinner, we went into the cathedral. The choir had just finished practising. Certain exceedingly ill-looking men, whose faces bespoke principally sensuality and self-conceit, and whose function was that of praising God, on the sole qualification of good bass and tenor voices, were coming chattering through the choir gates and behind them, a group of small boys were suddenly transforming themselves from angels into sinners, by tearing off their white surplices, and pinching and poking each other noisily as they passed us, with as little reverence as Voltaire himself could have desired.

I had often been in the cathedral before—indeed, we attended the service daily, and I had been appalled, rather than astonished, by what I saw and heard—the unintelligible service—the uproarous gabble of the choristers and readers—the scanty congregation—the meagre portion of the vast building which seemed to be turned to any use—but never more than that evening, did I feel the desolateness, the dolorful utility, of that vast desert nave, with its aisles and transepts—built for some purpose or other now extinct. The whole place seemed to crush and sadden me, and I could not re-echo Lillian's remark—

"How those pillars, rising storey above storey, and those lines of pointed arches, all lead the eye heavenward! It is a beautiful rhetoric, that about-pointed architecture being symbolic of 'instantaneity'."

"I ought to be very much ashamed of my stupidity," I answered, "but I cannot feel that, though I believe I ought to do so. That vast ground roof, with its enormous weight of hanging stone, seems to crush one to bat out the free sky above. Those pointed windows, too, how gloriously the western sun is streaming through them! but their rich lines only dim and deface his light. I can feel what you say, when I look at the cathedral on the outside, there, indeed, every line sweeps the eye upward—carries it from one pinnacle to another, each with less and less standing ground, till at the summit the building gradually vanishes in a point, and leaves the spirit to wing its way unsupported and alone into the ether. Perhaps," I added, half bitterly, "these cathedrals may be true symbols of the superstition which created them—on the outside, offering to enfranchise the soul and raise it up to heaven, but when the dupes had entered, giving them only a dark prison, and a crushing bondage, which neither we nor our fathers have been able to bear."

"You may sneer at them, if you will, Mr. Locke," said Eleanor, in her severe, abrupt way. "The working-classes would have been badly off without them. They were, in their day, the only democratic institution in the world, and the only socialist one, too. The only chance a poor man had of rising by his worth, was by coming to the monastery. And bitterly the working-classes felt the want of them, when they fell. Your own Cobbett can tell you that."

"Ah!" said Lillian, "how different it must have been four hundred years ago!—how solemn and picturesque those old monks must have looked, gliding about the aisles! and how magnificent the choir must have been, before all the glass and carving, and that beautiful shrine of St * * *, blazing with gold and jewels, were all plundered and defiled by those horrid Puritans!"

"Say, Reformers! squires," answered Eleanor, "for it was they who did the thing, only it was found convenient, at the Restoration, to lay on the people of the seventeenth century the iniquities which the country gentlemen committed in the sixteenth."

"Surely," I added, emboldened by her words, "if the monasteries were what their admirers say, some method of restoring the good of the old system, without its evil, ought to be found, and would be found, if it were not—" I paused, recollecting whose guest I was.

"If it were not, I suppose," said Eleanor, "for those lazy, overfed, bigoted hypocrites, the clergy. That, I presume is the description of them to which you have been most accustomed. Now, let me ask you one question. Do you mean to condemn, just now, the Church as it was, or the Church as it ought to be? Radicals have a habit of confusing those three questions, as they have of confusing other things when it suits them."

"Really," I said, "for me, blood was rising—" I do think that, with the confessed enormous wealth of the clergy, the cathedral establishments especially, they might do more for the people."

"Listen to me a little, Mr Locke. The lady now always takes a pride in speaking evil of the clergy, never seeing that if they are bad, the lady has made them so. Why, what do you impute to them? Their worldliness, their being like the world, like the lady would them—like you, in short? Improve yourselves, and by so doing, if there is this sad tendency in the clergy to imitate you, you will mend them, if you do not find that, after all, it is they who will have to mend you. 'As with the people, so with the priest,' is the existing law. When, fifty years ago, all classes were drunkards, from the aristocrat to the peasant, the clergy were drunken also, but not half as bad as the lady. Now the lady are eaten up with covetousness and ambition, and the clergy are covetous and ambitious, but not half as bad as the lady. The lady, and you working-men especially, are the slaves of frothy, insincere, official rant, as Mr Carlyle would call it, in Parliament, on the hustings, at every debating society and Chartist meeting, and therefore the clergyman's sermons are apt to be just what people like elsewhere, and what, therefore, they suppose people will like there."

"If, then," I answered, "in spite of your opinions, you confess the clergy to be so bad, why are you so angry with men of our opinions, if we do plot sometimes a little against the Church?"

"I do not think you know what my opinions are, Mr Locke. Did you not hear me just now praising the monasteries, because they were socialist and democratic? But why is the badness of the clergy any reason for pulling down the Church? That is another of the confused rationalities into which you all allow yourselves to fall. What do you mean by crying shame on a man for being a bad clergyman, if a good clergyman is not a good thing? If the very idea of a clergyman was abominable, as your Church destroyers ought to say, you ought to praise a man for being a bad one, and not acting out this same abominable idea of priesthood. Your very outcry against the sins of the clergy shows that, even in your minds, a diminution lies somewhere that a clergyman's vocation is, in itself, a divine, a holy, a beneficent one."

"I never looked at it in that light, certainly," said I, somewhat staggered.

"Very likely not. One word more, for I may not have another opportunity of speaking to you as I would on these matters. You working-men complain of the clergy for being bigoted and obscurantist, and hating the cause of the people. Does not nine-tenths of the blame of that lie at your door? I took up, the other day, the Standard, one of your favourite liberty-preaching newspapers, and I saw books advertised in it, whose names no modest woman should ever behold. Doctrines and practices advocated in it, from which all the honesty, the decency, the common human feeling which is left in the English mind, ought to revolt, and does revolt. You cannot deny it. Your class has told the world that the cause of liberty, equality, and fraternity, the cause which the working masses claim as theirs, identifies itself with blasphemy and indecency, with the tyrannous persecutions of traitors, thieves, with robbery, assassination, vitriol bottles, and midnight incendiarism. And then you censure the clergy for taking you at your word! Whatsoever they do, you attack them. If they believe you, and stand up for common morality, and for the truths which they know are all important to poor as well as rich, you call them bigots and persecutors, while, if they neglect, in any way, the very Christianity for believing which you insult them, you turn round and call them hypocrites. Mark my words, Mr Locke,—till you gain the respect and confidence of the clergy, you will never rise. The day will come when you will find that the clergy are the only class who can help you. Ah, you may shake your head. I warn you of it. They were the only bulwark of the poor against the medieval tyranny of Rank; you will find them the only bulwark against the modern tyranny of Mammon."

I was on the point of entreating her to explain herself further, but at that critical moment Lillian interposed.

"Now, stay your prophetic glances into the future, boys come Lyneditch and papa!" And in a moment, Eleanor's whole manner and countenance altered—the potent, wild, earnest, the harsh, dictatorial tone vanished, and she turned to meet her lover, with a look of tender, satisfied devotion, which transfigured her whole face. It was most strange, the power he had over her. His presence, even at a distance, seemed to fill her whole being with rich quiet life. She watched him with folded hands, like a mystic worshipper, waiting for the aditans of the spirit, and, suspicious and angry as I felt towards her, I could not help being drawn to her by this revelation of depths of strong healthy feeling, of which her usual manner gave so little sign.

This conversation thoroughly puzzled me, it showed me that there might be two sides to the question of the people's cause, as well as to that of others. It shook a little my faith in the infallibility of my own class, to hear such severe animadversions on them, from a person who professed herself as much a disciple of Carlyle as any working man, and who evidently had no lack, either of intellect to comprehend, or boldness to speak out, his doctrines, who could praise the old monasteries for being democratic and socialist, and spoke far more severely of the clergy than I could have done—because she did not deal merely in true words of abuse, but showed a real analytic insight into the causes of their shortcoming.

That same evening, the conversation happened to turn on dress, of which Miss Staunton spoke scornfully and disparagingly, as mere useless vanity and frippery—an empty substitute for real beauty of person as well as the higher beauty of mind. And I, emboldened by the courtesy with which I was always called on to take my share in everything that was said or done, ventured to object, humbly enough, to her notions.

"But is not beauty," I said, "in itself a good and blessed thing, softening, cheering, rejoicing the eyes of all who behold?" (and my eyes, as I spoke, involuntarily rested on Lillian's face—who saw it, and blushed.) "Surely nothing which helps beauty is to be despised. And, without the chains of dress, beauty, even that of expression, does not really do itself justice. How many lovely and lovable faces there are, for instance, among the working classes, which, if they had but the advantages which ladies possess, might create delight, respect, chivalrous worship, in the beholder. But are now never appreciated, because they have not the same fair means of displaying themselves which even the savage girl of the South Sea Islands possesses!"

Lillian said it was so very true—she had really never thought of it before—and, somehow, I gained courage to go on.

"Beauty, dress is a sort of sacrament, if I may use the word—a sure sign of the wearer's character; according as anyone is orderly, or modest, or tasteful, or joyous, or brilliant"—and I glanced again at Lillian—"those excellencies, or the want of them, are sure to show themselves, in the colours they choose, and the cut of their garments. In the workroom, I and a friend of mine used often to amuse ourselves over the clothes we were making, by speculating from them on the sort of people the wearers were to be, and I fancy we were not often wrong."

My cousin looked daggers at me, and for a moment I fancied I had committed a dreadful mistake in mentioning my tailor life. So I had in his eyes, but not in those of the really well-bred persons round me.

"Oh, how very amusing it must have been!" I think I shall turn milliner, Eleanor, for the fun of divining everyone's little failings from their caps and gown!"

"Go on, Mr. Locke," said the dean, who had seemed buried in the "Transactions of the Royal Society." "The fact is novel, and I am more obliged to anyone who gives me that, than if he gave me a bank note. The money gets spent and done with; but I cannot spend the fact, it remains for life as permanent capital, returning interest and compound interest ad infinitum." By the bye, tell me about those same workshops. I have heard more about them than I like to believe true."

And I did tell him all about them, and spoke, my blood rising as I went on, long and earnestly, perhaps eloquently. Now and then I got abashed, and tried to stop, and then the dean informed me that I was speaking well and sensibly, while Lillian entreated me to go on. She had never conceived such things possible—it was as interesting as a novel, etc. etc., and Miss Staunton sat with compressed lips and frowning brow, apparently thinking of nothing but her book, till I felt quite angry at her apathy—for such it seemed to me to be.

CHAPTER XVIII

AND now the last day of our stay at D * * * had arrived, and I had as yet heard nothing of the prospects of my book. I thought, indeed, the company in which I had found myself had driven literary ambition, for the time being, out of my head, and bewitched me to float down the stream of daily circumstance, satisfied to snatch the enjoyment of each present moment. That morning, however, after I had fulfilled my daily task of arranging and naming objects of natural history, the dean settled himself back in his arm-chair, and bidding me sit down, evidently meditated a business conversation.

He had heard from his publisher, and read his letter to me. "The poems were on the whole much liked. The most satisfactory method of publishing for all parties would be by procuring so many subscribers, each agreeing to take so many copies. In consultation of the dean's known literary judgment and great influence, the publisher would, as a private favour, not object to take the risk of any further expenses."

So far everything sounded charming. The method was not a very independent one, but it was the only one, and I should actually have the delight of having published a volume. But, alas! "he thought that the sale of the book might be greatly facilitated, if certain passages of a strong political tendency were omitted. He did not wish personally to object to them as statements of facts, or to the pictorial vigour with which they were expressed, but he thought that they were somewhat too strong for the present state of the public taste, and though he should be the last to allow any private considerations to influence his weak patronage of rising talent, yet, considering his present connection, he should hardly wish to take on himself the responsibility of publishing such passages, unless with great modifications."

"You see," said the good old man, "the opinion of respectable practical men, who know the world, exactly coincides with mine. I did not like to tell you that I could not help in the publication of your MSS. in their present state, but I am sure, from the modesty and gentleness which I have remarked in you, your readiness to listen to reason, and your pleasing freedom from all violence or consciousness in expressing your opinions, that you will not object to so exceedingly reasonable a request, which, after all, is only for your good. Ah 'young man,' he went on, in a more feeling tone than I had yet heard from him, "if you were once embroiled in the political world, of which you know so little, you would soon be crying like David, 'Oh that I had wings like a dove, then would I fly away and be at rest.' Do you fancy that you can alter a fallen world? What it is, it always has been, and will be to the end. Every age has its political and social noxums, my dear young man, and fancies them infallible, and the next generation arises to cure them as failures in practice, and superfluous in theory, and try some new nostrum of its own."

I sighed.

"Ah! you may sigh. But we have each of us to be disenchanted of our dream. There was a time once when I talked republicanism as loudly as any youth ever did when I had an excuse for it, too; for when I was a boy, I saw the French Revolution, and it was no wonder if young, enthusiastic brains were excited by all sorts of wild hopes—"perfectibility of the species," "rights of man," "universal liberty, equality, and brotherhood"—My dear sir, there is nothing now under the sun; all that, is stale and trite to a septuagenarian, who has seen where it all ends. I speak to you freely, because I am deeply interested in you. I feel that this is the important question of your life, and that you have talents, the possession of which is a heavy responsibility. Eschew politics, once and for all, as I have done. I might have been, I may tell you, a bishop at this moment, if I had condescended to meddle again in those party questions of which my youthful experience sickened me. But I know that I should only weaken my own influence, as that most noble and excellent man, Dr. Arnold did, by interfering in politics. The poet, like the clergyman and the philosopher, has nothing to do with politics. Let them choose the bitter part, and it shall not be taken from them. The world may rave," he continued, waving eloquent as he approached his favourite subject—"the world may rave, but in the study there is quiet. The world may change, Mr. Locke, and will, but 'the earth abideth forever.' Solomon had seen somewhat of politics, and social improvement, and so on, and behold, then, as now, 'all was vanity and vexation of spirit.' That which is crooked cannot be made straight, and that which is wanting cannot be numbered. What profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the sun? 'In thing which hath been, it is that which shall be, and there is no new thing under the sun.' One generation passeth away, and another cometh, but the earth abideth forever.' No wonder that the wisest of men took refuge from such experience, as I have tried to do, in talking of old herbs, from the cedar of Lebanon to the hyssop that groweth on the wall."

"Ah! Mr. Locke," he went on, in a soft, melancholy, half abstracted tone—"ah! Mr. Locke, I have felt deeply, and you will feel some day, the truth of Jarno's saying in 'Wilhelm Meister,' when he was wandering alone in the Alps, with his geological hammer, 'These rocks, at least, tell me no lies, as men do.' Ay, there is no lie in Nature, no discord in the revelations of science, in the laws of the universe. Infinite, pure, unfallen, earth-supporting Titans, fresh as on the morning of creation, those great laws endure, you only true demerits, too—for nothing is too great or too small for them to take note of. No trust great, or speck of dust, but they feel it, guide it, and preserve it—Hail and snow, wind and vapour, fulfilling their Maker's word, and like him, too, hiding themselves from the wise and prudent, and revealing themselves unto babes. Yes, Mr. Locke, it is the childlike, simple, patient, reverent heart, which science at once demands and cultivates. To pre- judge or haste, to self conceit or nihilism, she proudly shuts her treasures - to open them to men of humble heart, whom this world thinks simple dreamers - let Newton, and Owens, and Faraday. Why should you not become such a man as they? You have the talents—you have the love for Nature, you seem to have the gentle and patient spirit, which, indeed, will grow up more and more in you, if you become a real student of science. Or, if you must be a poet, why not sing of Nature, and leave those to sing political squabbles, who have no eye for the beauty of her repose? How few great poets have been politicians?

I gently suggested Milton.

"Ay," he became a great poet only when he had deserted politics, but now they had deserted him. In blindness and poverty, in the utter failure of all his national theories, he wrote the works which have made him immortal. Was Shakespeare a politician? or any one of the great poets who have arisen during the last thirty years? Have they not all seemed to consider it a sacred duty to keep themselves, as far as they could, out of party strife?"

I quoted Southey, Shelley, and Burns, as instances to the contrary, but his induction was completed already, to his own satisfaction.

"Poor dear Southey was a great versemaker, rather than a great poet; and I always consider his party prejudices and party writing narrowed and hardened a mind which ought to have been flowing forth freely and lovingly towards all forms of life. And as for Shelley and Burns, their politics dictated to them at once the worst portions of their poetry and of their practice. Shelley, what little I have read of him, only seems himself when he forgets Radicalism for Nature, and you would not set Burns's life or death, either, as a model for imitation in any class. Now, do you know, I must ask you to leave me a little. I am somewhat fatigued with this long discussion" (in which, certainly, I had borne no great share), "and I am sure, that after all I have said, you will see the propriety of acceding to the publisher's advice. Go and think over it, and let me have your answer by post to-morrow."

I did go and think over it too long for my good. If I had acted on the first impulse I should have refused, and been safe. Those passages were the very pith and marrow of the poems. They were the very words which I felt it my duty, my glory, to utter. I, who had been a working-man, who had experienced all then sorrows and temptations—I, seemed called by every circumstance of my life to preach their cause, to expose their wrongs, I, to quash my convictions, to stultify my look, for the sake of popularity, money, patronage! And yet—all that involved seeing more of Lillian. They were only too powerful inducements in themselves, alas! but I believe I could have resisted them tolerably, if they had not been backed by love. And so a struggle arose, which the rich reader may think a very fantastic one, though the poor man will understand it, and surely pardon it also—being that he himself is Man. Would I not, just once in a way, serve God and Mammon at once?—or rather, not Mammon, but Venus—a worship which looked to me, and really was, in my case, purer than all the Modesty in Popedom. After all, the fall might not be so great as it seemed—perhaps I was not infallible on these same points (it is wonderful how humble and self-deny-ing one becomes when one is afraid of doing one's duty). Perhaps the dean might be right. He had been republican himself once, certainly. The facts, indeed, which I had stated, there could be no doubt of, but I might have viewed them through a prejudiced and angry medium—I might have been not quite logical in my deductions from them—I might, in short, between "perhapses" and "mights," I fell—a very deep, cold, damnable fall, and consented to emendulate my poems, and become a flunkey and a dastard.

I mentioned my consent that evening to the party, the dean purred content thereat. Eleanor, to my astonishment, just said, sternly and abruptly,

"Weak!" and then turned away, while Lillian began

"Oh! what a pity! And really they were some of the prettiest verses of all! But of course my father must know best, you are quite right to be guided by him, and do whatever is proper and prudent. After all, papa, I have got the naughtiest of them all, you know, safe. Eleanor set it to music, and wrote it out in her book, and I thought it so charming that I copied it."

What Lillian said about herself, I drank in as greedily as usual, what she said about Eleanor fell on a heedless ear, and vanished, not to reappear in my recollection till—But I must not anticipate.

So it was all settled pleasantly, and I sat up that evening, writing a bit of verse for Lillian, about the Old Cathedral, and "Hewen aspiring towers," and "Angles of cloistered shade," and all that sort of thing, which I did not believe, or care for, but I thought it would please her, and so it did, and I got golden smiles and compliments for my first, though not my last, immature poem. I was going fast downhill, in my hurry to rise. However, as I said, it was all pleasant enough. I was to return to town, and there await the dean's orders, and, most luckily, I had received that morning from Sandy Mackaye a characteristic letter.

"Gowk, Tolmachins, hearken! Item 1. Ye'r fou wi' the Cheean cap, aneath the shade o' shawl hats and storple-houses.

"Item 2. I, euf-Mentor that I am, wearing out a gude pair o' Scots brogues, that my sister's husband's third cousin sent me a towmond gane fra Aberdeen, running ower the town to a journals, respectable and ither, anent the sellin' o' your 'Autobiographly of an Engine-Bailer in the Vauxhall road, the whilk I ha' disposit' at the last, to O'Flynn's Weekly Watchdog, and gin ye ha' any mair sic trash in your head, ye may gae your meal whiles out o' the same kist, unless, as I said misdonit, ye're praying already, like Eli's bauns, 'to be put into one o' the priest's offices, that ye may eat a piece o' bread.'

"Ye'll be coming the morrow? I'm lane without ye, though I look for ye surely to come ben wi' a gawd shoulder knot, and a red nose."

This letter, though it hit me hard, and made me, I confess, a little angry at the moment with my trust friend, still offered me a means of subsistence, and enabled me to decline sily the pecuniary aid which I dreaded the dean's offering me. And yet I felt disappointed and ill at ease. My conscience would not let me enjoy the success I felt I had attained. But next morning I saw Talman, and I forgot looks, people's cause, conscience, and everything.

I went home by coach—a luxury on which my cousin insisted—as he did on lending me the fare, so that in all I owed him somewhat more than eleven pounds. But I was too happy to care for a fresh debt, and home I went, considering my fortune made.

My heart fell, as I stepped into the dingy little old shop. Was it the meanness of the place, after the comfort and elegance of my late abode? Was it disappointment at not finding Mackaye at home? Or was it that black-edged letter which lay waiting for me on the table? I was afraid to open it, I knew not why. I turned it over and over several times, trying to guess whose the handwriting on the cover might be; the postmark was two days old, and at last I broke the seal.

"SIR,—This is to inform you, that your mother, Mrs. Locke, died this morning, a sensible woman, not without assurance of her election, and that her funeral is fixed for Wednesday, the 29th instant."

"The humble servant of the Lord's people,
"J. WIGGINTON."

CHAPTER XIX.

SHORT AND SAD.

I SHALL pass over the agonies of the next few days. There is self-exaltation enough and to spare in my story, without dilating on them. They are too sacred to publish, and too painful, alas! even to recall. I write my story, too, as a working-man. Of those emotions which are common to humanity, I shall say but little—except when it is necessary to prove that the working-man has feelings like the rest of his kind. But those feelings may, in this case, be supplied by the reader's own imagination. Let him represent them to himself as bitter, as remorseful as he will, he will not equal the reality. True, she had cast me off, but had I not rejoiced in that rejection which should have been my shame? True, I had fed on the hope of some day winning reconciliation, by winning fame, but before the fame had arrived, the reconciliation had become impossible. I had shrunk from going back to her, as I ought to have done, in blind humility, and, therefore, I was not allowed to go back to her in the pride of success. Heaven knows, I had not forgotten her. Night and day I had thought of her with prayers and blessings, but I had made no mention of my own love to her—my forgiveness of her, as I dared to call it. I had projected my concert with the notion that I was a martyr in the cause of genius and enlightenment. How hollow, windy, heartless, all that looked now. There! I will say no more. Heaven preserve any who read these pages from such days and nights as I dragged on till that funeral, and for weeks after it was over, when I had sat once more in the little old chapel, with all the memories of my child hood crowding up, and tantalising me with the vision of their simple peace—never, never to return! I heard my mother's dying prayers, her doubts, her agonies, for my reprobate soul, disordered for the public good by my old enemy, Mr. Wigginton, who dragged in, among his fulsome eulogies of my mother's "signs of grace, in poems that there were 'halves span long in hell.' I saw my sister Susan, now a tall, handsome woman, but become all rigid, somn, with coarse grim lips, and that crushed, self-conscious, reserved, almost dishonest look about the eyes, common to fineries of every creed. I heard her cold farewell, as she put into my hands certain notes and dainties of my mother's, which she had bequeathed to me on her deathbed. I heard myself proclaimed inheritor of some small matters of furniture, which had belonged to her, told Susan, carelessly, to keep them for herself, and went forth, fancying that the curse of Cain was on my brow.

I took home the diary, but several days elapsed before I had courage to open it. Let the words I read there be as secret as the misery which dictated them. I had broken my mother's heart? no! I had not! The internal superstition which taught her to fancy that Heaven's love was narrower than her own—that God could hate His creature, not for its sins, but for the very nature which He had given it—that, that had killed her! And I remarked, too, with a gleam of hope, that in several places where sunshine seemed ready to break through the black cloud of fanatic gloom—where she seemed inclined not merely to melt towards me (for there was, in every page, an under-current of love, deeper than death, and stronger than the grave), but also to dare to trust that on my behalf—behold lines carefully erased, page after page torn out, evidently long after the MSS were written. I believe, to this day, that either my poor sister or her father confessor was the perpetrator of that act. The frans pia is not yet extinct, and it is as inconvenient now as it was in popish times, to tell the whole truth about saints, when they dare to say or do things which will not quite fit into the formulae of their sect.

But what was to become of Susan? Though my uncle continued to her the allowance which he had made to my mother, yet I was her natural protector—and she was my only tie on earth. Was I to lose her, too? Might we not, after all, be happy together, in some little hole in Chelsea, like Elia and his Bridget? That question was solved for me. She declined my offers, saying, that she could not live with anyone whose religious opinions differed from her own, and that she had already engaged a room at the house of a Christian friend, and was shortly to be united to that dear man of God, Mr Wigginton, who was to be removed to the work of the Lord in Manchester.

I knew the scoundrel, but it would have been impossible for me to undecieve her. Perhaps he was only a scoundrel: perhaps he would not ill treat her. And yet—my own little Susan! my playfellow! my only tie on earth!—to lose her—and not only her, but her respect, her love!—And my spirit, deep enough already, sank deeper still into sadness, and I felt myself alone on earth, and clung to Mackaye as to a father—and a father indeed that old man was to me!

CHAPTER XX.

PEGASUS IN HARNESS.

BUT, in sorrow or in joy, I had to earn my bread, and so, too, had Crossthwaite, poor fellow! How he contrived to feed himself and his little Katie for the next few years, is more than I can tell, at all events, he worked hard enough. He scribbled, agitated, ran from London to Manchester, and Manchester to Bradford, spouting, lecturing—sowing the First wind, I am afraid, and little more. Whose fault was it? What could such a man do, with that fevered tongue, and heart, and brain of his, in such a station as his, such a time as this? Society had helped to make him an agitator. Society has had, more or less, to take the consequences of her own handiwork. For Crossthwaite did not speak without heartiness. He could make the voice, shrewd, satirical nature flash out into fire—not always celestial, nor always, either, infernal. So he agitated, and lived—how, I know not. That he did do so is evident from the fact that he and Katie are at this moment playing chess in the cabin, before my eyes, and making love, all the while, as if they had not been married a week. Ah, well!

I, however, had to do more than get my bread. I had to pay off those fearful eleven pounds odd, which, now that all the excitement of my stay at D had been so sadly quenched, lay like lead upon my memory. My list of subscribers killed slowly, and I had no power of increasing it, by any canvassings of my own. My uncle, indeed, had promised to take two copies, and my cousin one, not wishing, of course, to be so uncomfortable as to run any risk, before they had seen whether my poems would succeed. But, with those exceptions, the dean had it all his own way, and he could not be expected to forgo his own literary labours for my sake, so, through all that glaring summer, and sad foggy autumn, and mopping winter, I had to get my bread as I best could by my pen. Mackaye grumbled at my writing so much, and so fast, and sneered about the furor scribendi. But it was hardly fair upon me. "My mouth craved it of me," as Solomon says. I had really no other means of livelihood. Even if I could have got employment as a tailor, in the honourable trade, I loathed the business utterly—perhaps, alas! to confess the truth, I was beginning to despise it. I could bear to think of myself as a poor genius, in connection with my now wealthy and high-bred patrons, for there was precedent for the thing. Pinnless bards and squires of low degree, low-born artists, ennobled by their pictures—there was something grand in the notion of mind triumphant over the inequalities of rank, and associating with the great and wealthy, as their spiritual equal, on the mere footing of its own innate nobility, no matter to what den it might return, to convert it into a temple of the Muses, by the glorious creations of its fancy, etc etc. But to go back daily from the drawing room and the publishers to the goose and the shop board, was too much for my weakness, even if it had been physically possible, as, thank Heaven, it was not.

So I became a hack writer, and sorrowfully, but deliberately, "put my Pegasus into heavy harness," as my betters had done before me. It was miserable work, there is no denying it—only not worse than tailoring. To try and serve God and Mammon too, to make miserable compromises daily, between the two great incompatibilities, what was time, and what would pay, to speak my mind, in fear and trembling, by hints, and halves, and quarters, to be daily hauling poor truth just up to the top of her well, and then, frightened at my own success, let her plump down again to the bottom, to sit there, trying to teach others, while my mind was in a whirl of doubt, to feed others' intellects, while my own wore bungeeing, to grind on in the Philistine's null, or occasionally make sport for them, like some weary hearted clown grinning in a pantomime, in a "light attack," as blind as Samson, but not, alas! as strong, for indeed my Delilah of the West End had clipped my locks, and there seemed little chance of their growing again. That face and that drawing-room lifted before me from morning till eve, and enervated and distracted my already over-wearied brain.

I had no time, besides, to concentrate my thoughts sufficiently for poetry, no time to wait for inspiration. From the moment I had swallowed my breakfast, I had to sit scribbling off my thoughts anyhow in prose, and soon my own scanty stock was exhausted, and I was forced to beg, borrow, and steal notions and facts, wherever I could get them. Oh! the misery of having to read, not what I longed to know, but what I thought would pay! to skip page after page of interesting matter, just to pick out a single thought or sentence which could be stitched into my patchwork! and then the still greater misery of seeing the article which I had sent to press a tolerably healthy and lusty bantling, appear in print next week, after suffering the inquisition-tortures of the editorial censorship, all maimed, and squinting, and one-sided, with the colour rubbed off its poor cheeks, and generally a villainous lung dog look of ferocity, so different from its birth smile that I often did not know my own child again!—and then, when I dared to remonstrate, however feebly, to be told, by way of comfort, that the public taste must be consulted! It gave me a hopeful notion of the said taste, certainly, and often and often I groined in spirit over the temper of my own class, which not only submitted to, but demanded, such one-sided bigotry, patience, and ferocity, from those who set up as its guides and teachers.

Mr. O'Flynn, editor of the Beekly Bee-whoop, whose white slave I now found myself, was, I am afraid, a pretty faithful specimen of that class, as it existed before the bitter lesson of the 10th of April brought the Chartist working men and the Chartist press to their senses. Thereon sprang up a new race of papers, whose moral tone, whatever may be thought of their political or doctrinal opinions, was certainly not inferior to that of the Wing and Tory press. The Commonwealth, the Standard of Freedom, the Plain Speaker, were reprobates, if to be a Chartist is to be a reprobate! but none except the most one-sided bigots could deny them the praise of a stern morality and a lofty earnestness, a hatred of evil and a craving after good, which would often put to shame many a paper among the oracles of Belgrave and Exeter Hall. But those were the days of liberty and O'Flynn. Not that the man was an unredeemed scoundrel. He was no more profligate, either in his literary or his private morals, than many a man who earns his hundreds, sometimes his thousands, a year, by proplisying smooth things to Minnion, crying in daily leaders, "Peace! peace!" when there is no peace, and daubing the rotten walls of careless luxury and self-anti-hed covetousness with the untempered mortar of party statistics and garbled foreign news—till "the storm shall fall, and the breaking thereof cometh suddenly in an instant." Let those of the respectable press who are without sin cast the first stone at the most respectable. Many of the latter class, who have been branded as traitors and villains, were single minded, earnest, valiant men, and, as for even O'Flynn, and those worse than him, what was really the matter with them was, that they were too honest. They spoke out too much of their whole minds. Bewildered, like I am, amid the social storm, they had determined, like him, to become "unsophisticated," "to owe the world no silk, the cat no perfume" seeing, indeed, that if they had, they could not have paid for them, so they tore off, of their own will, the peacock's feathers of gentility, the sheep's clothing of moderation, even the fig leaves of decent reticence, and became just what they really were—just what hundreds more would become, who now sit in the high places of the earth, if it paid them as well to be unrespectable as it does to be respectable, if the selfishness and covetousness, bigotry and ferocity, which are in them, and more or less in every man, had happened to enlist them against existing evils, instead of for them. O'Flynn would have been gladly as respectable as they, but, in the first place, he must have starved, and, in the second place, he must have lied, for he believed in his own Radicalism with his whole soul. There was a noble sincerity, a frantic courage in the man. He always spoke the truth when it suited him, and very often when it did not. He did see, which is more than all do, that oppression is oppression, and humbug, humbug. He had faced the gallows before now, without flinching. He had spouted rebellion in the Birmingham Belling, and elsewhere, and taken the consequences like a man, while his colleagues left them dupes to the tender mercies of broadswords and bayonets, and decamped in the disguise of sailors, old women, and dissenting preachers. He had sat three months in Lancaster Castle, the Bastille of England, one day perhaps to fall like that Parisian one, for a libel which he never wrote, because he would not betray his cowardly contributor. He had twice pleaded his own cause without help of attorney, and showed himself as practised in every law quibble and practical cheat as if he had been a regularly ordained priest of the blue-bag, and each time, when hunted at last into a corner, had turned valiantly to bay, with wild, witty Irish eloquence, "worthily," as the press say of poor misguided Mitchell,

"of a better cause." Altogether, a much-enduring Ulysses, unscrupulous, tough hided, ready to do and suffer anything fair or foul, for what he honestly believed—if a confused, virulent positiveness be worthy of the name "belief"—to be the true and righteous cause.

Those who class all mankind compendiously and comfortably under the two exhaustive species of saints and villains, may consider such a description garbled and impossible. I have seen few men, but never yet met I among those few either perfect saint or perfect villain. I draw such as I have found them inconsistent, piecemeal, better than their own actions, worse than their own opinions, and I put O Flynn among the rest. Not that there were no questionable spots in the sun of his fair fame. It was whispered that he had in all times done dirty work for Dublin Castle bureaucrats—nay, that he had even, in a very hard season, written court poetry for the Morning Post, but all these little peccadillos he carefully veiled in that kindly mist which hung over his youthful years. He had been a medical student, and got plucked, his fees declared, in his examination. He had set up a savings bank, which broke. He had come over from Ireland, to agitate for "repulse" and "out," and, like a wise man as he was, had never gone back again. He had set up three or four papers in his time, and entered into partnership with every leading democrat in turn, but his papers failed, and he quarrelled with his partners, being addicted to profane swearing and personalities. And now at last, after Ulysses wanderings, he had found rest in the office of the Weekly Worker, if rest it could be called, that perennial hurricane of plotting, ruling, sneering, and dishonesty, in which he lived, never writing a line, on principle, till he had worked himself up into a passion.

I will dwell no more on so distasteful a subject. Such leaders, let us hope, belong only to the past—to the youthful self-will and licentiousness of democracy; and as for reviling O'Flynn, or any other of his class, no man has less right than myself. I fear, to cast stones at such as they. I felt as low as almost any, beneath the besetting sins of my class, and shall I take merit to myself, because God has shown me, a little earlier perhaps than to them, somewhat more of the true duties and destinies of The Many? Oh, that they could see the depths of my affection to them! Oh, that they could see the shame and self-abasement with which, in rebuking their sins, I confess my own! If they are apt to be flippant and bitter, so was I. If they list to destroy, without knowing what to build up instead, so did I. If they make an almighty idol of that Electoral Reform, which ought to be, and can be, only a preliminary means, and expect final deliverance from "their twenty thousandth part of a taler in the national pulaver," so did I. Unhealthy and noisome as was the literary atmosphere in which I now found myself, it was one to my taste. The very contrast between the peaceful, intellectual luxury which I had just witnessed, and the misery of my class and myself, quickened my delight in it. In littleness, in sheer envy, I threw my whole soul into it, and spoke evil, and rejoiced in evil. It was so easy to find fault! It pampered my own self-conceit, my own discontent, while it saved me the trouble of inventing remedies. Yes, it was indeed easy to find fault. "The world was all before me, where to choose." In such a disorganised, anomalous, grumbling, party-embittered element as this English society, and its twin propensities and luxury, I had but to look straight before me to see my prey.

And thus I became daily more and more cynical, fierce, reckless. My mouth was filled with cursing and too often justly. And all the while, like tens of thousands of my class, I had no man to touch me. Sheep scattered on the hills, we were, that had no shepherd. What wonder if our bones lay bleaching among rocks and figurines, and wolves devour the heritage of God?

MacKay had nothing positive, after all, to advise or propound. His wisdom was one of apophthegms and maxims, utterly impractical, too often merely negative, as was his creed, which, though he refused to be classed with any set, was really a somewhat undeveloped Unitarianism—or rather Islamism. He could say, with the old Muslim, "God is great who hath resisted his will." And he believed what he said, and lived moral and pure, reverent and self-denying, by that belief, as the best Muslim did. But that was not enough.

"Not enough? Merely negative?"

No—that was positive enough, and mighty, but I repeat it, it was not enough. He felt it so himself, for he grew daily more and more cynical, more and more hopeless about the prospects of his class and of all humanity. Why not? Poor suffering wretches! what is it to them to know that "God is great" unless you can prove to them that God is also merciful? Did He indeed care for men at all? was what I longed to know, was all this misery and misrule around us His will—His stern and necessary law—His lazy connivance? And were we to free ourselves from it by any frantic means that came to hand? or had He ever interfered Himself? Was there a chance, a hope, of His interfering now, in our own time, to take the matter into His own hand, and come out of His place to judge the earth in righteousness? That was what we wanted to know, and poor MacKay could give no comfort there. "God was great—the wicked would be turned into hell." Ay—the few wiful, triumphed wicked; but the millions of suffering, starving wicked, the victims of society and circumstance—what hope for them? "God was great." And for the clergy, our professed and salaried teachers, all I can say is—and there are tens, perhaps hundreds of thousands of workmen who can re-echo my words—with the exception of the dean and my cousin, and one who shall be mentioned hereafter, a clergyman never spoke to me in my life.

Why should he? Was I not a Chartist and an Infidel? The truth is, the clergy are afraid of us. To read the Dispatch is to be excommunicated. Young men's classes? None to them, however few they are—however, hampered by the restrictions of religious bigotry and political cowardice. But the working men, whether rightly or wrongly, do not trust them; they do not trust the clergy who set them on foot; they do not expect to be taught at their hands the things they long to know—to be taught the whole truth in them about history, politics, science, the Bible. They suspect them to be mere tubes to the whole mere substitutes for education, slowly and late adopted, in order to stop the mouths of the importunate. They may misjudge the clergy, but whose fault is it if they do? (Clergymen of England!)—look at the history of your Establishment for the last fifty years, and say, what wonder is it if the artisan mistrust you? Every spiritual reform, since the time of John Wesley, has had to establish itself in the teeth of insult, calumny, and persecution. Every celebrated reform comes not from within, but from without your body. Mr. Housman, struggling against every kind of temporising and trickery, has to do the work which bishops, by virtue of their seat in the House of Lords, might to have been doing years ago. Everywhere we see the clergy, with a few per cented exceptions (like Dr. Arnold), proclaiming themselves the advocates of Poyson, the dogged opponents of our political liberty, living either by the accursed system of pew rents, or else by one which depends on the high price of corn, chosen exclusively from the classes who crash or down, prohibiting all free discussion on religious points, commanding us to swallow down, with faith as passive and implicit as that of a Papist, the very creeds from which their own bad example, and their scandalous neglect, have, in the last three generations, deprived us—never mixing with the thoughtful working-men, except in the prison, the hospital, or in extreme old age, betraying, in every tract, in every sermon, an ignorance of the doubts, the feelings, the very language of the masses, which would be ludicrous, were it not accused before God and man. And then will you show us a few tardy improvements here and there, and ask us, indignantly, why we distrust you? Oh! gentlemen, if you cannot see for yourselves the causes of our distrust, it is past our power to show you. We must leave it to God.

But to return to my own story. I had, as I said before, to live by my pen, and in that painful, confused, unaimed way, I contrived to scramble on the long winter through, writing regularly for the Weekly Worker, and sometimes getting an occasional scrap into some other cheap periodical, often on the very verge of starvation, and glad of a handful of meal from Sandy's widow's barrel. If I had had more than my share of feasting in the summer, I made the balance even, during those frosty months, by many a bitter fast.

And here let me ask you, gentle reader, who are just now considering me a gentle, virulent, and noisy, did you ever, for one day in your whole life, literally, involuntarily, and in spite of all your endeavours, longings, and hungerings, not get enough to eat? If you ever have, it must have taught you several things.

But all this while, it must not be supposed that I had forgotten my promise to good Farmer Porter, to look for his missing son. And, indeed, Crossthwaite and I were already engaged in a similar search for a friend of his—the young tailor, who, as I told Porter, had been lost for several months. He was the brother of Crossthwaite's wife, a passionate, kind hearted Irishman, Mike Kelly by name, reckless and scatter brained enough to get himself into every possible scrape, and weak enough of will never to get himself out of one. For these two, Crossthwaite and I had searched from one sweater's den to another, and scoured in vain. And though the present interest and exertion kept us both from brooding over our own difficulties, yet in the long run, it tended only to embitter and infuriate our minds. The frightful scenes of hopeless misery which we witnessed—the ever widening pit of pauperism and slavery, gaping for fresh victims day by day, as they dropped out of the fast lessening "honourable trade," into the ever increasing miseries of sweating, piece-work, and starvation prices, the horrible certainty that the same process which was dooming our trade, was slowly, but surely, eating up every other also; the knowledge that there was no remedy, no salvation for us in man, that political economists had declared such to be the law and constitution of society, and that our rulers had believed that message, and were determined to act upon it,—if all these things did not go far towards maddening us, we must have been made of sterner stuff than anyone who reads this book.

At last, about the middle of January, just as we had given up the search as hopeless, and poor Katie's eyes were getting red and swelled with daily weeping, a fresh spin was given to our exertions, by the sudden appearance of no less a person than the farmer himself. What ensued upon his coming, must be kept for another chapter.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE SKINLESS MAN.

I WAS greedily devouring Lane's "Arabian Nights," which had made their first appearance in the shop that day.

Mackaye sat in his usual place, smoking a clean pipe, and assisting his meditations by certain mysterious chironomic signs, while opposite to him was Farmer Porter—a stone or two thinner than when I had seen him last, but one stone is not much unseel out of seventeen. His forehead looked smaller, and his jaws larger than ever, and his red face was sad, and furrowed with care.

Evidently, too, he was ill at ease about other matters besides his son. He was looking out of the corners of his eyes, first at the skinless crest on the chimney-piece, then at the crucified hook hanging over his head, as if he considered them not altogether safe companions, and rather expected something "uncanny" to lay hold of him from behind—a process which involved the most horrible contortions of visage, as he carefully abstained from stirring a muscle of his neck or body, but sat bolt upright, his elbows pinned to his sides, and his knees as close together as his stomach would permit, like a huge complacent Egyptian Memnon—the most ludicrous contrast to the little old man opposite, twisted up together in his Joseph's coat, like some wizard magician in the stories which I was reading. A cautious pair of "polos" the two made, the misanthet whorl, by no means a "punctum indifferens," but a true connecting spiritual idea, stood on the table—in the whisky bottle.

Farmer Porter was evidently bog with some great thought, and had all a true poet's bashfulness about publishing the fruit of his creative genius. He looked round again at the skinless man, the caricatures, the books, and, as his eye wandered from pile to pile, and shelf to shelf, his face brightened, and he seemed to gain courage.

Solemnly he put his hat on his knees, and began solemnly brushing it with his cuff. Then he saw me watching him, and stopped. Then he put his pipe solemnly on the hob, and cleared his throat for action, while I buried my face in the book.

"Them's a sight o' larned books, Muster Mackaye."

"Humph!"

"Yow man, he's got a deal o' scholarship among they, noo!"

"Humph!"

"Doo-yow think, noo, yow could find of my boy out of un, by any ways o' conjuring like?"

"By whitt?"

"Conjuring—to stick a perpendicular, noo, or say the Lord's Prayer backwards?"

"Wadna ye prefer a meenacle or twa?" asked Sandy, after a long pull at the whisky tottly.

"Or a few efreets?" added I.

"Whatsoever ye like, gentlemen. You're best judges, to be sure," answered Farmer Porter, in an awed and helpless voice.

"Awed—I'm no that disinclined to be here in the occult sciences. I dinna haud thegither wi' Salvarte. There was man in them than Maga naturalis, I'm thinking. Mesmerism and magic-hunters, being and opium, wunna explain all facts, Alton, laddie. Dootless they were an unc' barbaric an' empiric method o' expressing the gran' trith o' man's mastery ower matter. But the interpretation o' the spiritual an' physical worlds is a gran' trith too, an' siblin the Deity might ha' allowed witchcraft, just to teach that to poor barbarous folk signs and wonders, laddie, to mak' them believe in somewhat mair than the hearts that perish an' so ghosts an' warlocks might be a necessary element o' the divino education in dark and canal times. But I've no read o' a case in which necromancy, nor geomancy, nor askinomaney, nor ony ither mancy, was applied to sic a purpose as this. Unc' gude they were, maybe, for the discovery o' stolen spines—but no that o' stolen tailors."

Farmer Porter had listened to this language, with mouth and ears gradually expanding between awe and the desire to comprehend, but at the last sentence his countenance fell.

"So I'm thinking, Mister Porter, that the best witch in siccan a case is aye that ye may find at the police office."

"Aye?"

"Thae detective police are gran' necromancers an' cunning in their way, an' I just took the liberty, a week ago, to ha' a crack wi' aye o' 'em. And noo, gin ye're inclined, we'll leave the whisky awhile, an' gang up to that cave o' Trophawinus, en'd by the vulgar Bow Street, an' speir for tidings o' the twa lost sheep."

So to Bow Street we went, and found our man, to whom the farmer bowed with obsequiousness most unlike his usual haughty independence. He evidently half suspected him to have dealings with the world of spirits, but whether he had such or not, they had been utterly unsuccessful, and we walked back again, with the farmer between us half-blubbering—

"I tell ye, there's nothing like gangin' to a wise nooman. Bless ye, I mnd one up to Guy Hall, when I was a barn, that twa Irish reapers coon down, and murdered her for the money—and if you lost aught she'd vend it, so sure as the church—and a mighty hand to cure burns; and they twa villains coon back, after harvest, seventy mile to do it—and when my vather's cows was shrew-struck, she made um be draed under a humble as grewed together at the both ends, she a praying like mad all the time; and they never got nothing but fourteen shillings and a crooked sixpence, for why, the devil earned off all the rest of her money and I seen um both a hanging in chains by Wisbeach river, with my own eyes. So when the Irish reapers comes into the vein, our chaps always says, 'Yow goo to Guy Hall, there's 'Yor brithren a wastin' for yow,' and that do make um joost mad loike, it do. I tell yo there's nowt like a wise 'ooman, for vindin' out the likes o' this."

At this hopeful stage of the argument I left them to go to the Magazine office. As I passed through Covent Garden, a pretty young woman stopped me under a gas-lamp. I was pushing on, when I saw that it was Jenny Downes's Irish wife, and saw, too, that she did not recognise me. A sudden instinct made me stop and hear what she had to say.

"Shure, then, and yer a tailor, my young man?"

"Yes," I said, nettled a little that my late boathed profession still betrayed itself in my gut.

"From the country?"

I nodded, though I dare not speak a white lie to that effect. I fancied that, somehow, through her I might hear of poor Kelly and his friend Porter.

"Ye'll be wanting work, then?"

"I have no work."

"Och, then, it's I can show ye the flower o' work, I can. Bedad, there's a shop I know of where ye'll earn—bedad, if ye're the ninth part of a man, let alone a handy young fellow like the looks of you—och, ye'll earn thirty shillings the week, to the very least—thirteen beautiful lodgings,—och, then, just come and see 'em—as chaps as mother's milk! Come along, then—och, it's the beauty ye are—just the late figure for a tailor."

The fancy still possessed me, and I went with her through one dingy back street after another. She seemed to be purposely taking an indirect road, to mislead me as to my whereabouts, but after a half hour's walking, I know, as well as she, that we were in one of the most miserable slop working nests of the East End.

She stopped at a house door, and hurried me in, up to the first floor, and into a dirty, slatternly parlour, smelling infamously of gin, where the first object I beheld was Jimmy Downes, sitting before the fire, three parts drunk, with a couple of dirty, squalling children on the hearth-rug, whom he was kicking and cuffing alternately.

"Och, then, ye villain, biting the poor darlents whenever I lave ye a minute!" and pouring out a volley of Irish curses, she caught up the urchins, one under each arm, and kissed and hugged them till they were nearly choked.

"Och, ye plague o' my life—as drunk as a baste, an' I brought home this darlint of a young gentleman to help ye in the business."

Downes got up, and steadying himself by the table, leered at me with luck-lustre eyes, and attempted a little ceremonious politeness. How this was to end I did not see; but I was determined to carry it through, on the chance of success, infinitely small as that might be.

"An' I've told him thirty shillings a week's the least he'll earn, and charges for board and lodging only seven shillings."

"Thirty!—she hes, she's always a lying, don't you mind her. Five and forty is the very lowest figure. Ask my respectable and most piouslest partner, Shmuel Solomon. Why, blow me—it's Locke!"

"Yes, it is Locke, and surely you're my old friend, Jimmy Downes?" Shake hands. What an unexpected pleasure to meet you again!"

"Very unexpected pleasure. Tip us your daddie! It-lighted—d-lighted, as I was a saying, to be of the least use to yer. Take a canker? Summat heavy, then? No? 'Tis a drap o' kindness yet, for and langsyne."

"You forget I was always a teetotaler."

"Ay," with a look of unfeigned pity. "An' you're a going to land us a haul? Oh, ah! perhaps you'd like to begin? Here's a most beautiful uniform, now, for a man in her Majesty's Guards, we don't mention names, turn't him as like. Perhaps you'd like best to work here to night, for company—'for and langsyne, my boys,' and I'll introduce yer to the gents upstairs to-morrow."

"No," I said, "I'll go up at once, if you've no objection."

"Och, then, but the sheets isn't aired—no—faux, and I'm thinking the gentleman as is a going isn't gone yet."

But I insisted on going up at once, and, grumbling, she followed me. I stopped on the landing of the second floor, and asked which way, and seeing her in no hurry to answer, opened a door, inside which I heard the hum of many voices, saying in as sprightly a tone as I could muster, that I supposed that was the workroom.

As I had expected, a fetid, choking den, with just room enough in it for the seven or eight sallow, starved beings, who, countless, shoeless, and ragged, sat stitching, each on his trundle-bed. I glanced round; the man whom I sought was not there.

My heart fell, why it had ever risen to such a pitch of hope I cannot tell, and half-cursing myself for a fool, in thus wildly thrusting my head into a squabble, I turned back and shut the door, saying,—

"A very pleasant room, ma'am, but a leetle too crowded."

Before she could answer, the opposite door opened; and a face appeared—unwashed, unshaven, shrunken to a skeleton. I did not recognise it at first.

"Blessed Virgin! but that wasn't your voice, Locke?"

"And who are you?"

"Ten and ages! and he don't know Mike Kelly?"

My first impulse was to catch him up in my arms, and run downstairs with him. I controlled myself, however, not knowing how far he might be in his tyrant's power. But his voluble Irish heart burst out at once—

"Oh! blessed saints, take me out o' this!—take me out, for the love of Jesus!—take me out o' this hell, or I'll go mad mitnely! Och! will nobody have pity on poor souls in purgatory here in prison like neg'n slaves? We're stuv'd to the bone, we are, and kalt mitnely with cowl'd."

And as he clutched my arm, with his long, skinny, trembling fingers, I saw that his hands and feet were all chapped and bleeding. Neither shoe nor stocking did he possess, his only garments were a ragged shirt and trousers, and—and, in horrible mockery of his own misery, a grand new flowered satin vest, which to-morrow was to figure in some gorgeous shop window!

"Och! Mother of Heaven!" he went on, wildly, "when will I get out to the fresh air? For five months I haven't seen the blessed light of sun, nor spoken to the priest, nor ate a bit o' mate, burning bread and butter. Blime, it's all the blessed Sabbaths and sun'days I've been working like a heathen Jew, and never seen the inside of the chapel to comfort my sins, and me poor soul's lost mitnely—and they've pawn'd the reveler! this fifteen weeks, and not a boy of us yet set foot in the street since!"

"Vot a this row?" roared at this juncture Downes's voice from below.

"Och, thin," shrieked the woman, "here's that thief o' the warrld, Macky Kelly, slandering us afore the blessed Heaven, and he owing £2 14s 3d for his board an' lodgin'! let alone pawn-tickets, and gom' to run away, the black 'e steeled on a th' f'ar gent!" "A! the mivellin' ch'ist o' a' the 'eaves!" "Mince!" "Blime!" and a host of ejaculations, which (the English ones at least) had not the slightest reference to the matter in hand.

"I'll come to him!" said Downes, with an oath, and rushed stumbling up the stairs, while the poor wretch weakened in again, and slumped the door to. Downes battered at it, but was met with a volley of curses from the men inside, while, profliting by the Babel, I blew out the light, ran downstairs, and got safe into the street.

In two hours afterwards, Mackaye, Porter,

¹ A coat, we understand, which is kept by the coatless wretches in these wretched dungeons, to be used by each of them in turn when they want to go out—
Euton

Crossthwaite and I were at the door, accompanied by a policeman, and a search warrant. Porter had insisted on accompanying us. He had made up his mind that his son was at Downes's, and all his presentations of the smallness of his chance were fruitless. He worked himself up into a state of complete frenzy, and floundered a huge stick in a way which shocked the policeman's orderly and legal notions.

"That may do very well down in your country, sir, but you aren't a gom' to use that there weapon here, you know, not by no hact o' Parliament as I knows on!"

"Ow, it's joust a way I ha' wi' me!" And the stick was quiet for fifty yards or so, and then recommenced smashing magnificently skulls.

"You'll do somebody a mischief, sir, with that! You'd much better lend it me!"

Porter tucked it under his arm for fifty yards more, and we on, till we reached Downes's house.

The policeman knocked, and the door was opened, cautiously, by an old Jew, of a most un-"Caucasian" cast of features, however "high nosed," as Mr. Wisnitch has it.

The policeman asked to see Michael Kelly.

"Michaelsh?" I don't know such name sh—

But before the puley could go further, the farmer burst past policeman and Jew, and rushed into the passage, roaring, in a voice which made the very windows rattle.

"Billy Poolter! Billy Poolter! when be yow? when be yow?"

We all followed him upstairs, in time to see him charging valiantly, with his stick for a bayonet, the small person of a Jew boy, who stood at the head of the stairs in a scientific attitude. The young rascal planted a dozen blows in the huge carcass—he might as well have thumped the innocents in the Regent's Park, the old man ran right over him, without stopping, and dashed up the stairs, at the head of which "oh, joy!" appeared a long, shrunken, red-haired hunch, the tears on its dirty cheeks glittering in the candle glare. In no instant, father and son were in each other's arms.

"Oh, my barn! my barn! my barn! my barn!" and then the old Hercules held him off at arm's length, and looked at him with a wistful face, and hugged him again with "My barn! my barn!" He had nothing else to say. Was it not enough? And poor Kelly danced frantically around them hurrahing, his own sorrows forgotten in his friend's deliverance.

The Jew boy shook himself, turned, and darted downstairs past us, the policeman quietly put out his foot, tripped him headlong, and jumping down after him, extracted from his grasp a heavy pocket-book.

"Ah! my dear mother's dying gift! Oh dear! oh dear! give it back to a poor orphansh!"

"Didn't I see you take it out o' the old un's pocket—you young villain?" answered the maintenance of order, as he shoved the book into his bosom, and stood with one foot on his writhing victim, a complete nineteenth century St Michael.

"Let me hold him," I said, "while you go upstairs."

"You hold a Jew boy? you hold a mad cat?" answered the policeman, contemptuously—and with justice—for at that moment Downes appeared on the first floor landing, cursing and blaspheming.

"He's my 'pintuck' he's my servant! I've got a bond, with his own hand to it, to serve me for three years. I'll have the law of you—I will!"

Then the meaning of the big stick came out. The old man leapt down the stairs, and seized Downes. "You're the tyrant as has locked my larn up here!" and a thrashing commenced, which it made my bones ache only to look at. Downes had no chance, the old man felled him on his face in a couple of blows, and taking both hands to his stick, hewed away at him as if he had been a log.

"I want to hit a's head! I want to hit a's head!"—whack, whack. "Let me be!"—whack, whack. "It does me gude, it does me gude!"—puff, puff, puff—whack. "I've been a bottling of it up for three years, come Whitsuntide!"—whack, whack, whack. While Muckye and Crossthwaite stood coolly looking on, and the wife shut herself up in the side room, and screamed murder.

The unhappy policeman stood at his wits' end, between the prisoner below, and the breach of the peace above, bellowing in vain, in the Queen's name, to us, and to the gaming takers on the landing. At last, as Downes's life seemed in danger, he wavered, the Jew boy seized the moment, jumped up, upsetting the constable, dashed like an eel between Crossthwaite and Muckye, gave me a back-handed blow in passing, which I felt for a week after, and vanished through the street door, which he locked after him.

"Very well!" said the functionary, rising solemnly, and pulling out a note book—"See under left eye, nose a little twisted to the right, bad chilblains on the hands. You'll keep till next time, young man. Now, you bit gentleman up there, have you done a qualifying of yourself for Newgate?"

The old man had run upstairs again, and was hugging his son, but when the policeman lifted Downes, he jusbled back to his victim, and begged, like a great schoolboy, for leave to "bet him joust won hit moor."

"Let me bet un! I'll pay un!—I'll pay all as my son owes un! Mercy me! whic's my pooss?" and so on raged the Babel, till we got the two poor fellows safe out of the house—we had to break open the door to do it, thanks to that map of Israel.

"For God's sake, take us too!" almost screamed five or six other voices.

"They're all in debt—every onesh, they sha'n't go till they paysh, if there's law in England," whined the old Jew, who had reappeared.

"I'll pay for 'em—I'll pay every farden, if so be as they treated my boy well. Here, you, Mr. Jacke, there's the ten pounds as I promised you. Why, what is my pooss?"

The policeman solemnly handed it to him. He took it, turned it over, looked at the policeman half-frightened, and pointed with his fat thumb at Muckye.

"Well, he said as you was a conjurer—and since he was right."

He paid me the money. I had no mind to keep it in such company, so I got the poor fellows' pawn tickets, and Crossthwaite and I took then things out for them. When we returned, we found them in a group in the passage, holding the door open, in then fear lest we should be locked up, or entrapped in some way. Their spirits seemed utterly broken. Some three or four went off to lodge where they could, the majority went upstairs again to work. That, even that dungeon, was then only home their only hope, as it is of thousands of "fice" Englishmen at this moment.

We returned, and found the old man with his new lordly prodigal sitting on his knee, as if he had been a baby. Sandy told me afterwards, that he had scarcely kept him from crying the young man all the way home, he was convinced that the poor fellow was dying of starvation. I think really he was not far wrong. In the corner sat Kelly, crunched tog then like a chiboon, blubbering, humping, invoking the saints, cursing the swaters, and blessing the present company. We were afraid, for several days, that his wits were seriously affected.

And, in his old arm chair, pipe in mouth, sat good Sandy Muckye, wiping his eyes with the many coloured sleeve, and moralising to himself, solito voce.

"The auld Romans made slaves o' their debtors, sac did the Anglo-Saxons, for a' good Major Cartwright has writ to the contrary. But I didna ken the same Christian practice was part o' the British constitution. Aweel, nawel, between Riot Acts, Government by Commissioners, and other little extravagants and codicils o' Mammon's making, it's no that easy to ken, the day, what is the British constitution, and what isn't. Tak' a diappee, Billy Porter, lad!"

"Never again so long as I live. I've learnt a lesson and a half ament that, these last few months."

"Aweel, moderation's best, but abstinence better than naething. Nao man eall deprive me o' my liberty, but I'll tempt nae man to ge up his." And he actually put the whisky bottle by into the cupboard.

The old man and his son went home next day, promising me, if I would but come to see them, "twa hundred acres o' the best partridge shooting, and wild ducks as plenty as sparrows, and to live in clover till I bust, if I liked." And so, as Bunyan has it, they went on their way, and I saw them no more.

CHAPTER XXII

AN EMERSONIAN SERMON.

CERTAINLY, if John Crossthwaite held the victim-of-circumstance doctrine in theory, he did not allow Mike Kelly to plead it in practice, as an extenuation of his misdeeds. Very different from his Owenite "it's nobody's fault" tirades in the debating society, or his admiration for the teacher of whom my readers shall have a glimpse shortly, was his lecture that evening to the poor Irishman on "It's all your own fault." Unhappy Kelly! he sat there like a beaten car, looking first at one of us, and then at the other, for mercy, and hiding none. As soon as Crossthwaite's tongue was tired, Mackaye's began, on the sins of drunkenness, lustiness, imprudence, over-trustfulness, etc. etc., and, above all, on the cardinal offence of not having signed the protest years before, and spurned the dishonourable trade, as we had done. Even his most potent excuse that "a boy must live somehow," Crossthwaite treated as contemptuously as if he had been a very Leonidas, while Mackaye chimed in with—"An' ye a Papist! ye talk o' praying to saints an' martyrs, that died in torment because they wad na do what they should na do? What ha' ye to do wi' martyrs?—a miserable wretch that sells his soul for a mess o' pottage—four slices per diem o' thin bread and butter? Et propter vestram vendi perdere causas! Dinn't tell me o' yer hardships—ye've had your deserts—your rights were just equivalent to your might, an' so ye got them."

"Fair, then, Mither Mackaye, dailint, an' whin did I deserve to pawn me own goose an' board, an' sit looking at the spiders for the want o' them?"

"Pawn his ain geese? Pawn hissel? pawn his needle—gin it had been worth the pawning, they'd ha' ta'en it. And yet there's a command in Deuteronomy, Ye shall na tak' the millstone in pledge, for it's a man's life, nor yet keep his raiment owre night, but gie it the poor body back, that he may sleep in his ain claes, in' bless ye. Oh—but pawnbrokers dinn't care for blessings—na marketable value in them whatsoever."

"And the shopkeeper," said I, "in the 'Arabian Nights,' refuses to take the fisherman's net in pledge, because he gets his living thereby."

"Ech! but, laddie, they were poor legal Jews, under carnal ordinances, an' danna even tak' an honest five per cent interest for their money. An' the baker o' Bagdad, why, he was a benighted heathen, ye ken, an' deceiv'd by that fause prophet, Mahomet, to his eternal damnation, or he wad never ha' gone aboot to fancy a fisherman was his bither."

"Fair, an' ain't we all brothers?" asked Kelly.

"Ay, an' no," said Sandy, with an expression which would have been a smile, but for its depth of bitter earnestness, "brethren in Christ, my laddie."

"An' ain't that all over the same?"

"Ask the preachers (in they meant brothers, they'd say brothers, be sure, but because they don't mean brothers at a', they say brethren—ye'll mind, brethren—to some antiquate, an' professional, an' perfunctory like, for fear it should be owre real, an' practical, an' startling, an' a' that, and then just hunt it down wi' a 'in Christ' but fit o' owre wide applications, and a' that. But "For a that, an' a that,

It's comin' yet for a that,
Whin man an' man, the world awa,
Shall brothers be, for a that—"

An' na brethren only mair at a'!"

"An' didn't the bless'd Jesus die for all?"

"What? for heretics, Macky?"

"Bedad, thin, an' I forgot that intirely!"

"Of course you did! It's shure, laddie," said he, turning to me, "that that name suld be everywhere, frae the thunders o' Exeter Ha' to this poor feckless Paddy, the watchword o' exclusiveness. I'm thinking ye'll no find the workmen believe it, till somehow can lin' the plan o' making it the sign o' universal comprehension. Gin I had na seen in my youth that a brother in Christ meant less a thousandfold than a brother out o' him, I naught ha' believ'd the noo—we'll no say what I've an' owre great organ o' univ'ersalness, an' o' veneration too, I'm afraid."

"Ah," said Crossthwaite, "you should come and hear Mr. Windmish to night, about the all embracing benevolence of the Deity, and the abomination of hunting it by all those narrow creeds and dogmas."

"An' wha's Master Windmish, then?"

"Oh, he's an American, he was a Calvinist preacher originally, I believe, but, as he told us last Sunday evening, he soon cast away the worn-out vestments of an obsolete faith, which were fast becoming only crippling fetters."

"An' ran oot safflows on the public, eh? I'm afraid there's mony a man else that throws awa' the gude auld plaid o' Sects, Partisanism, an' is unco fain to cover his nakedness wi' only cast popinjays' feathers he can forgather wi'. Awel! awel!—a poor priestless age it is, the noo. We'll e'en gang hear him the night Alton, laddie; ye ha' na daikened the kirk door this mony a day—nor I neither, man by token."

It was too true. I had utterly given up the whole problem of religion as insoluble.

I believed in poetry, science, and democracy—and they were enough for me then, enough, at least, to leave a mighty hung in my heart knew not for what. And for Mackaye, though brought up, as he told me, a rigid Scotch Presbyterian, he had gradually ceased to attend the church of his fathers.

"It was no the kirk o' his fathers—the anbl God trusting knk that Clivets diagoont in by lains and yinnish. It was a' gine dead an' d'iz, a piece of Anbl Bitley hurntation an' soul sayng bodges. What did he want wi' proofs o' the being o' God, an' o' the doctine o' origin o' sin? He could see enough o' them ayont the shop door, ony tide. They made pnt Rabble Burns an' anything-an' an, wi' their blethers, an' he was nae gann the same gte."

And, besides, he absolutely refused to enter any place of worship where there were pews. "He wad na follow after a multitude to do evil, he wad na gang before his Maker wi' a lee in his right hand. Nae wonder folks were so afraid o' the names o' equality an' birthrhood, when they'd kicked them out o' the kirk a' God. Pious folks may ca' me a snuff' unbl Athert. They want gang to a humless -tigs play—an' richt they— for fear o' countenancing the sin that's done there, an' I want gang to the kirk, for fear o' countenancing the sin that's done there, be putting down my humles on that stool o' athrist, a haspit pew!"

I was therefore, altogether surprised at the promptitude with which he agreed to go and hear Crossstewart's new found prophet. His reasons for so doing may be, I think, gathered from the conversation towards the end of this chapter.

Well, we went, and I, for my part, was charmed with Mr. Windrush's eloquence. His style, which was altogether Emersonian, quite astonished me by its alternate bursts of what I considered brilliant declamation, and of forcible epigrammatic antithesis. I do not deny that I was a little startled by some of his doctrines, and suspected that he had not seen much either of St. Giles's cellar or tailor's workshops either, when he talked of sin as "only a lower form of good. Nothing," he informed me, "was produced in nature without pain and disturbance, and what we had been taught to call sin, was, in fact, nothing but the birth throes attendant on the progress of the species.—As for the devil, Novalis, indeed, had gone so far as to suspect him to be a necessary illusion. Novalis was a mystic, and tainted by the old creeds. The illusion was not necessary—it was disappearing before the fast approaching meadman light of philosophic religion. Like the myths of Christianity, it had grown up in an age of superstition, when men, blind to the wondrous order of the universe, believed that supernatural beings, like the Homeric gods, actually interfered in the affairs of mortals. Science had revealed the inevailability of the laws of nature—was man alone to be exempt from them? No. The time would come, when it would be as obsolete an absurdity to talk of the temptation of a fiend, as it was now to talk of the weir wolf, or the angel of the thunder cloud. The metaphor might remain, doubtless, as a metaphor, in the domain of poetry, whose office was to realise, in objective symbols, the subjective ideas of the human intellect; but philosophy, and the pure sentiment of religion, which founded all things, even God Himself, in the recesses of its own enthusiastic heart, must abjure such a notion."

"What?" he asked again, "shall all nature be a harmonious whole, reflecting, in every drop of dew which gins the footstep of the morning, the minute love and wisdom of its Maker, and man alone be excluded from his part in that concordant choir? Yet such is the doctrine of the advocates of free-will, and of sin—its phantom birth. Men disobey his Maker! disarrange and break the golden wheels and springs of the minute machine! The thought were blasphemy!—impossibility! All things fulfil their destiny, and so does man, in a higher or lower sphere of being. Shall I punish the robber? Shall I curse the profligate? As soon destroy the toad, because my pitiful taste in my judge him ugly, or doom to hell, for his carnivorous appetite, the musciconge of my native lirk! Toad is not horrible to toad, or thief to thief. Philanthropists or statesmen may envision him with more general circumstances, and so enable his propensities to work more directly for the good of society, but to punish him—to punish nature for daring to be nature!—Never! I may thank the Upper Destinies that they have not made me as other men are—that they have endowed me with nobler instincts, a more delicate conformation than the thief; but I have my part to play, and he has his. Why should we wish to be other than the All-wise has made us?"

"Fine doctrine, that," grumbled Sandy. "gum ye've first made up your mind wi' the Plausica, that ye are no like other men."

"Shall I pray, then? For what? I will coax none, flatter none—not even the Supreme! I will not be absurd enough to wish to change that order, by which sin and stars, saints and sinners, alike fulfil their destinies. There is one comfort, my friends, coax and flatter as we will, he will not hear us."

"Plausant, for pur deqvils like us!" quoth Mackaye.

"What then remains? Thanks, thanks—not of words, but of actions. Worship is a life, not a ceremony. He who would honour the Supreme, let him cheerfully accumb to the destiny which the Supreme has allotted, and, like the shell or the flower—" ("Or the pickpocket," added Mackaye, almost sulkily),—"become the happy puppet of the universe's impulse. He who would honour Christ, let him become a Christ himself. The oracle of Mopsnestia—born, alas! before his time—a prophet for whom as yet no audience stood ready in the amphitheatre of souls—"Christ!" he was wont to say, "I can become Christ myself, if I will." Become thou Christ, my brother. He is an idea—the idea of utter submission—abnegation of his own fancied will before the supreme necessities. Fulfil that idea, and thou art he. Deny thyself, and then only wilt thou be a reality, for thou hast no self. If thou hadst a self, thou wouldst but be in denying it—and wouldst Thine Being thank thee for denying what He had given thee? But thou hast none! God is circumstance, and thou His creature! Be content! Fear not, strive not, change not, repent not! Thou art nothing! Be nothing, and thou becomeest a part of all things!"

And so Mr. Windrush ended his discourse, which Crossthwaite had been all the while lazily taking down in shorthand, for the edification of the readers of a certain periodical, and also for those of this my safe.

I plead guilty to having been entirely carried away by what I heard. There was so much which was true, so much more which seemed true, so much which it would have been convenient to believe true, and all put so eloquently and originally, as I then considered, that, in short, I was in raptures, and so was poor dear Crossthwaite, and as we walked home, we chimed Mr. Windrush's promises into each of Mackaye's ears. The old man, however, paced on, silent and meditative. At last—

"A hinder sets us so in the land o' Greet Britain, an' a hinder o' so single preachers, each man a sect of his an' an' this the last fashion! Last indeed! The moon of Calvinism's far gone in the fourth quarter, when it's come to the like o' that. Truly, the soul-saving busin' is a thegither fair to a low ebb, as Master Tummit says somewhere!"

"Well, but," asked Crossthwaite, "was not that man, at least, splendid?"

"An' how much o' that gran' objectives an' subjectives did ye comprehend, then, Johnnie, my man?"

"Quite enough for me," answered John, in a somewhat rattled tone.

"An' so did I."

"But you ought to hear him often. You can't judge of his system from one sermon, in this way."

"Soonest! and what's that like?"

"Why, he has a plan for uniting all sects and parties, on the one broad fundamental ground of the unity of God as revealed by science."

"Vorra like uniting o' men by just puttin' all their claes, and telling 'em, 'There, ye're a' brothers now, on the one broad fundamental principle o' want o' brocks'!"

"Of course," went on Crossthwaite, with out taking notice of this interruption, "he allows full liberty of conscience. All he wishes for is the emancipation of intellect. He will allow everyone, he says, to realise that idea to himself, by the representations which suit him best."

"An' so he has no objection to a wro playing at Papistry, gin a man finds it good to tinkle up his soul?"

"Ay, he did speak of that—what did he call it? Oh! 'one of the ways in which the Christian idea naturally embodied itself in imaginative minds! but the higher intellects, of course, would want fewer helps of that kind. They would see—'ay, that was it—the pure white light of truth, without requiring those coloured refracting media.'"

"That wad deprim' muckle on whether the light o' truth chose or not—I'm thinking. But, Johnnie, lal—guide us and save us!—whaur got ye a' these gran' outlandish words the night?"

"Haven't I been taking down every one of those lectures for the press?"

"The press gang to the father o't—and you too, for lending your han' in the matter—for a man accused aristocrat I never heard, sin' I first ate haggis. Oh, ye gowk—ye gowk! Dinna ye see what be the upshot o' siccan doctrine? That every pinn fellow as has no grit brains in his head will be left to his superstition, an' his ignorance, to fulfil the lusts o' his flesh, while the few that are geniuses, or fan'y themselves sae, are to ha' the monopoly o' this private still o' philosophy these carbonium, illuminati, vehmgericht, samothracian mysteries o' bottled moonshine. An' when that comes to pass, I'll just gang back to my schule and my catechism, and begin again wi' 'who was born o' the Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate.' Hech! lads, there's no subjectives and objectives there, na heggadly, wnauly abstractions, but jooost a plain fact that God can't down to look for pinn bodie, instead o' leaving pinn bodie to gang looking for Him. An' here's a pretty place to be left looking for Him in between gin-shops and gutters! A pretty Gospel for the publicans an' harlots, to tell 'em that if their barns are camy enough, they may possibly some day be allowed to believe that there is one God, and not twa! And then, by way of practical application—'Hech! my dear, starving, simple brothers, ye muna be sae owre conscientious, and gang fashin' your selves aicht being brithers an' deevils, for the guid God's made ye sae, and He's verri well content to see ye sae, gin ye be content or na.'"

"Then, do you believe in the old doctrines of Christianity?" I asked.

"Dinna speen what I believe in. I canna tell ye. I've been seventy years trying to believe in God, and to meet another man that believed in Him. So I'm just like the Quaker o' the town o' Railcross, that met by himself every First-day in his ain hoose."

"Well, but," I asked again, "is not complete freedom of thought a glorious aim—to emancipate man's noblest part—the intellect—from the trammels of custom and ignorance?"

"Intellect—intellect!" rejoined he, according to his fashion, catching one up at a word, and playing on that in order to an answer, not what one said, but what one's words led to. "I'm sick o' all the talk anent intellect I hear now. An' what's the use o' intellect?" "Aristocracy o' intellect," they say. "Cause n' mistakes—intellectual ones, as wickies ones o' birth, or rank, or money." "What?" will I say a man my superior, because he's cleverer than myself? will I bow down to a bit o' brains, my mar than to a stick in a stone? Let a man prove himself better than me, my ladde—honest'er, humbler, kinder, wi' more sense o' the duty an' the weakness o' man—and that man I acknowledge—that man I know my leader, though he war as stupid as Eppe Digdash, that couldna count five on her fingers, and yet kept her drunken father by her an' hands labour, for twenty three years."

We could not agree to all this, but we made a rule of never contradicting the old sage in one of his excited moods, for fear of bringing on a week's silent fit—a state which generally ended in his sending him self into a bishous nighanholly, but I made up my mind to be henceforth a frequent auditor of Mr. Windrush's oratory.

"An' s' it devil's dead!" said Sandy, half to him self, "he sat crooning and smoking that n' fit over the fire." "Gone at last, pun fa' ow"—an' he saw little appreciated, to a' every gowk lying his arms on Nickie's back. "Pun Nickie"—verra like that much misunderstood politeecian, Mr. John Cule, as Charles Buller ca'd him in the House o' Commons—an' he to be dead it last! The world'll seem quite nice without his audacious prings on the streets. Aweel, aweel—nibins he's but slummin'."

* When April's first Spring came on squares,
And showers began to fall,
John Warkyeer got up a gale,
And sore surprised them a'

At any rate, I'd no bury him till he began to smell a wee strong, like. It's a grow-some thing is premature interment, Alton, ladde!"

CHAPTER XXIII

THE FREEDOM OF

BUT all this while, my slavery to Mr. O'Flynn's party spirit and conscience was becoming daily more and more intolerable. Explosion was inevitable, and an explosion came.

Mr. O'Flynn found out that I had been staying at Cambridge, and at a cathedral city too, and it was quite a godsend to him to find anyone who knew a word about the institutions at which he had been railing weekly for years. So nothing would serve him, but my writing a set of articles on the universities, as a prelude to one on the Cathedral Establishments. In vain I pleaded the shortness of my stay there, and the smallness of my information.

"Och, were not abuses notorious?" And couldn't I get them up out of my Radical paper, and just put in a little of my own observations, and dashin' personal cut or two, to spice the mug up, and give it an' al look? and if I did not choose to write that—why," with an enormous oath, "I should write nothing." So for I was growing weaker and weaker, and indeed my hack writing was breaking down my moral sense, as it does that of most men. I complied, and burning with vexation, feeling myself almost guilty of a breach of trust toward those from whom I had received nothing but kindness, I scribbled off my first number and sent it to the editor—to see it appear next week, three parts rewritten, and every fact of my own furnishing twisted and misapplied, till the whole thing was as vulgar and commonplace a piece of rant as ever disgraced the people's cause. And all this, in spite of a solemn promise, confirmed by a volley of oaths, that I "should say what I liked, and speak my whole mind, as one who had seen things with his own eyes had a right to do."

Enraged, I set off to the editor, and not only my pride, but what literary conscience I had left, was stirred to the bottom by seeing myself made, whether I would or not, a blackguard and a slanderer.

As it was ordained, Mr. O'Flynn was gone out for an hour or two, and unable to settle down to any work till I had fought my battle with him fairly out, I wandered onward towards the West-End, staring into print-shop windows, and meditating on many things.

As it was ordained, also, I turned up Regent Street, and into Langham Place, when, at the door of All Souls Church, behold a crowd, and a long string of carriages moving, and all the pomp and glory of a grand wedding.

I joined the crowd from mere idleness, and somehow found myself in the first rank, just as the bride was stepping out of the carriage—it was Miss Stumpton, and the old gentleman who handed her out was no other than the dean. They were, of course, far too deeply engaged to recognise insignificant little me, so that I could stare as thoroughly to my heart's content as any of the lurcher boys and nursery maids around me.

She was closely veiled—but not too closely to prevent my seeing her magnificent flaxen nostril curling with pride, resolve, and, tender passion. Her glorious black-brown hair—the true “purple locks” which Homer so often talks of—rolled down beneath her veil in great heavy ringlets, and with her tall and rounded figure, and step as firm and queenly as if she were going to a throne, she seemed to me the very ideal of those magnificent Eastern Zuheydahs and Nominahs, whom I used to dream of after reading the ‘Arabian Nights’.

As they entered the doorway, almost touching me, she looked round, as if for someone. The dean whispered something in his gentle, stately way, and she answered by one of those looks so intense, and yet so bright, so full of multitable depths of meaning and emotion, that, in spite of all my antipathy, I felt an admiration akin to awe thrill through me, and gazed after her so intently, that Lillian—Lillian herself—was at my side, and almost passed me before I was aware of it.

Yes, there she was, the foremost among a levy of fair girls, “herself the fairest far,” all April smiles and tears, golden curls, snowy rosebuds, and hovering clouds of lace—a fairy queen, but yet—but yet—how shallow that hazel eye, how empty of meaning those delicate features, compared with the strength and intellectual richness of the face which had preceded her!

It was too true—I had never remarked it before, but now it flashed across me like lightning—and like lightning vanished; for Lillian’s eye caught mine, and there was the faintest spink of a smile of recognition, and pleasant surprise, and a nod. I blushed scarlet with delight, some servant girl or other, who stood next to me, had seen it too—quick-eyed that woman are—and was looking enviously at me. I turned, I know not why, in my delicious shame, and plunged through the crowd to hide I knew not what.

I walked on—poor fool!—in an ecstasy, the whole world was transfigured in my eyes, and virtue and wisdom beamed from every face I passed. The omnibus horses were racers, and the drivers—were they not my brothers of the people? The very policemen looked sprightly and philanthropic. I shook hands earnestly with the crossing-sweeper of the Regent Circus, gave him my last twopenny, and rushed on, like a young David, to exterminate that Philistine, O’Flynn.

Ah well! I was a great fool, as others too have been; but yet, that little chance meeting did really raise me. It made me sensible that I was made for better things than low abuse of the higher classes. It gave me courage to speak out, and act without fear of consequences, once at least in that confused facing-both-ways period of my life. O woman! woman! only true missionary of civilisation and brotherhood, and gentle, forgiving charity; it is in thy power, and perhaps in thine only, to bind up the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives! One real lady, who should dare to stoop, what might she not do with us—with our sisters? If—

There are hundreds, answers the reader, who do stoop. Elizabeth Fry was a lady, well-born, rich, educated, and she has many scholars.

True, my dear readers, true—and may God bless her and her scholars. Do you think the working-men forget them? But look at St Giles’s, or Spitalfields, or Shadwell, and say, is not the harvest plentiful, and the labourers, alas! few? No one asserts that nothing is done, the question is, is enough done? Does the supply of mercy meet the demand of misery? Walk into the next court and see!

I found Mr. O’Flynn in his sam-tan, busy with paste and scissors, in the act of putting in a string of advertisements—indecent French novels, Athlete tracts, quick notices, and shopkeepers’ pulls, and commencing with as much dignity as I could muster.

“What on earth, do you mean, sir, by rewriting my article?”

“What?”—(in the other place)—“do you mean by giving me the trouble of rewriting it?” No head’s splitting now with sitting up, cutting out, and putting in ‘Poker o’ Moses’ but yet given it an entirely aristocratic tendency. What did ye mean? (and three or four maths rattled off) “by talking about the pious intentions of the ornamental fountains, and the democratic tendencies of monastic establishments?”

“I wrote it because I thought it.”

“Is that any reason ye should write it?” And there was another bit, too—it made my hair stand on end when I saw it, to think how near I was sent the copy to press without looking at it. I was thinking about a French Socialist, and Church Property.

“Oh! you mean, I suppose, the story of the French Socialist, who told me that Church property was just the only property in England which he would spare, because it was the only one which had definite duties attached to it, that the real devoters of the people were not the bishops, who, however rich, were, at least, bound to work in return for their riches, but the Linnells and millionaires, who refused to confess the duties of property, while they raved about its rights.”

“Balad, that’s it, and pretty doctrine, too!”

“But it’s true. It’s an entirely new, and a very striking notion, and I consider it my duty to mention it.”

“Thus! What the devil does that matter? There’s a time to speak the truth, and a time not, isn’t there?” It’ll make a grand hit, now, in a leader upon the Irish Church question, to back the priests against the landlords. But if I’d let that in as it stood, bedad, I’d have lost three parts of my subscribers the next week. Every soul of the Independents, let alone the Chartists, would have bid me good morning. Now do, like a good boy, give us something more the right thing next time. Draw it strong. A good drunken supper-party and a police row; if ye haven't seen one, get it up out of Peter Priggin's—or Laver might do, if the other weren't convenient. That's Dublin to be sure, but one university's just like another. And give us a sedition or two, and a brace of Dons carried home drunk from Barnwell by the Proctors."

"Really I never saw anything of the kind, and as for profligacy amongst the Dons, I don't believe it exists. I'll call them idle, and bigoted, and careless of the morals of the young men, because I know that they are, but as for anything more, I believe them to be no sorer, respectable a set of Pharooses as the world ever saw."

Mr. O'Flynn was waxing warm, and the lady soon began fast to show itself.

"I don't care a curse, sir! My subscribers won't stand it, and they shan't! I am a man of business, sir, and a man of the world, sir, and, faith, that's more than you are, and I know what will sell the paper, and by J—s I'll let no upstart gadpate dictate to me!"

"Then I'll tell you what, sir," quoth I, waxing warm in my turn, "I don't know which are the greater rogues, you or your subscribers. You a patriot! You are a humbug. Look at those advertisements, and deny it if you can. Crying out for education, and helping to delug the public mind with allusions to 'Catholic,' and Eugene Sue—swearing by Jesus, and pulling Athetism and blasphemy yelling at a quack Government, quack law, quack medicine, and then dirtying your fingers with half-crowns for advertising Holloway's Ointment, and Pina's Life Pills—shaking about slavery of labour to capital, and meeting Moses & Son's doggerel—putting about searching investigations and the march of knowledge, and concealing every fact which cannot be made to pander to the passions of your dupes—extolling the freedom of the press, and showing yourself in your own obnoxious and a censor of the press. You a patriot! You the people's friend! You meddling everything in your power to blunder the people's cause in the eyes of their enemies. You are simply humbug, a hypocrite, and a scoundrel, and so I bid you good-morning."

Mr. O'Flynn had stood, during this harangue, speechless with passion, those loose lips of his breathing like a pair of earthworms. It was only when I stopped that he regained his breath, and with a volley of incoherent oaths, caught up his chair and hurled it at my head. Luckily, I had seen enough of his temper already, to keep my hand on the lock of the door for the last five minutes. I darted out of the room quicker than I ever did out of one before or since. The chair took off at on the luckless door; and as I threw a flying glance behind me, I saw one leg sticking through the middle panel, in a way that augured ill for my skull, had it been in the way of Mr. O'Flynn's fury.

I ran home to Mickave in a state of intense self-glorification, and told him the whole story. He chuckled, he smiled, he hugged me to his bosom.

"I care me o' ye," but I kenned ye were o' the true Norse blub after a'!

'Twas an a thak,
A man oan for a thak.

Oh, but I have expected it this month or more! Oh, but I prophesied it, Johnnie!"

"Then why, in Heaven's name, did you not induce me to sack a scoundrel?"

"I sent ye to school, lad. I sent ye to school. Ye wad na be ruled by me. Ye took me for a pun-dotted auld misanthrope; na' I thought to gie ye the ment ye lasted after, na' fill ye wi' the fruit o' your own desires. And now that ye've gone down into the fire o' temptation, na' comforted by your reward stammin' ready. Specimen pain, valences!—who can dost them? I had na' miracles I might ea' them, to see how they cam' just when I was gann doff wi' despair!"

And then he told me that the editor of a popular journal, of the Howitt and Eliza Cook school, had called on me that morning, and promised me work enough, and pay enough, to meet all present difficulties.

I did indeed accept the generous commendation, if not as a reward for my act of straightforwardness, in which I saw no merit, at least, as proof that the upper powers had not altogether forgotten me. I found both the editor and his periodical, as I should have wished them, temperate and sunny, somewhat clipp-trap and sentimental, perhaps, and afraid of speaking out, as all parties are, but still willing to allow my fancy free range in light fictions, descriptions of foreign countries, scraps of showy rose-pink morality, and such like, which, though they had no more power against the raging mass of crime, misery, and discontent around, than a peacock's feather against a three-decker, still were all genial, graceful, kindly, humming, and soothed my discontented and impatient heart in the work of composition.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE TOWNSMAN'S SERVON TO THE GOWNSMAN.

ONE morning in February, a few days after this explosion, I was on the point of starting to go to the doctor's house about that wretched list of subscribers, which seemed destined never to be filled up, when my cousin George burst in upon me. He was in the highest good spirits at having just taken a double first class at Cambridge, and after my congratulations, sincere and hearty enough, were over, he offered to accompany me to that reverend gentleman's house.

He said, in an off-hand way, that he had no particular business there, but he thought it just as well to call on the dean and mention his success, so that the old fellow should not have heard it.

"For you see," he said, "I'm a sort of profiteur, both on my own account and on Lord Lyned's—Ellerton, he is now—you know he's just married to the dean's niece, Miss Stannton—and Ellerton's a capital fellow—promised me a living as soon as I'm in priest's orders. So my cue is now," he went on, as we walked down the Strand together, "to get ordained as fast as ever I can."

"But," I asked, "have you read much for ordination, or so much of what a clergyman's work should be?"

"Oh! as for that—you know it isn't one out of ten who's ever entered a school, or a college even, except to light his cigar, before he goes into the Church—and as for the examination, that's all humbug, any man may cram it all up in a month—and thanks to King's College, I knew all I wanted to know before I went to Cambridge. And I shall be three and twenty by Trinity Sunday, and then in I go, neck or nothing. Only the confounded line is, that this Bishop of London won't give me a title—won't let any man into his diocese, who has not been ordained two years, and so I shall be shoved down into some jolting little country curacy, without a chance of making play before the world, or getting myself known at all. Horrid line! isn't it?"

"I think," I said, "considering what London is just now, the bishop's regulation seems to be one of the best specimens of Episcopal wisdom that I've heard of for some time."

"Great bore for me, though, all this time, for I must make a move, I can tell you, if I intend to get on. A person must work like a horse nowadays to succeed at all, and Lyned's a desperately particular fellow, with all sorts of outré notions about people's duties and vocations and heaven knows what."

"Well," I said, "my dear cousin, and have you no high notions of a clergyman's vocation? because we—I mean the working men—have. It's just the high idea of what a clergyman should be, which makes them so furious at clergymen for being what they are."

"It's a queer way of showing them respect to the priesthood," he answered, "to do all they can to exterminate it."

"I dare say they are halloo, like other men, to confound the thing with its abuses, but if they didn't some dim notion that the thing might be in its good thing in itself, you may depend upon it they would not have against those abuses so fiercely." (The reader may see that I had not forgotten my conversation with Miss Stannton.) "And," thought I to myself, "is it not you, and such as you, who do so incorporate the abuses into the system, that one really can not tell which is which, and longs to shove the whole thing such as rotten to the core, and make a trial of something new?"

"Well, but," I said, again returning to the charge, for the subject was altogether curious and interesting to me, "do you really believe the doctrines of the Prayer book, George?"

"Believe them?" he answered, in a tone of astonishment, "why not? I was brought up a Churchman, whatever my parents were. I was always intended for the ministry. I'll sign the Thirty-nine Articles now, against any man in the three kingdoms, and as for all the proofs out of Scripture and Church history, I've known them ever since I was sixteen—I'll get them all up again in a week as fresh as ever."

"But," I rejoined, astonished in my turn at my cousin's notion of what belief was, "have you any personal faith?" you know what I mean—I hope using cant words but inward experience of the truth of all these great ideas, which, true or false, you will have to preach and teach? Would you live by them, die for them, as a patriot would for his country, now?"

"My dear fellow, I don't know anything about all those Methodistical, mystical, Calvinistical, inward experiences, and all that. I'm a Churchman, remember, not a High Churchman, too, and the doctrine of the Church is, that children are regenerated in holy baptism, and there's not the least doubt, from the authority both of Scripture and the fathers, that that's the—"

"For heaven's sake," I said, "no polemical discussions! Whether you're right or wrong, that's not what I'm talking about. What I want to know is this: You are going to teach people about God and Jesus Christ. Do you delight in God? Do you love Jesus Christ? Never mind what I do, or think, or believe. What do you do, George?"

"Well, my dear fellow, if you take things in that way, you know, of course—" and he dropped his voice into that peculiar tone, by which all sects seem to think they show their reverence, while to me, as to most other working-men it never seemed anything but a symbol of the separation and discrepancy between their daily thoughts and their religious ones. "Of course, we don't any of us think of these things half enough, and I'm sure I wish I could be more earnest than I am, but I can only hope it will come in time. The Church holds that there's a grace given in ordination, and really—really, I do hope and wish to do my duty—indeed, one can't help doing it, one is so pushed on by the immense competition for preferment, an idle parson hasn't a chance nowadays."

"But," I asked again, half-laughing, half-disgusted, "do you know what your duty is?"

"Bless you, my good fellow, a man can't go wrong there. Carry out the Church system, that's the thing—all laid down by rule and method. A man has but to work out that—and it's the only one for the lower classes, I'm convinced."

"Strange," I said, "that they have fought this last been so little at that opinion, that every attempt to enforce it, for the last three hundred years, has ended either in persecution or revolution."

"Ah! that was all those rascals' fault. They wouldn't give the Church a chance of showing her powers."

"What? not when she had it all her own way, during the whole eighteenth century?"

"Ah! but things are very different now. The clergy are awakened now to the real beauty of the Catholic machinery, and you have no notion how much is doing in church-building, and school, and societies of every sort and kind. It is quite incredible what is being done now for the lower orders by the Church."

"I believe," I said, "that the clergy are exceedingly improved, and I believe, too, that the men to whom they owe all their improvement, the Wesleys, and Whitfields, in short, the very men whom they drove one by one out of the Church, from persecution or disgust. And I do think it strange, that if so much is doing for the lower classes, the working men, who form the mass of the lower classes, are just those who scarcely feel the effects of it, while the churches seem to me filled with children, and rich and respectable, to the almost entire exclusion of the adult lower classes. A strange religion this!" I went on, "and to judge by its effects a very different one from that prevailed in India 1800 years ago, if we are to believe the Gospel story."

"What on earth do you mean?" Is not the Church of England the very purest form of Apostolic Christianity?"

"It may be—and so may the other sects. But, somehow, in India, it was the publicans and harlots who pressed into the kingdom of heaven; it was the common people who heard Christ gladly. Christianity, then, was a movement in the hearts of the lower order. But now, my dear fellow, you rich, who used to be told, in St. James's time, to weep and howl, have turned the tables upon us poor. It is you who are talking, all day long, of converting us. Look at my place of worship: you like, orthodox and heretical. Who fill the pews? the opulent and the reprobate? No—the Pharisees and the covetous, who used to deride Christ, fill His churches, and say still, 'This people, these masses, who know not the Gospel, are accursed.' And the universal feeling, as far as I can judge, seems to be, not 'how hardly shall they who have,' but how hardly shall they who have not, 'riches, enter into the kingdom of heaven!'"

"Upon my word," said he, laughing, "I did not give you credit for so much eloquence. You seem to have studied the Bible to some purpose, too. I didn't think that so much Radicalism could be squeezed out of a few texts of Scripture. It's quite a new light to me. I'll just mark that card, and play it when I get a convenient opportunity. It may be a winning one in these democratic times."

And he did play it, as I heard hereafter, but at present he seemed to think, that the less that was said further on clerical subjects the better, and commenced quizzing the people whom we passed, humorously and justly enough, while I walked on in silence, and thought of Mr. Byc Ends, in the "Philgrim's Progress." And yet I believe the man was really in earnest. He was really desirous to do what was right, as far as he knew it, and all the more desirous, because he saw, in the present state of society, what was right would pry him. God shall judge him, not I. Who can unravel the confusion of selfishness and devotion that exists even in his own heart, much less in that of another?

The dean was not at home that day, having left town on business. George nodded familiarly to the footman who opened the door.

"You'll mind and send me word the moment your master comes home—mind, now."

The fellow promised obedience, and we walked away.

"You seem to be very intimate here," said I, "with all parties."

"Oh! footmen are useful animals—a half-sovereign now and then is not altogether thrown away upon them. But as for the higher powers, it is very easy to make oneself at home in the dean's study, but not so much so to get a footing in the drawing-room above. I suspect he keeps a precious sharp eye upon the fair Miss Talham."

"But," I asked, as a jealous pang shot through my heart, "how did you contrive to get this same footing at all? When I met you at Cambridge, you seemed already well acquainted with the people."

"How does a hound get a footing on a cold scent? By working and resting about and about, and drawing on it inch by inch, as I draw on them for you, my boy, and cold enough the scent was. You recollect that day at the Dulwich Gallery? I tried to see the arms on the carriage, but there were none, so that cock wouldn't fight."

"The arms—I should never have thought of such a plan."

"Don't say you wouldn't. Then I looked back to the doorkeeper, while you were st-Sebastianising. He didn't know their names, or didn't choose to show me their ticket, on which it ought to have been, so I went to one of the fellows whom I knew, and got him to find out. There comes out the value of money—for money makes acquaintances. Well, I found who they were—Then I saw no chance of getting at them. But for the rest of that year, at Trinity, I beat every bush in the University, to find someone who knew them, and as fortune favours the brave, at last I hit off this Lord Lynedole, and he, of course, was the ace of trumps—a fine catch in himself, and a double catch, because he was going to marry the cousin. So I made a dead set at him, and to his work I had to set him, I can tell you, for 'he was three or four years older than I, and had travelled a good deal and seen life. But every man has his weak side, and I found his was a sort of a High Church Radicalism, and that suited me well enough, for I was always a denier of a Radical myself, so I stuck to him like a leech, and stood all his temper, and his pride, and those impractical, windy visions of his, that made a common-sense fellow like me sick to listen to, but I stood it, and here I am."

"And what an catch induced you to stoop to all this 'meritless I was on the point of saying. 'Surely you are in no want of money—your father could buy you a good living to-morrow."

"And he will, but not the one I want, and he could not buy me reputation, power, rank, do you see, Alton, my genius? And what's more, he couldn't buy me a certain little fit bit, a jewel, worth a Jew's eye and a half, Alton, that I set my heart on from the first moment I set my eye on it."

My heart beat fast and hard, but he ran on—

"Do you think I'd have eaten all this dirt, if it hadn't been in my way to her? But dirt! I'd drink blood, Alton—though I don't often deal in strong words—if it lay in that road. I never set my heart on the thing yet, that I didn't get it at last by fair means or foul—and I'll get her! I don't care for her money, though that's a pretty plum—upon my life, I don't. I worship her, limbs and eyes—I worship the very ground she treads on. She's a duck and a darling," said he, smacking his lips like an ogre over his prey, "and I'll have her before I've done, so help me—"

"Whom do you mean?" I stammered out.

"Lilham 'yon blind beetle!"

I dropped his arm—"Never as I live!"

He started back, and burst into a hoarse laugh.

"Hullo ' my eye and Bot y' Muttin! You don't mean to say that I have the honour of finding a rival in my talented cousin?"

I made no answer.

"Come, come, my dear fellow, this is too ridiculous. You and I are very good friends, and we may help each other, if we choose, like kith and kin, 'in this here wale.' So if you're fool enough to quarrel with me, I warn you I'm not fool enough to return the compliment. Only" (lowering his voice), "just hear one little thing in mind—that I am, unfortunately, of a somewhat deteriorated humour, and if folks will get in my way, why, it's not my fault if I drive over them. You understand? Well, if you intend to be sulky, I don't care. So, good-morning, till you feel yourself better."

And he turned gaily down a side street, and disappeared, looking taller, handsomer, manlier than ever.

I returned home miserable, I now saw in my cousin, not merely a rival, but a tyrant, and I began to hit him with that bitterness which fear alone can inspire. The eleven pounds still remained unpaid. Between three and four pounds was the utmost which I had been able to hold up that autumn, by dint of scolding and stinging, there was no chance of profit from my book for months to come—if indeed it ever got published, which I hardly dare believe it would, and I knew him too well to doubt that neither pity nor delicacy would restrain him from using his power over me, if I dared even to seem an obstacle in his way.

I tried to write, but could not. I found it impossible to direct my thoughts, even to sit still, a vague spectre of terror and degeneration crushed me. Day after day I sat over the fire, and jumped up and went into the shop, to handle something which I did not want, and peep listlessly into a dozen books, one after the other, and then wander back again to the bedside, to sit moaning and moping, staring at that horrible incubus of debt—a devil which my great mad strength to the strong, but only partly overcomes the weak. And I was weak, as every poet is, more or less. There was in me, as I have somewhere read that there is in all poets, that feminine vein—a receptive as well as a creative faculty—which kept up in me a continual thirst after beauty, rest, enjoyment. And here was circumstance after circumstance goading me onward, as the gully did so, to continual wandering, never ceasing exertions, every hour calling on me to do, while I was only longing to be—to sit and observe, and fancy, and build freely at my own will. And then—as if this necessity of perpetual petty exertion was not in itself sufficient torment—to have that accursed debt—that knowledge that I was in a rival's power, rising up like a black wall before me, to cripple, and render hopeless, for aught I knew, the very exertions to which it compelled me! I hated the hustle—the crowds, the ceaseless roar of the street outside madly noised me. I longed in vain for peace—for one day's freedom—to be one hour a shepherd boy, and be looking up at the blue sky, without a thought beyond the rushes I was plucking! "Oh, that I had wings as a dove!—then would I flee away, and be at rest!"

And then more than once, or twice either, the thoughts of sinners crossed me; and I turned it over, and looked at it, and dallied with it, as a last chance in reserve. And then the thought of Lillian came, and drove away the fiend. And then the thought of my cousin came, and paralysed me again, for it told me that one hope was impossible. And then some fresh instance of misery or oppression forced itself upon me, and made me feel the awful soreness of my calling, as a champion of the poor, and the wise cowardice of deserting them for any selfish love of rat. And then I recollected how I had betrayed my suffering brothers—how for the sake of vanity and patronage, I had consented to hide the truth about their rights—their wrongs. And so on, through weary weeks of morbid melancholy—"a double-minded man, unstable in all his ways."

At last, Mackaye, who, as I found afterwards, had been watching all along my altered mood, contrived to worm my secret out of me. He had decided, that whole autumn, having to tell him the truth, because I knew that his first impulse would be to pay the money instantly out of his own pocket, and my pride, as well as my sense of justice, revolted at that, and scaled my lips. But now this fresh discovery—the knowledge that it was not only in my cousin's power to crush me but also his interest to do so—had utterly unmanned me, and, after a little innocent and fruitless precaution, out came the truth, with tears or better shame.

The old man passed up his lips, and, without answering me, opened his table drawer, and commenced fumbling among accounts and papers.

"No! no! no! best, noblest of friends! I will not burden you with the fruits of my own vanity and extravagance. I will at once go to gaol, sooner than take your money. If you offer it me, I will leave the house, bag and baggage, this moment." And I rose to put my threat into execution.

"I have no present or any intention," answered he, deliberately, "seeing that there's na necessity for paying debts twice ower, when ye ha' the stamp receipt for them." And he put into my hands, to my astonishment and rapture, a receipt in full for the money, signed by my cousin.

Not daring to believe my own eyes, I turned it over and over, looked at it, looked at him—there was nothing but clear, smiling assurance in his beloved old face, as he twinkled, and winked, and chuckled, and pulled off his spectacles, and wiped them, and put them on upside down, and then relieved himself by rushing at his pipe, and cramming it fiercely with tobacco till he burst the bowl.

Yes, it was no dream! the money was paid, and I was free! The sudden relief was as intolerable as the long burden had been, and, like a prisoner suddenly loosed from off the rack, my whole spirit seemed to collapse, and I sunk with my head upon the table, too faint even for gratitude.

But who was my benefactor? Mackaye vouchsafed no answer, but that I "suld ken better than he." But when he found that I was really utterly at a loss to whom to attribute the mercy, he assured me, by way of comfort, that he was just as ignorant as myself, and at last, piecemeal, in his cautious laconic and cautious Scotch method, informed me, that some six weeks back he had received an anonymous letter, "a' the gither o' a Bazaarian cast o' phrazis," containing a bank note for twenty pounds, and setting forth the writer's suspicions that I owed my cousin money, and then desired that Mr. Mackay, "o' whose uprightness in general they were pleased to confess themselves no thit ignorant," should write to him, ascertain the sum, and pay it without my knowledge, handing over the balance, if any, to me, when he thought fit—"Sae there's the remnant—unthit pounds, saxe shillings, an' pence etc., the pence being deducted for expenses o' twa letters, anent the same transaction."

"But what sort of handwriting was it?" asked I, almost disregarding the welcome coin.

"On, then—ablin's i' mine, ablin's a mind's. It was na chrogaphic o'phic himself—an he had na curiosity anent our sic passages o' aristocratic romance."

"But what was the postmark of the letter?"

"Why for suld I ha' opened? Gin the writers had been minded to be known, they'd ha' sign'd their names upon the document. An' gin they didna sae intend, wad it be courteous o' me to gang speering an' peering ower covers an' seals?"

"But where is the cover?"

"On, there," he went on, with the same provoking coolness, "white paper's o' gey use, in various operations o' the domestic economy. Sae I just tair it up—ablin's for pipe lights—I canna mind at this time."

"And why—" asked I, more vexed and disappointed than I liked to confess—"why did you not tell me before?"

"How wad I ken that you had need o' it? An' verily, I thought it no that bad a lesson for yo, to let the experiment a townsmen man on the precious balms that break the head—whereby I opine the Psalmist was minded to denote the delights o' spending borrowed siller."

There was nothing more to be extracted from him, so I was fain to set to work again (a pleasant compulsion truly) with a free heart, eight pounds in my pocket, and a brainful of conjectures. Was it the dean? Lord Lynedale? or was it—could it be—Lillian herself." That thought was so delicious, that I made up my mind, as I had free choice among half a dozen equally improbable fancies, to determine that the most pleasant should be the true one, and I hoarded the money, which I shrunk from spending as much as I should from selling her miniature or a lock of her beloved golden hair. They were a gift from her—a pledge—the first fruits of—I dared not confess to myself what.

Whereat the reader will smile, and say, not without reason, that I was fast fitting myself for Bellam, if indeed, I had not proved my fitness for it already, by paying the tailor's debts, instead of my own, with the ten pounds which Farmer Porter had given me. I am not sure that he would not be correct, but so I did, and so I suffered.

CHAPTER XXV

A TRUE SCOTSMAN

At last my list of subscribers was completed, and my poems actually in the press. Oh! the childish joy with which I fondled my first set of proofs! And how much finer the words looked in print than they ever did in manuscript!—One took in the idea of a whole page so charmingly at a glance, instead of having to feel one's way through line after line, and sentence after sentence—I here was only one drawback to my happiness—Mackye did not seem to sympathise with it. He had never grumbled at what I considered, and still do consider, my cardinal offence,—the omission of the strong political passages,—he seemed, on the contrary, in his inexplicable waywardness, to be rather pleased at it than otherwise. It was my publishing at all at which he growled.

"Eek," he said, "owre young to marry, is owre young to write, but it's the way o' these pair distractit times. Nae chick can find a grain o' corn, but oot he runs cawking wi' the shell on his head, to tell it to a' the warbl, as if there was never barley grown on the face o' the earth before. I wonder whether Isaiah begin to write before his beard was grown, or David either? He had mony a long year o' shepherding an' moss-trooping an' rugging an' riving i' the wilderness, ill warrant, afore he got thae gran' lyrics o' his oot o' him. Ye might tak' example too, gin ye were minded, by Moses, the man o' God, that was joust forty years at the learning o' the Egyptians, afore he tho' it gude to come forward into public life, an' then fun', to lug gran' sin-poise, I warrant, that he'd begun forty years too soon—an' then had forty years man', after that, o' marching an' law-giving, an' bearing the burdens o' the people, before he turned poet."

"Poet, na! I never saw Moses in that light before."

"Then ye'll just read the 90th Psalm—the prayer o' Moses, the man o' God—the grandest piece o' lyric, to my taste, that I ever heird o' on the face o' God's earth, na' see what a man can write that'll have the patience to wait a century or twa before he runs to the publisher's. I gie ye up fra' this moment, the letting out o' ink is like the letting out o' waters, or the catling o' opinion, or the getting up at public meetings when a man begins he canna stop. There's nae man enlaving last o' the flesh under the heaven than that same furore scribendi, as the Latins hae it."

But at last my poems were printed, and bound, and actually published, and I sat staring at a book of my own making, and wondering how it ever got into being! And what was more, the book "took," and sold, and was reviewed in people's journals, and in newspapers, and Mackaye himself re-acted into a grin, when his orack, the Spectator, the only honest paper, according to him, on the face of the earth, condescended, after asserting its imputability by two or three scorching sarcasms, to dismiss me, grimly laughing, with a paternal pat on the shoulder. Yes—I was a real live author at last, and signed myself, by special request, in the * * * * Magazine, as "the author of Songs of the Highways." At last it struck me and Mackaye too, who however he hated Huckleysdon, never overlooked an act of discomity, that it would be right for me to call upon the dean, and thank him formally for all the real kindness he had shown me. So I went to the handsome house off Harley Street, and was shown into his study, and saw my own book lying on the table, and was welcomed by the good old man, and congratulated on my success, and asked if I did not see my own wisdom in "yielding to more experienced opinions than my own, and submitting to a censorship which, however severe it might have appeared at first, was, as the event proved, benignant both in its intentions and effects?"

And then I was asked, even I, to breakfast there the next morning. And I went, and found no one there but some scientific gentlemen, to whom I was introduced as "the young man whose poems we were talking of last night." And Lilham sat at the head of the table, and poured out the coffee and tea. And between ecstasy at seeing her, and the intense relief of not finding my dreaded and now hated cousin there, I sat in a delirium of silent joy, staring glances at her beauty, and listening with all my ears to the conversation, which turned upon the now married couple.

I heard endless praises, to which I could not but assent in silence, of Lord Ellatim's perfections. His very personal appearance had been enough to captivate my fancy, and then they went on to talk of his magnificent philanthropic schemes, and his deep sense of the high duties of a landlord, and how, finding himself, at his father's death, the possessor of two vast but neglected estates, he had sold one in order to be able to do justice to the other, instead of laying house to house, and field to field, like most of his compere, "till he stood alone in the land, and there was no place left," and how he had lowered his rents, even though it had forced him to put down the ancestral pack of hounds, and live in a corner of the old castle, and how he was draining, claying, breaking up old meadows, and building clonches, and endowing schools, and improving cottages, and how he was expelling the old ignorant bankrupt race of farmers, and advertising everywhere for men of capital, and science, and character, who would have courage to cultivate flax and silk, and try every species of experiment, and how he had one scientific farmer after another staying in his house as a friend, and how he had numbers of his books rebound in plain covers, that he might lend them to everyone on his estate who wished to read them, and how he had thrown open his picture gallery, not only to the inhabitants of the neighbouring town, but what (strange to say) seemed to strike the party as still more remarkable, to the labourers of his own village, and how he was at that moment busy transforming an old unoccupied manor house into a great associate farm, in which all the labourers were to live under one roof, with a common kitchen and dining hall, clerks, and superintendents, whom they were to choose, subject only to his approval, and all of them from the least to the greatest, leave their own interest in the farm, and be paid by percentage on the profits, and how he had one of the best political economists of the day staying with him, in order to work out fair labour shares of proportionate remuneration, applicable to such an agricultural establishment, and how, too, he was giving the spindle labour system a fair trial, by laying out small cottage farms, on rocky knolls and sides of glens, too steep to be cultivated by the plough, and was locating, on them, the most intelligent artisans whom he could draft from the manufacturing town hard by.

And at that notion, my heart grew giddy with the hope of seeing myself one day in one of those snug cottages, tilling the earth, under good sky, and perhaps—and then a whole cloud world of love, freedom, fame, snug, grateful country luxury streamed up across my brain, to end, not, like the man in the "Arabian Night," in my kicking over the tray of China, which formed the base point of my married period of hope, but in my finding the contents of my plate deposited in my lap, while I was gazing fixedly at Lillian.

I must say for myself, though, that such accidents happened seldom, whether it was bashfulness, or the tact which generally, I believe, accompanies a weak and nervous body, and an active mind, or whether it was that I possessed enough relationship to the monkey tribe to make me a first-rate mimic. I used to get tolerably well through on these occasions, by acting on the golden rule of never doing anything which I had not seen someone else do first—a rule which never brought me into any greater scrape than swallowing something intolerably hot, sour, and nasty (which of I never discovered the name), because I had seen the dean do so a moment before.

But one thing struck me through the whole of this conversation—the way in which the new married Lady Elktion was spoken of, as aiding, encouraging, originating a helpmeet, if not an oracular guide, for her husband—in all the noble plans. She had already acquainted herself with every woman on the estate, she was the dispenser, not merely of alms, for those seemed a disagreeable necessity, from which Lord Elktion was anxious to escape as soon as possible, but of advice, comfort, and encouragement. She not only visited the sick, and taught in the schools, variations which, thank God, I have reason to believe are matters of course, not only in the families of clergymen, but those of most squires and noblemen, when they reside on their estates—but solicited, from the hints which I gathered, to be utterly devoted, body and soul, to the welfare of the dwellers on her husband's land.

"I had no notion," I dared at last to remark, humbly enough, "that Miss—Lady Elktion cared so much for the people."

"Really?" One feels inclined sometimes to wish that she cared for anything besides them," said Lillian, half to her father and half to me.

This gave a fresh shake to my estimate of that remarkable woman's character. But still, who could be prouder, more imperious, more abrupt in manner, harsh even to the very core—"I am not a person" (for I had learnt what that meant from the debating society as well as from the drawing room), and, above all, had she not tried to keep me from Lillian? But these cloudy thoughts melted rapidly away in that sunny atmosphere of success and happiness, and I went home as merry as a bird, and wrote all the morning more gracefully and sportively, as I fancied, than I had ever yet done.

But my bliss did not end here. In a week or so, behold one morning a note—written, indeed, by the dean—but directed to Lillian's own hand, inviting me to come there to tea, that I might see a few of the literary characters of the day.

I covered the envelope with kisses, and thrust it next my fluttering heart. I then proudly showed the note to Mackaye. He looked pleased, yet pensive, and then broke out with a fresh adoption of his favourite song,—

"—and sheweth hath and a that—A man's a man for a that."

"The auld gentleman is a man and a gentleman, an' has made a vera comtious, an' wad cauderit move, gin ye ha' the senso to profit by it, an' no' turn it to yer ain destruction."

"Destruction?"

"Ay--that's the word, an' nothing less, laddie!"

And he went into the outer shop and returned with a volume of Bulwer's 'Last of the Maltraverses'.

"Whit' are you a novel reader, Mr Mackaye?"

"How do ye ken what I may ha' thoct guid to read in my time? Ye'll be pleased the noo to sit down an' begin at that page—an' read, mark, learn, an' inwardly digest the history of Castiglione (Cesari)—an' the gude God gie ye grace to lay the same to heart."

I read that fearful story, and my heart sunk, and my eyes were full of tears, long ere I had finished it. Suddenly I looked up at Mackaye, half angry at the pointed allusion to my own case.

The old man was watching me intently, with folded hands, and a smile of solemn interest and affection worthy of Homer himself. He turned his head as I looked up, but his lips kept moving. I fancied, I know not why, that he was praying for me.

CHAPTER XXVI

THE TRIUMPHANT AUTHOR.

So to the party I went, and had the delight of seeing and hearing the men with whose names I had been long acquainted, as the leaders of scientific discovery in this wondrous age, and more than one poet, too, over whose works I had gloated, whom I had worshipped in secret. Intense was the pleasure of now realising to myself, as living men, wearing the same flesh and blood as myself, the names which had been to me mythic ideas. Lillian was there among them, more exquisite than ever, but even she at first attracted my eyes and thoughts less than did the tiny great men around her. I hung on every word they spoke, I watched every gesture, as if they must have some deep significance, the very way in which they drank their coffee was a matter of interest to me. I was almost disappointed to see them eat and chat like common men. I expected that pearls and diamonds would drop from their lips, as they did from those of the girl in the fairy tale, every time they opened their mouths, and certainly the conversation that evening was a new world to me—though I could only, of course, be a listener. Indeed, I wished to be nothing more. I felt that I was taking my place there among the holy guild of authors—that I too, however humbly, had a thing to say, and had said it, and I was content to sit on the lowest step of the literary temple, without envy for those elder and more practised priests of wisdom, who had earned by long labours the freedom of the inner shrine. I should have been quite happy enough standing there, looking and listening—but I was at last forced to come forward. Lillian was busy chatting with grave, grey-headed men, who seemed as ready to hit, and pet, and admire the lovely little fairy, as if they had been as young and gay as herself. It was enough for me to see her appreciated and admired. I loved them for smiling on her, for handing her from her seat to the piano with reverent courtesy. Gladly would I have taken their place. I was content, however, to be only a spectator, for it was not my rank, but my youth, I was glad to fancy, which denied me that blissful honour. But as she sang, I could not help stealing up to the piano, and, feasting my greedy eyes with every motion of those delicious lips, listen and listen, entranced, and living only in that melody.

Suddenly, after singing two or three songs, she began fingering the keys, and struck into an old air, wild and plaintive, rising and falling like the swell of an Arabian harp upon a distant breeze.

"Ah! now," she said, "if I could get words for that! What an exquisite lament somebody might write to it, if they could only thoroughly take in the feeling and meaning of it!"

"Perhaps," I said, humbly, "that is the only way to write songs—to let some one get possession of one's whole soul, and gradually inspire the words for itself, as the old Hebrew prophets had music played before them, to wake up the prophetic spirit within them."

She looked up, just as if she had been unconsciously of my presence till that moment.

"Ah! Mr. Locke—well, if you understand my meaning so thoroughly, perhaps you will try and write some words for me."

"I am afraid that I do not enter sufficiently into the meaning of the air."

"Oh! then, listen while I play it over again. I am sure you ought to appreciate anything so sad and tender."

And she did play it, to my delight, over again, even more gracefully and carefully than before—making the articulate sounds speak a mysterious, train of thoughts and emotions. It is strange how little real intellect, in women especially, is required for an exquisite appreciation of the beauties of music—perhaps, because it appeals to the heart and not the head.

She rose and left the piano, saying, archly, "Now, don't forget your promise," and I, poor fool, my sunlight suddenly withdrawn, began torturing my brains on the instant to think of a subject.

As it happened, my attention was caught by hearing two gentlemen close to me discuss a beautiful sketch by Copley Fielding, if I recollect rightly, which hung on the wall—a wild waste of tidal sands, with here and there a line of stake-nets fluttering in the wind—a grey shroud of rain sweeping up from the westward, through which low red hills glowed dimly in the rays of the setting sun—a train of horses and cattle splashing slowly through shallow desolate pools and creeks, their wet, red, and black hides glittering in one long line of level light.

They seemed thoroughly conversant with art, and as I listened to their criticisms I learnt more in five minutes, about the characteristics of a really true and good picture, and about the perfection to which our univalued English landscape painters have attained, than I ever did from all the books and criticisms which I had read. One of them had seen the spot represented, at the mouth of the Dee, and began telling wild stories of salmon fishing, and wild fowl shooting—and then a tale of a girl, who, in bringing her father's cattle home across the sands, had been caught by a sudden flow of the tide, and found next day, a corpse, hanging among the stake-nets far below. The tragedy, the wit of the picture, the simple, dignified grandeur of the scenery, took possession of me, and I stood gazing a long time, and fancying myself pacing the sands, and wondering whether there were shells upon it—I had often longed for once only in my life to pick up shells—when Lady Ellerton, whom I had not before noticed, woke me from my reverie.

I took the liberty of asking after Lord Ellerton.

"He is not in town—he has stayed behind for one day to attend a great meeting of his tenants—you will see the account in the papers to-morrow morning—he comes to-morrow." And as she spoke, her whole face and figure seemed to glow and heave, in spite of herself, with pride and indignation.

"And now, come with me. Mr. Leake—the ambassador wishes to speak to you."

"The ambassador?" I said, startled for let us be democratic as we will, there is something in the name of great officers which awes, perhaps rightly for the moment, and it requires a strong act of self-possession to recollect that "ambassador" is a man for a' that. Besides, I knew enough of the great man in question to stand in awe of him for his own sake, having lately read a pincygne of him, which perfectly astounded me, by its description of his piety and virtue, his family affection, and patriarchal simplicity, the liberality and philanthropy of all his measures, and the enormous intellectual powers, and stores of learning, which enabled him, with the affairs of Europe on his shoulders, to write deeply and originally on the most abstruse questions of theology, history, and science.

Lady Ellerton seemed to guess my thoughts. "You need not be afraid of meeting an aristocrat, in the vulgar sense of the word. You will see one who, once perhaps as unknown as yourself, has risen by virtue and wisdom to guide the destinies of nations—and shall I tell you how? Not by fawning and yielding to the fancies of the great, not by compromising his own convictions to suit their prejudices—"

I felt the rebuke, but she went on.

"He owes his greatness to having dared, one evening, to contradict a crown prince to his face, and fairly conquer him in argument, and thereby bind the truly royal heart to him forever."

"There are few scenes of royalty to whose favour that would be a likely path."

"True, and therefore the greater honour is due to the young student who could contradict, and the prince who could be contradicted."

By this time we had arrived in the great man's presence; he was sitting with a little circle round him, in the further drawing-room, and certainly I never saw a nobler specimen of humanity. I felt myself at once before a hero—not of war and bloodshed, but of peace and civilisation—his portly and ample figure, fair hair, and delicate complexion, and, above all, the hegimant calm of his countenance, told of a character gentle and genial at peace with himself and all the world, while the exquisite proportion of his chiselled and classic features, the lofty and ample brow, and the keen, thoughtful eye, bespoke, at the first glance, refinement and wisdom—

* The reason from the temperate will—
Futurism, fore-sight, strength and skill.

I am not ashamed to say, Charist as I am, that I felt inclined to fall upon my knees, and own a master of God's own making.

He received my beautiful guide with a look of chivalrous affection, which I observed that she returned with interest, and then spoke in a voice peculiarly kind and melodious.

"So, my dear lady, this is the protégé of whom you have so often spoken."

So she had often spoken of me. Blind fool that I was, I only took it in as food for my own self-conceit, that my enemy (for so I actually fancied her) could not help praising me.

"I have read your little book, sir," he said, in the same soft, benignant voice, "with very great pleasure. It is another proof, if I required any, of the undiminished living and healthful thought which exists even in the less known ranks of your great nation. I shall send it to some young friends of mine in Germany, to show them that Englishmen can eloquently and speak boldly on the social evils of their country, without indulging in that fruitless and futile revolution."

ALTON LOCKE,

timid spirit, which warps so many young minds among us. You understand the German language at all?"

"I had not that honour."

"Well, you must learn it. We have much to teach you in the sphere of abstract thought, as you have much to teach us in those of the practical reason and the knowledge of mankind. I should be glad to see you some day in a German university. I am anxious to encourage a truly spiritual fraternisation between the two great branches of the Teutonic stock, by welcoming all brave young English spirits to the ancient father-land. Perhaps hereafter your kind friends here will be able to lend you to me. The means are easy, thank God! You will find in the German true brothers, in ways even more practical than sympathy and affection."

I could not but thank the great man, with many blushes, and went home that night uttering "c'est monnaie," as I believe the French phrase is—beside myself with gratified vanity and love, to lie sleepless under a severe fit of asthma—sent perhaps as a wholesome chastisement, to cool my excited spirits down to something like a rational pitch. As I lay in my castle building, Lillian's wild air rang still in my ears, and combined itself somehow with that picture of the Cheshire Sands, and the story of the drowned girl, till it shaped itself into a song, which, as it is yet unpublished, and as I have hitherto obtruded little or nothing of my own composition on my readers, I may be excused for inserting here

I.

"O Mary, go and call the cattle home,
And call the cattle home,
And call the cattle home,
Across the sands o' Dee.
The western wind was wild and dank with foam,
And all alone went she."

II.

The creeping tide came up along the sand,
And o'er and o'er the sand,
And round and round the sand,
As far as eye could see,
The blinding mist came down and hid the land
And never house came she."

III.

"Oh, is it weed, or fish, or floating hair—
A tress o' golden hair,
O' drowned mermaid's hair,
Above the net at sea?
Was never salmon yet that shone so fair,
Among the stakes on Dee."

IV.

They rowed her in across the rolling foam,
The cruel crawling foam,
The cruel hungry foam,
To her grave beside the sea.
But still the boatmen hear her call the cattle home
Across the sands o' Dee."

There—let it go!—it was meant as an offering for one whom it never reached. About mid-day I took my way toward the dean's house, to thank him for his hospitality —and, I need not say, to present my offering in my noble shawl, and as I went I con- nected over a dozen complimentary speeches about Lord Ellerton's wisdom, liberality, eloquence—but behold! the shutters of the house were closed. What could be the matter? It was full ten minutes before the door was opened, and then, at last, an old woman, her eyes red with weeping, made her appearance. My thoughts flew instantly to Lillian—something must have befallen her. I gasped out her name first, and then, recollecting myself, asked for the dean.

"They had all left town that morning."

"Miss—Miss Winstanley—is she ill?"

"No."

"Thank God!" I breathed freely again. What matter what happened to all the world beside?

"Ay, thank God, indeed, but poor Lord Ellerton was thrown from his horse last night and brought home dead. A messenger came here by six this morning, and the lady is all gone off to * * *. Her ladyship's riding mad—and no wonder! And she burst out crying afresh and shut the door in my face."

Lord Ellerton dead! and Lillian gone too! Something whispered that I should have care to remember that day. My heart smelt within me. When should I see her again?

That day was the 1st of June, 1845. On the 10th of April, 1848, I saw Lillian Winstanley again. Dare I write my history between those two points of time? Yes, even that must be done, for the sake of the rich who read, and the poor who suffer.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE PLUSH BREECHES TRAGEDY.

My triumph had received a cruel check, though, when just at its height, and none were appointed to follow. Behold! some two days after, another—all the more bitter, because my conscience whispered that it was not altogether undeserved. The people's press had been hitherto praising and putting me lovingly enough. I had been classed (and Heaven knows that the comparison was nearer to me than all the applause of the wealthy) with the Corn Law Rhymers, and the author of the "Purgatory of Suicides." My class had claimed my talents as their own—another "voice fresh from the heart of Nature," another "untutored songster of the wilderness," another "prophet arisen among the suffering millions,"—when, one day, behold in Mr. O'Flynn's paper a long and fierce attack on me, my poems, my early history! How he could have got at some of the facts there mentioned, how he could have dared to inform his readers that I had broken my mother's heart by my misconduct,

TAILOR AND POET

I cannot conceive; unless my worthy brother-in-law, the Baptist preacher, had been kind enough to furnish him with the materials. But however that may be, he showed me no mercy. I was suddenly discovered to be a time server, a spy, a concealed aristocrat. Such paltzy talent as I had, I had prostituted for the sake of fame. I had deserted The People's Cause for filthy lucre, an allurement which Mr. O'Flynn had always treated with withering scorn in print. Nay more, I would write, and not only did write, in any paper, Whig, Tory, or Radical, where I could earn a shilling by an enormous gooseberry, or a scrap of private scandal. And the working-men were solemnly warned to beware of me and my writings, till the editor had further investigated certain ugly facts in my history, which he would in due time report to his patriotic and enlightened readers.

All this stung me in the most sensitive nerve of my whole heart, for I knew that I could not altogether exculpate myself, and to that miserable certainty was added the dread of some fresh exposure. Had he actually been sharp of the omissions in my poems?—and if he once touched on that subject, what could I answer? Oh! how bitterly now I felt the force of the critic's careless lash! The awful responsibility of those written words which we haphazard so thoughtlessly. As I recollected now, with shame and remorse, all the hasty and cruel utterance to which I, too, had given vent against those who had dared to differ from me, the harsh, one-sided judgments, the reckless imputations of motive, the bitter sneers, "rejoicing in evil rather than in the truth." How I, too, had longed to prove my victims in the wrong, and turned away not only lazily, but angrily, from many an explanatory fact! And here was my Nemesis come at last. As I had doped unto others, so it was done unto me!

It was right that it should be so. How ever malignant, mad, almost murderous, I felt at the time, I thank God for it now. It is good to be punished in kind. It is good to be made to feel what we have made others feel. It is good anything is good, however bitter, which shows us that there is such a law as retribution, that we are not the sport of blind chance or a triumphant devil, but that there is a God who judges the earth—righteous to repay every man according to his works.

But at the moment I had no such ray of comfort—and, full of rage and shame, I dashed the paper down before Mackaye. "How shall I answer him? What shall I say?"

The old man read it all through with a grim saturnine snarl.

"Hoochie, hoochie, speech is o' silver—silence is o' gold," says Thomas Carlyle, ancient this an' other matters. Whad he fished wi' sie blithers? Ye'll just abide patient, an' hand still in the Lord, until this tyranny be ower past. Commit your cause to Him, and the an'bl Psalmist, an' he'll mak' your righteousness as clear as the light, an' you'll just dealing as the noonday."

But I must explain, I owe it as a duty to myself, I must refute these charges, I must justify myself to our friends."

"Can ye do that same, laddie?" asked he, with one of his quaint, searching looks. Somehow, I blushed, and could not altogether meet his eye, while he went on, "An' gin ye could, whaur would ye do it? I ken na periodical whaur the editor will gin ye a chur stage an' no favour to hang him ower the lugs."

"Then I will try some other paper."

"An' whint for then? They that read him wamma read the other, an' they that read the other wamma read him. He has his an' set o' dupes, like every other editor, an' ye mun let him gang his gait, an' feel his ain kye with his ain hay. He'll no' change it for your budding."

"What an abominable thing this whole business of the press is, then, if each editor is to be allowed to humbug his readers at his pleasure, without a possibility of exposing or contravening him!"

"An' ye've just spok'n the truth, laddie. There's na man mused inquisition, than this of these self-elected popes, the editors. That pun and Roman ane, ye're bringin' him forth whan ye list, had as he is. He mun hibe in coin his names ower his shop door. But these anonymous priests o' the order o' Mchusitic by the deevil's sole, without father or mother, beginning o' ye as na end o' days—without a local habitation or a name—as kittle to hand as a brick in a laith—"

"What do you mean, Mr. Mackaye?" asked I, for he was getting altogether intelligibly Scotch, as was his custom when excited.

"Oh, I forgot, ye're a pun Southern body, an' na' sensible to the grand metaphoric powers o' the true Dawie. But it's an an'ist stit a'the 'hoochie, the noo, this o' the anonymous pie, once againly devised, ye ken, by Balaam the son o' Ben, for serving Goid wi'out the deevil's humbug it out an' noo, after the way o' human institutions, translated ower to help folks to serve the deevil wi'out God's humbug it out. I'm astonished at the pun aspinning religious pieces for siccan a fa', but for the working men to be a' as bad it's gressome to behold. I'll tell ye what, my bunn, there's na salvation for the workmen, while they denie themselves this lathum, wi' a' the very uills o' their ain tyrants—wi' salvation by act o' Parliament—irresponsible rights o' property—anonymous Balaamry--fechtin that mny and furent fund, Mammon, wi' his ain weapons—and then a fleyed, because they get well beaten for their pains. I'm forfoughten this mony a year wi' watchin the pun gowks, trying to do God's work wth the devil's tools. 'Tak' tent o' that."

And I did "tak' tent o' it." Still there would have been as little present consolation as usual in Mackaye's unwelcome truths, even if the matter had stopped there. But, alas! it did not stop there. O'Flynn seemed determined to "run minick" at me. Every week some fresh attack appeared. The very passages about the universities and Church property, which had caused our quarrel, were printed against me, with fine additions and comments, and, at last, to my horror, out came the very story which I had all along denied, about the expurgation of my poems, with the coarsest allusions to petty court influence—aristocratic kisses and the Duchess of Devonshire canvassing daymen for love, etc. etc. Now he got a clue to the scandal I cannot conceive. Mackaye and Crosthwaite, I had thought, were the only souls to whom I had ever breathed the secret, and they denied indignantly the having ever betrayed my weakness. How it came out, I say again, I cannot conceive, except because it is a great evilating law, and sure to fulfil itself, sooner or later, is we may see by the histories of every remarkable, and many in unremarkable, man—"There is nothing secret, but it shall be made manifest, and whatsoever ye have spoken in the closet, shall be proclaimed upon the house tops."

For some time after that last exposure, I was thoroughly crestfallen—and not without reason. I had been giving a few lectures among the working men, on various literary and social subjects. I had found my audience decrease—and those who remained seemed more inclined to hiss than applaud me. In vain I lauded and quoted poetry, often more violently than my own opinions justified. My words touched no responsive chord in my hearers' hearts, they had lost faith in me.

At last, in the middle of a lecture on Shelley, I was indulging, and honestly too, in some very glowing and passionate praise of the true nobleness of a man, whom neither birth nor education could blind to the evils of society, who, for the sake of the suffering many, could trample under foot his hereditary pride, and become an outcast for The People's Cause.

I heard a whisper close to me, from one whose opinion I valued, and value still—a scholar and a poet, one who had tasted poverty, and slander, and a prison, for the Good Cause.

"Fine talk, but it's 'all in his day's work.' Will he dare to say that to-morrow to the ladies at the West-End?"

No—I should not. I knew it, and at that instant I felt myself a liar, and stopped short—my tongue clove to the roof of my mouth. I fumbled at my papers—clutched the water tumbler—tried to go on—stopped short again—caught up my hat, and rushed from the room, amid peals of astonished laughter.

It was some months after this that, fancying the storm blown over, I summoned up courage enough to attend a political meeting of our party, but even there my Nemesis met me full face. After some sanguinary speech, I really forgot from whom, and, if I recollected, God forbid that I should tell now, I dared to controvert, mildly enough, Heaven knows, some especially frantic assertion or other. But before I could get out three sentences, O'Flynn flew at me with a coarse invective, hummed on, by the bye, by one who, calling himself a gentleman, might have been expected to know better. But, indeed, he and O'Flynn had the same object in view, which was simply to sell their paper, and as a means to that great end, to pander to the nearest passions of their readers, to bully and silence all moderate and rational objectors, and put and tar on the physical force men, till the poor fellows begin to take them at their word. Then, when it came to deeds and not to talk, and people got frightened, and the sale of the paper decreased a little, a "desecrated change" came over them—and they awake one morning meeker than lambs, "ulterior measures" had vanished back into the barbarous ages, pikes, vitriol bottles, and all, and the public were entertained with nothing but homilies on pitiless and misguidance, the "triumphs of moral justice," the "omnipotence of public opinion," and the "gentle conquests of fraternal love"—till it was safe to talk treason and slaughter again.

But just then treason happened to be it a premium. Sedition, which had been lumbering on in a confused, disconsolate underground way ever since 1812, was supported by the public to be done, and for that very reason it was safe to talk it, or, at least, back up those who chose to do so. And so I got no quarter. Though really, if the truth must be told, I had said nothing unreasonable.

Home I went disgusted, to toil on at my lack writing, only praying that I might be let alone to scribble in peace, and often thinking, sadly, how little my friends in Harley Street could guess at the painful experience, the doubts, the struggles, the latter cares, which went to the making of the poetry which they admired so much.

I was not, however, left alone to scribble in peace, either by O'Flynn or by his readers, who formed, alas! just then, only too huge a portion of the thinking nation, every day brought some fresh slight or annoyance with it, till I received one afternoon, by the Pearly Delivery Company, a large wrapped packet, containing, to my infinite disgust, an old pair of yellow plush breeches, with a recommendation to wear them, whose meaning could not be mistaken.

Furious, I thrust the unoffending garment into the fire, and held it there with the tongs, regardless of the horrible smell which accompanied its martyrdom, till the lady lodged on the first floor rushed down to inquire whether the house was on fire.

I answered her by hurling a book at her head, and brought down a volley of abuse, under which I sat in sulky patience, till Mackayo and Crosshwaite came in, and found her railing in the doorway, and me sitting over the fire, still intent on the fizzling remains of the brimstones.

"Was this result of your invention, Mr. Crosshwaite?" asked I, in a tone of lofty indignation, holding up the last scrap of unroasted plash.

Roars of laughter from both of them made me only more frantic, and I broke out so incoherently, that it was some time before the pair could make out the cause of my fury.

"Upon my honour, Locke," quoth John, at last, holding his sides, "I never sent them, though, on the whole—you've made my stomach ache." Laughing, I can't speak. But you must expect a joke or two, after your late fashionable connections.

I stood, stiff and white with rage.

"Really, my good fellow, how can you wonder if our friends suspect you? Can you deny that you've been off and on lately between Blunderdom and 'The Cause,' like a donkey between two bottles of hay? Have you not neglected our meetings? Have you not picked all the spice out of your poems? And can you expect to eat your

I keep it too? You must be one thing or the other, and, though Sandy, here, is too kind to tell you, you disappointed us both miserably, and that's the long and the short of it.

I had my face in my hands, and sat moodily over the fire, my conscience told me that I had nothing to answer.

What, John, how can you sit on the fiddle this night at home still, and he'll do good service. But the devil always fights hardest with them he's meant to lead. What's this about agricultural distress we had to tell me the noon?"

"There is a rising down in the country, a friend of mine writes me. The people are starving, not because food is dear, but because it's cheap, and, like sensible men, they're going to have a great meeting, to inquire the rights and wrongs of all that. Now, I want to send a deputation down to see how far they are inclined to go, and let them know we up in London are with them. And then we might get up a corresponding association, you know. It's a great opening for spreading the principles of the Charter."

"I saw misdoit, it's just read they'll be wanting, they labourers, man than liberty. Then food is then belly, I'm thinking, and a vera poor, empty dol he is the noo, sma' munt offerings, and fat o' rams he gets, to propitiate him. But ye might send down a canny body, just to spy out the nakedness o' the land."

"I will go!" I said, starting up. "They shall see that I do care for 'The Cause.' If it's a dangerous mission, so much the better; it will prove my sincerity. Where is the place?"

"About ten miles from D * * * *"

"D * * * *!" My heart sank—if it had been any other spot in England! But it was too late to retract. Sandy saw what was the matter, and tried to turn the subject, but I was peremptory, almost rude with him. I felt I must keep up my present excitement, or lose my heart, and my caste, forever, and as the hour for the committee was at hand, I pumped up and set off thither with them, whether they would or not. I heard Sandy whisper to Crosshwaite, and turned quite fiercely on him.

"If you want to speak about me, speak out. If you fancy that I shall let my connection with that place" (I could not bring myself to name it) "stand in the way of my duty, you don't know me."

I announced my intention at the meeting. It was at first received coldly, but I spoke energetically—perhaps, I told me afterwards, a little eloquently. When I got heated, I alluded to my former stay at D * * * *, and said (while my heart sank at the bravado which I was uttering) that I should consider it a duty to retrieve my character with them, and devote myself to the cause of the oppressed, in the very locality whence I first arose in their unjust but pardonable errors. In short, generous, trusting hints as they were, and always true, I talked them round, they shook me by the hand one by one, bade me God speed, told me that I stood higher than ever in their eyes, and then set to work to vote money from their purses for my travelling expenses, which I magnanimously refused, saying that I had a pound or two left from the sale of my poems, and that I must be allowed, as an act of repentance and restitution, to devote it to 'The Cause.'

My triumph was complete. Even O Flynn, who, like all Irishmen, had plenty of loose good nature at bottom, and was as sudden and furious in his loves as in his hostilities, over the land, regardless of patriotic ties, to shake me violently by the hand, and inform me that I was 'a brot of a boy,' and that "any little disagreements between us had vanished, like a passing cloud from the sun, from our fraternity!"—when my eye was caught by a face which there was no mistaking as an enemy's.

Yes, there he sat, while mine me like a basilisk, with his dark, glittering, meagre eyes, out of a remote corner of the room—not in contempt or anger, but there was a quiet, steady, sardonic smile about his lips, which chilled me to the bone.

The meeting was sufficiently public to allow of his presence, but how had he found out its existence? Had he come there as a spy on me? Had he been in the room when my visit to D . . . was determined on? I trembled at the thought, and I trembled, too, lest he should be daring enough—and I knew he could dare anything—to claim acquaintance with me there and then. It would have ruined my now restored reputation forever. But he sat still and steady, and I had to go through the rest of the evening's business under the miserable, cramping knowledge that every word and gesture was being noted down by my most deadly enemy, trembling whenever I was addressed, lest some chance word of acquaintance should implicate me still further—though, indeed, I was deep enough already. The meeting seemed interminable, and there I fidgeted, with my face scarlet—always seeing those basilisk eyes upon me—in fancy, for I dared not look again towards the corner where I knew they were.

At last it was over—the audience went out, and when I had courage to look round, my cousin had vanished among them. A loud was taken off my breast, and I breathed freely again—for five minutes,—for I had not made ten steps up the street, when an arm was familiarly thrust through mine, and I found myself in the clutches of my evil genius.

"How are you, my dear fellow? Expected to meet you there. Why, what an orator you are! Really, I haven't heard more fluent or passionate English this month of Sundays. You must give me a lesson in sermon preaching. I can tell you, we parsons want a hint or two in that line. So you're going down to D . . ., to see after those poor starving labourers?" "Pon' my honour, I've a great mind to go with you."

So, then, he knew all! However, there was nothing for it but to brazen it out, and, besides, I was in his power, and however hateful to me his seeming courtesy might be, I dared not offend him at that moment.

"It would be well if you did. If you parsons would show yourselves at such places as these a little oftener, you would do more to make the people believe your mission real, than by all the tracts and sermons in the world."

"But, my dear cousin" (and he began to snuffle and sink his voice), "there is so much ungenerous language, so much unsanctified impudence, you frighten away all the meek apostolic men among the priesthood—the very ones who feel most for the lost sheep of the flock."

"Then the parsons are either great Pharisees or great cowards, or both."

"Very likely. I was in a precious fright myself, I know, when I saw you recognised me. If I had not felt strengthened, you know, as I could see one ought to be in all trials, by the sense of my holy calling, I think I should have bolted at once. However, I took the precaution of bringing my bowie and revolver with me, in case the worst came to the worst."

"And a very needless precaution it was," said I, half laughing at the quaint incongruity of the priestly and the lay elements in his speech. "You don't seem to know much of working men's meetings, or working men's minds. Why, that place was open to all the world. The proceedings will be in the newspaper to-morrow. The whole bench of bishops might have been there, if they had chosen, and a great deal of good it would have done them!"

"I fully agree with you, my dear fellow. No one hates the bishops more than we true High-Churchmen, I can tell you—that's a great point of sympathy between us and the people. But I must be off. By the bye, would you like me to tell my friends at D . . ., that I met you? They often ask after you in their letters, I assure you."

This was a sting of complicated bitterness. I felt all that it meant at once. So he was in constant correspondence with them, while I—and that thought actually strove out of my head the more pressing danger of his utterly ruining me in their esteem, by telling them, as he had a very good right to do, that I was going to preach Chartism to discontented mobs.

"Ah! well! perhaps you wouldn't wish it mentioned? As you like, you know. Or, rather," and he laid his non-grasp on my arm, and dropped his voice this time in earnest—"as you behave, my wise and loyal cousin! Good night."

I went home—the excitement of self-applause, which the meeting had called up, damped by a strange weight of foreboding. And yet I could not help laughing, when, just as I was turning into bed, the door was knocked at my door, and, on being admitted, handed over to me a bundle wrapped up in paper.

"There's a pair of breeches for you—not plush ones, this time, old fellow—but you ought to look as smart as possible. There's so much in a man's looking dignified, and all that, when he's speculating. So I've just brought you down my best black trousers to travel in. We're just of a size, you know, little and good, like a Welshman's cow. And if you tear them, why, we're not like poor, miserable, useless aristocrats, tailors and makers can mend their own rents." And he vanished, whistling the Marseillaise.

I went to bed and tossed about, fancying to myself my journey, my speech, the faces of the meeting, among which Lillian's would rise, in spite of all the sermons which I preached to myself on the impossibility of her being there, of my being known, of any harm happening from the movement, but I could not shake off the fear. If there were a riot, a rising! If any harm were to happen to her! If—till, muddled into fatigue by a rabble of such miserable hypothetical ghosts, I fell asleep, to dream that I was going to be hanged for sedition, and that the mob were all staring and hooting at me, and Lally clapping her hands and setting them on, and I awoke in an agony, to find Sandy Mackaye standing by my bedside with a light

"Hoochie, laddie! ye need na jump up that way. I'm no' gawn to huke ye the nicht, but I canna sleep, I'm sae unshoutful o' the thing. It seems ye're richt, an' I've been praying for us, an' that's aickle for me, to be taught on't way, but I dinna see aught for ye but to gang. If yon heart is richt with God in this matter, then He's o' yon side, an' I fear na' what men may do to ye. An' yet, ye're my Joseph, as it were, the son o' my mither, wi' a coat o' many colours, plash breeks included, an' gin naught take ye, ye'll bring down my gey haffits wi' sorrow to the grave."

The old man gazed at me as he spoke, with a deep, earnest affection I had never seen in him before, and the tears glistened in his eyes by the flaring candle light, as he went on—

"I ha' been reading the Bible the nicht. It's strange how the words o't rise up, and open themselves, whiles, to pun distractit bodies, though, maybe, no' always in just the orthodox way. An' I fell on that, 'Be hold, I send ye forth as lambs in the midst o' wolves.' Be ye therefore wise as serpents an' harmless as doves,' an' that gae me comfort, laddie for ye. Mind the warning, dinna gang wad, whatever ye may see an' hear. It's an ill way o' showing pity, to gang daft anent it. Dinna talk magnificently that the workman's darling son. An' mind ye, dinna go too deep wi' them. Ye canna trust them to understand ye, they're pun foolish sheep that ha' na shepherd swim that let na wash, rather. So cut na' your pearls before swine, laddie, lest they trample them under their feet, an' turn again an' rend ye."

He went out, and I lay awake, toiling, till morning, making a thousand good resolutions—like the rest of mankind.

CHAPTER XXVIII

THE MEN WHO ARE EATEN.

WITH many instructions from our friends, and warnings from Mackaye, I started next day on my journey. When I had caught sight of the old man, he was gazing fixedly after me, and using his pocket handkerchief in a somewhat suspicious way. I had remarked how depressed he seemed, and my own spirits shared the depression. A presentiment of evil hung over me, which not even the excitement of the journey—to me a new enjoyment—could dispel. I had no heart, somehow, to look at the country scenes around, which in general excited in me so much interest, and I tried to lose my self in summing up my stock of information on the question which I expected to hear discussed by the labourers. I found myself not altogether ignorant. The horrible disclosures of S. G. O., and the barbarous abominations of the Andover Workhouse, then fresh in the public mind, had had their due effect on mine, and, like most thinking artisans, I had acquainted myself tolerably from books and newspapers with the general condition of the country labourers.

I arrived in the midst of a dreary, trackless country, whose broad brown and grey fields were only broken by an occasional line of dark doleful trees, at a knot of thatched hovels, all sinking and leaning every way but the right, the windows patched with paper, the doorways stopped with hith, which surrounded a bare slop. That was my destination—unpromising enough for any one but an agitator. If discontent and misery are propitiation for liberty, and they are so strange and unlike ours are the ways of God—I was likely enough to find them there.

I was welcomed by my intended host, a little pert snub-nosed shoemaker, who greeted me as his cousin from London—a relationship which it seemed prudent to accept.

He took me into his little room, and there, with the assistance of a shrewd good-natured wife, shared with me the best he had, and after supper, commenced, mysteriously and in trembling, as if the very walls might have ears, a trembling bitter dispute on the wrongs and sufferings of the times, which went on till late in the night, and which I shall spare my readers, for it they have either brains or hearts, they ought to know more than I can tell them, from the public prints, and, indeed, from their own eyes. Although, as a wise man says, there is nothing more difficult than to make people see first the facts which lie under their own nose.

Upon one point, however, which was new to me, he was very hence the custom of landlords letting the cottages with their farms, for the mere sake of saving themselves trouble, thus giving up all power of protecting the poor man, and debarring him over, bound hand and foot, even in the matter of his commonest home comforts, to farmers, too numerous, too ignorant, and often too poor, to keep the cottages in a state fit for the habitation of human beings. Thus the poor man's hovel, as well as his labour, became, he told me, a source of profit to the farmer, out of which he wrung the last drop of gain. The necessary repairs were always put off as long as possible. The labourers were robbed of their gardens, the slightest rebellion lost them not only work, but shelter from the elements; the slavery under which they groined penetrated even to the fireside and to the bedroom.

"And who was the landlord of this parish?"

"Oh! he believed he was a very good sort of man, and uncommon kind to the people where he lived, but that was fifty miles away, in another county, and he liked that estate better than this, and never came down here, except for the shooting."

Full of many thoughts, and tired out with my journey, I went up to bed, in the same lull with the colder and his wife, and fell asleep, and dreamt of Lilliam.

About eight o'clock the next morning, I started forth with my gun, the shrike-hawk over us desolate a country is men can well conceive. Not a house was to be seen for miles, except the knot of hovels which we had left, and here and there a great dreary lump of ruin buildings, with its yard of yellow stacks. Beneath our feet the earth was mud, and the sky iron above our heads. Dark clouded clouds, "which had built up everywhere an under-roof of doleful grey," swept on before the bitter northern wind, which whistled through the law headless bushes and rattling wattles, and crisped the dark sodden leaves of the scattered hollies, almost the only trees in sight.

We trudged on, over wide stinkidles thick with innumerable weeds, over wide drows, in which the deserted ploughs stood frozen fast, then over clover and grass, burnt black with frost, then over a field of turnips, where we passed a large fold of hundreds, within which some hundred sheep stood, with their heads turned from the cutting blast. All was dreary, ill, silent, no sound or sign of human beings. One wondered where the people lived, who cultivated so vast a tract of livid, over-peopled, nineteenth century England. As we came up to the fold, two little boys huddled us from the made - two little wretches with bare noses and white cheeks, scarecrows of rags and patches, their feet peeping through burnt shoes twice too big for them, who seemed to have shared between them a ragged pair of worsted gloves, and covered among the sheep, under the shelter of a hurdle, crying, and martinate with cold.

"What's the matter, boys?"

"Turnips is froze, and us can't turn the handle of the cutter. Do ye give us a turn, please!"

We scrambled over the hurdles, and gave the miserable little creatures the benefit of ten minutes' labour. They seemed too small for such exertion: their little hands were purple with chilblains, and they were so sorfooted they could scarcely limp. I was surprised to find them at least three years older than their size and looks denoted, and still more surprised, too, to find that their salary for all this latter exposure to the elements - such as I believe I could not have endured two days running - was the vast sum of one shilling a week each, Sundays included. "They didn't ever go to school, nor to church neither, except just now and then, sometimes—they had to mind the sheep."

I went on, sickened with the contrast between the highly-bred, over fed, fat, thick-woolled animals, with their trappings of turnips and malt-dust, and then racks of rich clover-hay, and then little pent houses of rock-salt, having nothing to do but to eat and sleep, and eat again, and the little half-starved shivering animals who were their slaves. Man the master of the brutes? Bah! As society is now, the brutes are the masters—the least the sheep, the bullock, is the master, and the labourer is then slave.

"Oh! but the brutes are eaten!" Well, the horses at least are not eaten—they live, like landlords, till they die. And those who are eaten are certainly not eaten by their human servants. The sheep they fit, another kills, to parody Shelley, and, after all, is not the labourer, as well as the sheep, eaten by you, my dear Society? devoured body and soul, not the less really because you are larger about the meal, there being an old prejudice against cannibalism, and also against murder—except after the Riot Act has been read.

"What?" struck the insulted respectabilities. "Have we not paid him his wages weekly, and has he not lived upon them?" Yes, and have you not given your sheep and horses their daily wages, and have they not lived on them? You wanted to work them, and they could not work, you know, unless they were alive. But here lies your iniquity: you give the labourer nothing but his daily food—not even his lodgings, the pigs were not started of then wish to pay for their sty room, the man was, and his wages, thanks to your competitive system, were beaten down debilitated and conscientiously (for was it not according to political economy, and the laws thereof?) to the minimum on which he could or would work, without the hope or the possibility of saving a farthing. You know how to invest your capital profitably, dear Society, and to save money over and above your income of daily comforts, but what has he saved? what is he paid for all those years of labour? He has kept body and soul together—perhaps he could have done that without you or your help. But his wages are used up every Saturday night. When he stops working, you have in your pocket the whole real profits of his nearly fifty years' labour, and he has nothing. And then you say that you have not eaten him! You know, in your heart of hearts, that you have. Else, why in Heaven's name do you pay him poor rates? If, as you say, he has been duly repaid in wages, what is the meaning of that half-a-crown a week? you owe him nothing. Oh! but the man would abuse common humanity forbids! What now, Society? Give him alms, if you will, on the score of humanity, but do not tax people for his support, whether they choose or not—that were a mere tyranny and robbery. If the landlord's feelings will not allow him to see the labourer slave, let him give, in God's name, but let him not cripple nor chain, by compulsory poor-laws, the farmer who has paid him his "just remuneration" of wages, and the parson who probably, out of his scanty income, gives away twice as much in alms as the landlord does out of his superfluous one. No, no, as long as you retain compulsory poor-laws, you confess that it is not merely humane, but just, to pay the labourer more than his wages. You confess yourself in debt to him, over and above, an incertum sum, which it suits you not to define, because such an investigation would expose ugly gaps and patches in that same smug competitive and property world of yours, and, therefore, being the stronger party, you compel your debtor to give up the claim which you confess, for an annuity of half a crown a week, that being the just above starving point of the economic thermometer. And yet you say you have not eaten the labourer! You see, we workmen too have our thoughts about political economy, differing slightly from yours, truly just as the man who is being hanged may take a somewhat different view of the process from the man who is hanging him, which view is likely to be the more practical one?

With some such thoughts I walked across the open down, toward a circular camp the earthwork, probably, of some old British town. Inside it, some thousand or so of labouring people were swarming restlessly round a single large block of stone, some relic of Druid times, on which a tall man stood, his dark figure thrown out in bold relief against the drab sky. As we pushed through the crowd, I was struck with the winnery look of all faces, their lack-lustre eyes and drooping lips, stooping shoulders, heavy, dragging steps, gave them a crushed, degraded air, which was infinitely painful, and bespoke a grade of misery more habitual and degrading than that of the excitable and passionate artisan.

There were many women among them, talking shilly, and looking even more pinched and wan than the men. I remarked, also, that many of the crowd carried heavy sticks, pitchforks, and other tools which might be used as fearful weapons—an ugly sign, which I ought to have heeded betimes.

They gazed with sullen curiosity at me and my Londoner's clothes, as, with no small feeling of self-importance, I pushed my way to the foot of the stone. The man who stood on it seemed to have been speaking some time. His words, like all I heard that day, were utterly devoid of anything like eloquence or imagination—a dull string of somewhat incoherent complaints, which derived their force only from the intense earnestness, which attested their truthfulness. As far as I can recollect, I will give the substance of what I heard. But, indeed, I heard nothing but what has been bandied about from newspaper to newspaper for years—confessed by all parties, deplored by all parties, but never an attempt made to remedy it.

—"They farmers makes slaves on us. I can't hear no difference between a Christian and a nigger, except they flog the niggers and starve the Christians, and I don't know which I'd choose. I served farmer * seven year, oil and oil, and after harvest he tells me he's no more work for me, nor my boy, neither, cause he's getting too big for him, so he gets a little 'un instead, and we does nothing, and my boy has about, getting into bad ways, like hundreds more, and then we goes to Board, and they bids us and look for work, and we goes up next part to London. I couldn't get none, they'd enough to do, they said, to employ them 'n, and we begs our way home, and goes into the Union, and they turns us out again in two or three days, and promises us work again, and gives us two days' gravel picking, and then says they has no more for us, and we was sore pinched, and let 'em all day, then next Board day we goes to 'em, and they gives us one day more, and that throws us off another week, and then next Board day we goes into the Union again for three days, and gets sent out again, and so I've been starving one half of the time, and they putting us oil and oil on o' purpose like that, and I'll be in it no longer, and that's what I says."

He came down, and a tall powerful, well-toiled man, evidently in his Sunday smock frock and clean yellowed gaiters, got up and began.

"I haven't no complaint to make about myself. I've a good master, and the parson is a right kind 'un, and that's more than all can say, and the squire's a real gentleman, and my master, he don't need to lower his wages. I gets my ten shillings a week all the year round, and harvesting, and a pig, and a botyent—and that's just why I come here. If I can get it, why can't you?"

"Cause our masters brint like yours."

"No, hy George, there haunt no money round here away like that, I can tell you."

And why int they? continued the speaker. "There's the shame on it. There's my master, he grow five quaters where youn only grows three, and so he can live and pry like a man, and so he say he don't care for his trade. You know as well as I, that there's not half o' the land round here grows what it ought. They aint nut money to make it grow more, and besides, they won't employ no hands to keep it clean. I come across more weeds in one field here, than I've seen for time year on our farm. Why aint some o' you a-getting they weeds up? It wd pay 'em to farm better, and they knows that, but they're too lazy, if they can just get a living off the land, they don't care; and they'd sooner save money out o' your wages, than save it by growing more corn—it's easier for 'em, it is. There's the work to be done, and they won't let you do it. There's you crying out for work, and work crying out for you—and nether of you can get to the other. I say that's a shame, I do. I say a poor man's a slave. He daren't leave his parish—nobody won't employ him, as can employ his own folk. And if he stays in his parish, it's just a chance whether he gets a good master or a bad 'un. He can't choose, and that's a shame, it is. Why should he go starving because his master don't care to do the best by the land? If they can't till the land, I say let them get out of it, and let them work it as they can. And I think as we ought all to sign a petition to Government, to tell 'em all about it, though I don't see as how they could help us, unless they'd make a law to force the squire to put in nobody to a farm as hadn't money to work it fairly.

"I says," said the next speaker, a poor fellow whose sentences were continually broken by a hacking cough, "just what he said. If they can't till the land, let them do it as can. But they won't, they won't let us have a scrap on it, though we'd pay 'em more for it nor ever they'd make for themselves. But they says it 'nd make us too independent, if we had an acre or so o' land, and so it 'nd, for they. And so I says as he did—they want to make slaves on us altogether, just to get the flesh and bones off us at their own price. Look you at this here down, if I had an acre on it, to make a garden on, I'd live well with my wages, oil and o'k. Why, if this here was in garden, it 'nd be worth twenty, forty times, o' that it be now. And last spring I lays out o' work from Christmas till barley sowing, and I goes to the farmer and asks for a bit a land to dig and plant a few potatoes—and he says, 'You be ill—d'. If you're minding your garden after hours, you'll not be fit to do a proper day's work for me in hours—and I shall want you by and by, when the weather breaks'—for it was frost most bitter, it was. And if you gets potatoes you'll be getting a pig—and then you'll want straw, and meal to fat 'un, and then I'll not trust you in my barn, I can tell ye," and so there it was. And if I'd had only one half-acre of this here very down as we stands on, as isn't worth five shillings a year—and I'd a given ten shillings for it—my belly wouldn't a been empty now. Oh, they be dogs in the manger, and the Lord'll reward 'em therefore! First they says they can't afford to work the land 'em selves, and then they want let us work it either. Then they says prices is so low they can't keep us on, and so they lowers our wages, and then when prices goes up even so much, our wages don't go up with 'em. So, high prices or low prices, it's all the same. With the one we can't buy bread, and with the other we can't get work. I don't mind free trade—not I, to be sure, if the loaf's cheap, we shall be ruined, but if the loaf's dear we shall be starved—and for that, we is starved, now. Nobody don't care for us, for my part, I don't much care for myself. A man must do some time or other. Only I thinks if we could some time or other just see the Queen once, and tell her all about it, she'll take our part, and not see us put upon like that, I do."

"Gentlemen!" cried my guide, the shoemaker, in a somewhat concited and dictatorial tone, as he skipped up by the speaker's side, and gently shouldered him down, "it an't like the ancient times as I've read of, when any poor man as had a petition could come promiscuously to the King's royal presence, and put it direct into his own hand, and be treated like a gentleman. Don't you know as how they licks up the Queen nowadays, and never lets a poor soul come near her, lest she should hear the truth of all their iniquities? Why, they never lets her stir out without a lot o' dragons with drawn swords, riding all round her, and if you dared to go up to her for ax mercy, whoot! they'd chop your head off before you could say 'Please your Majesty.' And then the hypocrites say as it's to keep her from being frightened—and that's true—for it is frightful she'd be, with a vengeance, if she knowed all that they grand folks make poor labourers suffer, to keep themselves in power and great glory. I tell ye, 'twas impracticable, at all, to ax the Queen for anything, she's afraid of her life on 'em. You just take my advice, and sign a round robin to the squire—you tell 'em as you're willing to till the land for 'em, if they'll let you. There's drawing and digging enough to be done as 'nd keep ye all in work, an't there?"

"Ay, ay, there's lots o' work to be done, if so be we could get at it. Everybody knows that."

"Well, you tell 'em that. Tell 'em here's hundreds and hundreds of ye starving, and willing to work, and then tell 'em, if they won't find ye work, they shall find ye meat. There's lots o' victuals in their larders now, haven't you as good a right to it as their jackanapes o' footmen? The squire is at the bottom of it all. What do you stupid fellows go grumbling at the farmers for? Don't they squire tax the land twenty or thirty shillings an acre, and what do they do for that? The best of 'em, if he gets five thousand a year out o' the lands, don't give back five hundred in charity, or schools, or poor rates—and what's that to speak of? And the more of 'em—curse 'em!—they draw the money out o' the land, and takes it up to London, or into foreign parts, to spend on fine clothes and fine dinners, or throws it away at elections, to make folks beastly drunk, and sell their souls for money—and we gets no good on it. I'll tell you what it's come to, my men—that we can't afford no more landlords. We can't afford 'em, and that's the truth of it."

The crowd growled a dubious assent.

"Oh yes, you can grumble at the farmers, because you deals with them first hand, but you be too stupid to do nigh but hunt by sight. I be an old dog, and I hunt cunning. I sees farther than my nose, I does. I learnt politics to London when I was a 'prentice, and I ain't forgotten the plans of it. Look you here. The farmers, they say they can't live unless they can make four rents, one for labour, and one for stock, and one for rent, and one for themselves, ain't that about right? Veiy well, just now they can't make four rents in course they can't. Now, who's to suffer for that? the farmer is works, or the labourer is works, or the landlord as does nothing? But he takes care on himself. He won't give up his rent—not he. Perhaps he might give back ten per cent, and what's that?—two shillings an acre, maybe. What's that, if corn falls two pound a load, and more? Then the farmer gets a stinting, and he can't stint himself, he's 'tied enough off already. He's forty shillings out of pocket on every load of wheat that's eight shillings, maybe, on every acre of his land on a four-course shift—and where's the eight shillings to come from, for the landlord's only given him back two on it? He can't stint himself, he daren't stint his stock, and so he stints the labourers, and so it's you as pays the landlord's rent—yon, my boys, out of your flesh and bones, you do—and yon can't afford it any longer, by the look of you—so just tell 'em so."

This advice seemed to me as sadly unpractical as the rest. In short, there seemed to be no hope, no purpose among them—and they felt it, and I could hear, from the running comment of murmurs, that they were getting every moment more fierce and desperate at the contemplation of their own helplessness—a mood which the next speech was not likely to soften.

A pale, thin woman scrambled up on the stone, and stood there, her scanty and patched garments fluttering in the bitter breeze, as, with face sharpened with want, and eyes fierce with misery, she began in a querulous, scornful falsetto.

"I am an honest woman. I brought up seven children decently, and never axed the parish for a shilling, till my husband died. Then they tells me I can support myself and mine—and so I does. Early and late I hoel turnups, and early and late I rep, and left the children at home to mind each other, and one on 'em fell into the fire, and is gone to heaven, like a good angel; and two more it pleased the Lord to take in the fever, and the next, I hope, will soon be out of this miserable world. But look you here, three weeks ago, I goes to the Board. I had no work. They say they could not relive me for the first week, because I had money yet to take. The hypocrites! they knowing as I couldn't but owe it all, and a lot more beside. Next week they sends the officer to inquire. That was ten days gone, and we starving. Then, on Board day, they gives me two leaves. Then, next week, they takes it off again. And when I goes over (five times) to the Board to ax why—they'd find me work—and they never did, so we goes on starving for another week—for no one wouldn't trust us, how could they, when we was in debt already a whole lot?—you're all in debt!"

"That we are."

"There's some here as never made ten shillings a week in their lives, as owes twenty pounds at the shop!"

"Ay, and more—and how's a man ever to pay that?"

"So this week, when I comes, they offers me the house. Would I go into the house? They'd be glad to have me, because I'm strong and hearty and a good nurse. But would I, that am an honest woman, go to live with they obsecrings—they?" (she used a strong word)—"would I be parted from my children? Would I let them hear the talk and keep the company as they will there, and learn all sorts o' sins that they never heard on, blessed be God? I'll starve first, and see them starve too. Though, Lord knows, it's hard. Oh! it's hard," she said, bursting into tears, "to leave them as I did this mornin', crying after their breakfasts, and I none to give 'em. I've got no bread—what should I? I've got no fire—how can I give one shilling and seepence a hundred for coals? And if I did, whed fetch 'em home? And if I did break a hedge for a knitch o' wood, they'd put me in prison, they would, with the worst—what be I to do? What be you going to do? That's what I came here for. What be ye going to do for us women as that starve and stint, and wear on hands on for you men and your children, and get hard words, and hard blows from you? Oh! if I was a man, I know what I'd do, I do. But I don't think you be men, three parts o' you, or you'd not see the widow and the orphan starve as you do, and sit quiet and grumble, as long as you can keep your own bodies and souls together. Wh' ve cowards!"

What more she would have said in her excitement, which had risen to an absolute scream, I cannot tell, but some prudent friend pulled her down off the stone, to be succeeded by a speaker more painful, if possible, an aged blind man, the worn out melancholy of whose slow feeble voice made my heart sink, and hushed the murmuring crowd into silent awe.

Slowly he turned his grey, sightless head from side to side, as if feeling for the faces below him—and then began.

"I heard you was all to be here—and I suppose you are, and I said I would come—though I suppose they'll take off my pay, if they hear of it. But I knows the reason of it, and the bad times and all. The Lord revealed it to me as clear as day, four year agoe come Eastertide. It's all along of our sins, and our wickedness—because we forgot Him—it is. I mind the old war times, what times they was, when there was smug glod brandy up and down in every public, and work more than hands could do. And then, how we all forgot the Lord, and went after our own lusts and pleasures—squires and parsons, and farmers and labouring folk, all alike. They oughted to ha' knowed better—and we oughted too. Many's the Sunday I spent in skittle plying, and cock fighting, and the pound I spent in beer, as might ha' been keeping me now. We was an evil and perverse generation—and so one o' my sons went for a sodeger, and was shot at Waterloo, and the other fell into evil ways, and got sent across seas—and I be left alone for my sins. But the Lord was very gracious to me, and showed me how it was all a judgment on my sins, he did. He has turned his face from us, and that's why we're troubled. And so I don't see no use in this meeting. It won't do no good, nothing won't do us no good, unless we all repent of our wicked ways, our drinking, and our dirt, and our love-children, and our picking and stealing, and gets the Lord to turn our hearts, and to come back again, and have mercy on us, and take us away speedily out of this wretched world, where there's no thing but misery and sorrow into His everlasting glory, Amen! Folks say as the day of judgment's a coming soon—and I partly think so myself. I wish it was all over, and we in heaven above, and that's all I have to say."

It seemed a not unnatural revulsion, when a tall, fierce man, with a foalading squint, spring jauntily on the stool, and setting his arms akimbo, broke out:

"Here be I, Blinky, and this as good a right to speak us cro' a one. You're all blarney fools, you are. Sods that old blind huffer there. You stacks like pigs in a gate, hollering and squawking, and never helping yourselves. Why can't you do like me? I never does no work—darned if I'll work to please the farmers. The rich folks robs me, and I robs them—and that's fair and equal. You only turn poachers—-you only go stealing turnips, and treed, and all as you can find—and then you'll not need to work. Ain't it yourn?" The game's no one's, is it now?—you know that. And if you takes turnips or corn, they'll youn you helped to grown 'om. And if you're put to prison, I tell yo, it's a darned dem warmer, and better victuals too, than ever a one of you gets at home, let alone the Union. Now, I knows the dodge. Whenever my wife's ready for her trouble, I gets coteched, then I lives like a pi nce in gaol, and she goes to the works, and when it's all over, start fair again. Oh, you blockheads—to stand here shivering with empty bellies. You just go down to the farm and burn they stacks over the old rasent's head, and then they that let you starve now, will be forced to keep you then. If you can't get your share of the poor-rates, try the county rates, my bucks—-you can get fat on them at the Queen's expense—and that's more than you'll do in ever a Union as I hear on. Who'll come down and pull the farm about the folks' ears? Waint it he as turned hve on yer off last week? and ain't he more corn there than he fed you all round this day, and won't sell it, just because he's waiting till folks are starved enough, and prices rise? 'Taise the old villain!—who'll help to disappoint him o' that? 'Come along!"

A confused murmur arose, and a movement in the crowd. I felt that now or never was the time to speak. If once the spirit of mad aimless riot broke loose, I had not only no chance of a hearing, but every likelihood of being implicated in deeds which I abhorred, and I sprung on the stone and attracted a few minutes' attention, telling them that I was a deputation from one of the London Chartist committees. This seemed to turn the stream of their thoughts, and they gazed in stupid wonder at me, as I began hardly less excited than themselves.

I insured them of the sympathy of the London working men, made a comment on their own speeches—which the reader ought to be able to make for himself, and told them that I had come to enter it then assistance towards obtaining such a parliamentary representation as would secure them their rights. I explained the idea of the Chartist, and begged for their help in carrying it out.

To all which they answered smilingly, that they did not know anything about politics—that what they wanted was bread.

I went on, more vehement than ever, to show them how all their misery sprung (as I then fancied) from being misrepresented, how the laws were made by the rich for the poor, and not by all for all—how the taxes bit deep into the necessities of the labourer, and only nibbled at the luxuries of the rich—how the criminal code exclusively attacked the crimes to which the poor were prone, while it dared not interfere with the subtleties of the high born and wealthy—how poor-rates, as I have just said, were a confession on the part of society that the labourer was not fully remunerated. I tried to make them see that their interest, as much as common justice, demanded that they should have a voice in the councils of the nation, such as would truly proclaim their wants, their rights, their wrongs, and I have seen no reason since then to unsay my words.

To all which they answered, that their stomachs were empty, and they wanted bread. "And bread we will have!"

"Go, then," I cried, losing my self possession between disappointment and the maddening desire of influence—and, indeed, who could hear their story, or even look upon their faces, and not feel some indignation still in him, unless self interest had dinged his heart and conscience—"go," I cried, "and get bread!" After all, you have a right to it. No man is bound to starve. There are rights above all laws, and the right to live is one. Laws were made for man, not man for laws. If you had made the laws yourselves, they might land you even in this extremity, but they were made in spite of you—against you. They rob you, crush you, even now they deny you bread! God has made the earth free to all, like the air and sunshine, and you are shut out from off it. The earth is yours, for you till it. Without you it would be a desert. Go and demand your share of that corn, the fruit of your own industry. What matter, if you want imprisonment, murder you?—they can but kill your bodies at once, instead of killing them piecemeal, as they do now, and your blood will cry against them from the ground! Ay, Woe! I went on, carried away by feelings for which I shall make no apology, for, however confused, there was, and is, and ever will be, a God's truth in them, as this generation will find out at the moment when its own scene of self satisfaction crumbles underneath it.—"Woe unto those that gild the faces of the poor!" Woe unto those who add honours to house, and hold to hold, till they stand alone in the land, and there is no room left for the poor man! The wages of their idlers, which they have held back by hand, cry out against them, and then cry has entered into the ears of the God of heaven!

But I had no time to finish. The yeoman swelled into a roar for "Bread! Bread!" My hearers had taken me at my word. I had used the spirit, could I command him, he was abroad!

"Go to Lemmings Farm!"

"No!" he said to me, he said "an all last week!"

"There's plenty at the Hill Farm!" Rouse out the old steward!

And, amid yells and execrations, the whole mass pointed down the hill, sweeping me away with them. I was shocked and terrified at their threats. I tried again and again to stop and harangue them. I shouted myself hoarse about the duty of honesty, warned them against pillage and violence, entreated them to take nothing but the corn which they actually needed, but my voice was drowned in the uproar. Still I felt myself in a measure responsible for their conduct, I had helped to excite them, and dare not, in honour, desert them, and, trembling, I went on, prepared to see the worst, following, and a flag of distress, a mouldy crust, banished on the point of a pitchfork.

Bursting through the rotting and half fallen palings, we entered a wide, rashy, neglected park, and along an old gravel road, now green with grass, we appeared on a sheet of frozen water, and, on the opposite bank, the huge square corpse of a hall, the close shuttered windows of which gave it a dead and ghastly look, except where here and there a single open one showed, as through a black empty eye socket, the dark unfurnished rooms within. On the right, beneath us, lay, amid tall elms, a large mass of farm buildings, into the yard of which the whole mob rushed tumultuously just in time to see an old man on horseback dart out and gallop hatless up the park, amid the yells of the mob.

"The old rascal's gone!" and he'll call up the yeomanry. We must be quick, boys!" shouted our, and the first signs of plunder showed themselves in an indiscriminate chase after various screaming geese and turkeys, while a few of the more steady went up to the house door, and, knocking, demanded sternly the granary keys.

A fat yeoman planted herself in the doorway, and commenced talking at them, with the cowardly courage which the fancied minority of their sex gives to coarse women, but she was hastily shoved aside, and took shelter in an upper room, where she stood screaming and cursing at the window.

The mobsters returned, crumpling their mouths with bread, and chopping asunder slabs of bacon. The granary doors were broken open, and the contents scrambled for, amid immense waste, by the starving wretches. It was a sad sight. Here was a poor shivering woman, hiding scraps of food under her cloak, and hurrying out of the yard to the children she had left at home. There was a tall man, leaning against the palings, gazing ravenously at the same loaf with a little boy, who had scrambled up behind him. Then a huge blackguard came whistling up to me, with a can of ale. "Drink, my beauty! you're dry with hol-lering by now!"

"The ale is neither yours nor mine, I won't touch it!"

"Don't you bottom!" You said the wheat was ours, as we've grown it—and therefore so's the beer—for we grew the barley too!"

And so thought the rest, for the yard was getting full of drunkards, a woman or two among them, feeling knee deep in the loose straw among the pigs.

"I'll hush out they ricks!" roared another.

"Get out the threshing-machine!"

"You harness the horses!"

"No! there's but no time. Yeomanry'll be here. You must leave the ricks."

"Darned if we do! Old Woods shan't get caught by they!"

"Five em, then, and go on to Slater's Farm!"

"As well be hung for a sheep as for a lamb," hiccupped Blunkey, as he rushed through the yard with a lighted brand. I

"Yes," answered I, quietly, in D * * *
 "Exactly so."

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE TRIAL

THE day was come—quickly, thank Heaven, and I stood at the bar, with four or five miserable, haggard labourers, to take my trial for sedition, riot, and arson.

I had passed the intervening weeks half stupefied with the despair of utter disappointment—disappointment at myself and my own loss of self-possession, which had caused all my misfortune,—perhaps, too, and the thought was dreadful, that of my wretched fellow sufferers—disappointment with the labourers, with The Cause, and when the thought came over me, in addition, that I was irreparably disgraced in the eyes of my late patrons, parted forever from Lillian by my own folly, I laid down my head, and longed to die.

Then, again, I would recover awhile, and pluck up heart. I would plead my cause myself—I would testify against the tyrants to their face—I would say no longer to them hesitated slaves, but to the men themselves, "Go to, ye rich men, weep and howl!" The hire of your labourers who have reaped down your fields, which is by you kept back by fraud, craft, and the cries of them that have reaped hath entered into the ears of the Lord God of Hosts." I would brave my fate—I would die protesting, and glory in my martyrdom. But—

"Martyrdom!" said Mackaye, who had come up to D * * *, and was busy night and day about my trial. "Ye'll just leave alone the martyr dodge, my puny brain. Ye're no martyr at all, ye'll understand, but a vain foolish callant, that lost his temper, an' cast his pearls before swine—an' very questionable pearls they, too, to judge by the price they fetch in the market."

And then my heart sank again. And a few days before the trial a letter came, evidently in my cousin's handwriting, though only signed with his initials.

"Sir,—You are in a very great scrape—you will not deny that. How you will get out of it depends on your own common sense. You probably won't be hanged—for nobody believes that you had a hand in burning the farm, but, unless you take care, you will be transported. Call yourself John Nokes, entrust your case to a clever lawyer, and keep in the background. I warn you as a friend—if you try to speechify, and play the martyr, and let out who you are, the respectable people who have been patronising you will find it necessary for their own sakes to clap a stopper on you for good and all, to make you out an impostor and a swindler, and get you out of the way for life—while, if you are quiet, it will suit them to be quiet too, and say nothing about you, if you say nothing about them, and then there will be a chance that they, as well as your own family, will do everything in their power to hush the matter up. So, again, don't let out your real name, and instruct your lawyers to know nothing about the W s, and then perhaps, the Queen's counsel will know nothing about them either. Mind—you are warned, and woe to you if you are fool enough not to take the warning. "G L."

Plead in a false name! Never, so help me Heaven! To go into court with a lie in my mouth—to make myself an impostor—probably a detected one—it seemed the most cunning scheme for running me which my evil genius could have suggested, whether or not it might serve his own selfish ends. But as for the other hints, they seemed not unreasonable, and promised to save me trouble, while the continual pressure of anxiety and responsibility was getting intolerable to my over-wearied brain. So I showed the letter to Mackaye, who then told me that he had taken for granted that I should come to my right mind, and had therefore already engaged an old companion as attorney, and the best counsel which money could procure.

"But where did you get the money?" You have not entirely been squandering your own savings on me."

"I can't say that I've done so, in case of need. But the men in town just subscribed, my honest fellows."

"What! is my folly to be the cause of robbing them of their slender earnings? Never, Mackaye! Besides, they cannot have subscribed enough to pay the barrister whom you just mentioned. Tell me the whole truth, or, positively, I will plead my cause myself."

"Awcel! then, there was n' bit bank-note or two cam' to hand—I canna say whaur fra! But they that sent it ducked it to be expended in the defence o' the sax prisoners—whic' ye make an'."

Again a world of fruitless conjecture. It must be the same unknown friend who had paid my debt to my cousin—Lillian.

And so the day was come. I am not going to make a long picturesque description of my trial—trials have become lately quite hackneyed subjects, stock properties for the fiction mongers—neither, indeed, could I do so, if I would. I recollect nothing of that day, but fragments—flashes of waking existence, scattered up and down in what seemed to me a whole life of heavy, confused, painful dreams, with the glare of all those faces concentrated on me—those countless eyes which I would not, could not meet—stony, careless, unsympathising—not even angry—only curious. If they had but frowned on me, insulted me, gnashed their teeth on me, I could have glared back defiance; as it was, I stood cowed and stupefied, a craven by the side of cravens.

Let me see—what can I recollect? Those faces—faces—everywhere faces—a faint, sickly smell of flowers—a perpetual whispering and rustling of dresses—and all through it, the voice of someone talking, talking—I seldom knew what, or whether it was counsel, witness, judge, or prisoner, that was speaking. I was like one asleep at a foolish lecture, who hears in dreams, and only wakes when the prosing stops. Was it not prosing? What was it to me what they said? They could not understand me—my motives—my excuses, the whole pleading, on my side as well as the Crown's, seemed one huge fallacy—beside the matter altogether never touching the real point at issue, the eternal moral equity of my deeds or misdeeds. I had no doubt that it would all be conducted quite properly, and fairly, and according to the forms of law, but what was law to me? I wanted justice. And so I let them go on their own way, conscious of but one thought—was Lillian in the camp?

I dared not look and see. I dared not lift up my eyes toward the gaudy rows of ladies who had crowded to the “interesting trial of the D. . . . rioters.” The torture of anxiety was less than that of certainty might be, and I kept my eyes down, and wondered how on earth the attorneys had found in so simple a case enough to stuff those great blue bags.

When, however, anything did seem likely to touch on a reality, I woke up forthwith, in spite of myself. I recollect well, for instance, a squabble about challenging the jurymen, and my counsel's voice of pious indignation, as he asked, “Do you call these agricultural gentlemen and farmers, however excellent and respectable—in which point Heaven forbid that I, etc. etc.—the prisoner's ‘peers,’ peers, equals, or likes? What single interest, opinion, or motive, have they in common, but the universal one of self-interest, which, in this case, happens to pull in exactly opposite directions? Your lordship has often unadverted fully and boldly on the practice of allowing a bench of squires to sit in judgment on a peasant, surely it is quite as unjust that agricultural rioters should be tried by a jury of the very class against whom they are accused of rebelling.”

“Perhaps my learned brother would like a jury of rioters?” suggested some Queen's counsel.

“Upon my word, then, it would be much the fairer plan.”

I wondered whether he would have dared to say as much in the street outside—and relapsed into indifference. I believe there was some long delay, and wrangling about law quibbles, which seemed likely at one time to quash the whole prosecution, but I was rather glad than sorry to find that it had been overruled. It was all a play, a game of bowls—this bowls happening to be human heads got up between the lawyers, for the edification of society, and it would have been a pity not to play it out, according to the rules and regulations thereof.

As for the evidence, its tenor may be easily supposed from my story. There were those who could swear to my language at the camp. I was seen accompanying the mob to the farm, and haranguing them. The noise was too great for the witnesses to hear all I said, but they were certain I talked about the sacred name of liberty. The farmer's wife had seen me run round to the stables when they were fired whether just before or just after, she never mentioned. She had seen me running up and down in front of the house, talking loudly, and gesticulating violently, she saw me, too, struggling with another voter for her husband's desk,—and the rest of the witnesses, some of whom I am certain I had seen busy plunking, though they were ready to swear that they had been merely accidentally passers by, seemed to think that they proved their own innocence, and testified their pious indignation, by avoiding carefully any fact which could excuse me. But, somehow, my counsel thought differently, and cross examined, and bullied, and tormented, and misstated—as he was bound to do, and so one witness after another, clumsy and cowardly enough already, was driven by his engines of torture, as if by a pitiless spell, to deny half that he had deposed truly, and confess a great deal that was utterly false till confusion became worse confounded, and there seemed no truth anywhere, and no falsehood either, and I might witness anything, and everything was a right, till I began to have doubts whether the mob had ever occurred at all—and, and of doubts of my own identity also, when I had heard the counsel for the Crown impite to me personally, as in duty bound, every scoundrelous atrocity which had been committed either in England or France since 1793. To him, certainly, I did listen tolerably—it was “as good as a play.” Atheism, blasphemy, vitriol throwing, and community of women, were among my lighter offences—for had I not actually been engaged in a plot for the destruction of property? How did the court know that I had not spent the night before the riot, as “the doctor” and his friends did before the riots of 1839, in drawing lots for the estates of the surrounding gentlemen, with my deluded dupes and victims?—for of course I, and not want of work, had deluded them into nothing, at least, they never would have known that they were starving, if I had not stirred up their evil passions by daring to inform them of that otherwise unpalatable fact. I, the only Chartist there? Might there not have been dozens of them?—emissaries from London, dressed up as starving labourers, and rheumatic old women? There were actually traces of a plan for seizing all the ladies in the country, and setting up a seraglio of them in D Cathedral. How did the count know that there was not one?

Ay, how indeed? and how did I know either? I really began to question whether the man might not be right after all. The whole theory seemed so horribly coherent—possible, natural. I might have done it, under possession of the devil, and forgotten it in excitement—I might—perhaps I did. And if there, why not elsewhere? Perhaps I had helped Jourdan Compe tite at Lyons, and been king of the Minister Anabaptists—why not? What matter? When would this century of wigs, and bonnets, and glowing windows, and on gauding plate and jargon, as of a diabolic universe of street organs, end—end—and I get quietly hanged, and done with it all forever?

Oh, the terrible length of that day! It seemed to me as if I had been always on my trial, ever since I was born. I wondered at times how many years ago it had all begun. I felt what a far stronger and more single-hearted patriot than I, poor Somerville, says of him. If under the torture of the sergeant's cat in a passage, whose horrible simplicity and unconscious pithiness have haunted me ever since I read it, how, when only fifty out of his hundred lashes had fallen on the bleeding back,—"The time since they began was like a long period of life. I felt as if I had lived all the time of my cool life in torture, and that the days when cast me had a pleasure in it were a dream long, long gone by."

The reader may begin to suspect that I was fast going mad, and I believe I was. If he has followed my story with a human heart, he may excuse me of any extreme weakness, if I did at moments totter on the verge of that day.

What saved me, I believe now, was the keen, bright look of love and confidence which flashed from Crossswate's glittering eyes, when he was called forward as a witness to my character. He spoke out like a man, I hear, that day. But the counsel for the Crown tried to silence him triumphantly, by calling on him to confess himself a Charist, as if a man must needs be a hero and a villain because he holds certain opinions about the franchise. However, that was, I heard, the general opinion of the court. And the Crossswate lost his temper, and called the Queen's counsel a hired bully, and so went down, having done, as I was told afterwards, no good to me.

And then* there followed a passage of tongue fence between Ma Kaye and some barrister, and great laughter at the barrister's expense, and then I heard the old man's voice rise thin and clear.

"Let him that is without sin among ye cast the first stone."

And as he went down he looked at me—a look full of despair. I never had had a ray of hope from the beginning, but now I began to think whether men suffered much when they were hung, and whether one woke at once into the next life, or had to wait till the body had returned to the dust, and watch the ugly process of one's own decay. I was not afraid of death—I never experienced that sensation. I am not physically brave. I am as thoroughly afraid of pain as any child can be, but that next world has never offered any prospect to me, save boundless food for my insatiable curiosity.

But at that moment my attorney thrust into my hand a little dirty scrap of paper—"Do you know this man?" I read it.

"Sir,—I will tell all the truth. Mr. Locke is a murdered man if he be hanged. Let me speak out, for love of the Lord."

"J. DAVIS."

No. I never had heard of him, and I let the paper fall.

A murdered man? I had known that all along. Had not the Queen's counsel been trying all day to murder me, as was their duty, seeing that they got their living thereby?

A few moments after, a labouring man was in the witness box, and, to my astonishment, telling the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

I will not trouble the reader with his details, for they were simply and exactly what I have already stated. He was bulged, lashed, cross-examined, but nothing could shake him. With that dogged honesty and heroic dignity, which is the good side of the English peasant's character, he stood manfully to his assertion—that I had done every thing that words or notions could do to the Queen's counsel asked if who had set him on hanging me in a story, there at the eleventh hour, he answered, equally to the astonishment of his questioner and of me,—

"Master Locke himself."

"What?" the prisoner* almost screamed. The counsellor, who fancied, I suppose, that he had stumbled on a confession of unblushing of ten minutes, and I was coming up over hell, and says I, I'll hear what that chap's got to say—there can't be no harm in coming up after the likes of he, for, says I to myself, a man can't have got any great wickedness a plotting in his head, when he'll stop a ten minutes to help two boys as he never set eyes on afore in his life, and I think then honours II say the same."

Whether my reader will agree or not with the worthy fellow, my counsel, I need not say, but, and made full use of his hint. All the previous evidence was now discovered to have corroborated the last witness, except where it had been notoriously overthrown. I was extolled as a miracle of calm benevolence, and black became grey, and grey became spotless white, and the whole feeling of the court seemed changed in my favour, till the little attorney popped up his head and whispered to me:

"By George! that last witness has saved your life."

To which I answered, "Very well"—and turned stupidly back upon that nightmare thought—was Lillian in the court?

At last a voice, the judge's, I believe, for it was grave, gentle, almost compassionate, asked us one by one whether we had any thing to say in our own defence. I recollect an indistinct murmur from one after another of the poor seem hutes on my left, and then my attorney, looking up to me, made me aware that I was expected to speak. On the moment, somehow, my whole courage returned to me. I felt that I must unburden my heart, now or never. With a sudden start I roused myself, and looking fixedly and proudly at the reverend face opposite, began:

"The utmost offence which has been proved against me is a few bold words, producing consequences as unexpected as illogical. If the stupid ferocity with which my words were misunderstood, as by a horde of savages, rather than Englishmen,—if the moral and physical condition of these prisoners at my side,—of those witnesses who have borne testimony against me, miserable white slaves, mis-called free labourers,—ay, if a single walk through the farms and cottages on which this mischief was bred, affords no excuse for one indignant sentence—"

There she was! There she had been all the time—right opposite to me, close to the judge—cold, bright, curious—smiling! And as our eyes met, she turned away, and whispered gaily something to a young man who sat beside her.

Every drop of blood in my body rushed into my forehead; the court, the windows, and the faces, whirled round and round, and I fell senseless on the floor of the dock.

I next recollect some room or other in the gaol, Mackaye with both my hands in his, and the rough kindly voice of the gaoler congratulating me on having "only got three years."

"But you didn't show half a good pluck," said someone. "There's two on 'em trans ported—took it as bold as brass, and thanked the judge for getting em out o' this starv-ing place 'fice gracious for nothing,' says they."

"Ah!" quoth the little attorney, rubbing his hands, "you should have seen * * * and * * * after the row in '42! They were the boys for the Bull Ring! Gave a barrister as good as he brought, oh, Mr. Mackaye? My small services, you remember, were of no use—really no use at all—quite ashamed to send in my little account. Managed the case themselves, like two patriotic parties as they were, with a degree of forensic acuteness, inspired by the consciousness of a noble cause—Ahem! You remember friend M? Grand triumphs those, eh?"

"Ay," said Sandy, "I mind them unco weel—they cost me a my few savings, mair by token, an' mony a braw fallow paid for ither folks' sins that tide. But my poor laddie here's no made o' that stuff! He's ower thin skinned for a patriot."

"Ah, well, this little taste of British justice will thicken his hide for him, eh?" and the attorney chuckled and winked. "He'll come out again as tough as a bull-dog, and as surly too. Eh, Mr. Mackaye? ch?"

"Deed, then, I'm unco sae afraid that your opinion is no a together that unproph-able," answered Sandy, with a drawl of unusual solemnity.

CHAPTER XXX

IRISON THOUGHTS

I WAS alone in my cell.

Three years' imprisonment! Thirty six months! one thousand and ninety five days—and twenty four whole hours in each of them! Well—I should sleep half the time, one-third at least. Perhaps I should not be able to sleep! To be awake, and think—there! The thought was horrible—it was all horrible. To have three whole years out of my life, instead of having before me, as I had always as yet had, a mysterious El Dorado of new schemes and hopes, possible developments, possible triumphs, possible bliss—to have nothing, nothing, before me but blank and stagnation, dead loss and waste—and then to go out again, and start once more where I had left off yesterday!

It should not be! I would not lose those years! I would show myself a man, they should feel my strength just when they fancied they had crushed me utterly! They might bury me, but I should rise again!—I should rise again more glorious, perhaps to be henceforth immortal, and live upon the lips of men. I would educate myself. I would read—what would I not read? These three years should be a time of sacred retirement and contemplation, as of Thelaid Anchorite, or Mahomet in his Arabian cave I would write pamphlets that should thunder through the land, and make tyrants tremble on their thrones! All England—at least all crushed and suffering hearts, should break forth at my fiery words into one roar of indignant sympathy. No—I would write a poem. I would concentrate all my experience, my aspirations, all the hopes, and wrongs, and sorrows of the poor, into one garland of thorns, one immortal epic of suffering. What should I call it? And I set to work deliberately—such a thing is man—to think of a title.

I looked up, and my eye caught the close bars of the little window, and then came over me, for the first time, the full meaning of that word Prison, that word which the rich use so lightly, knowing well that there is no chance, in these days, of their ever finding themselves in one, for the higher classes never break the laws—seeing that they have made them to fit themselves. Ay, I was in prison. I could not go out or come in at will. I was watched, commanded at every turn. I was a brute animal, a puppet, a doll, that children put away in a cupboard, and there it lies. And yet my whole soul was as wild, fierce, loving, struggling, as ever. Horrible contradiction! The dreadful sense of helplessness, the crushing weight of necessity, seemed to choke me. The smooth white walls, the smooth white ceiling, seemed squeezing in closer and closer on me, and yet dilating into vast infinite spaces, just as the nicest knot of moulton will transform itself, as one watches it, and nothing else, into enormous chills, long slopes of moon and spurs of mountain range. Oh these smooth white walls and ceiling! If there had but been a print—a stain of dirt—a colony, to flick their unbroken ghostliness! They stared at me, like grim, unimpassive, featureless, formless fiends; all the more dreadful for their sleek hypocritical cleanliness, partly as of a saint inquisitor watching with spotless conscience the victim on the rack. They choked me—I gasped for breath, stretched out my arms, rolled shuddering on the floor, the narrow chequered glimpse of free blue sky, seen through the window, seemed to fade dimmer and dimmer, farther and farther off. I sprang up, as if to follow it, rushed to the bars, shook and wrenched at them with my thin, puny arms—and stood spellbound, as I caught sight of the cathedral towers, standing out in grand repose against the horizontal fiery bars of sunset, like great angels at the gates of Paradise, watching in stately scorn all the wailing and the wailing below. And beneath, beneath—the well-known roofs—Lillian's home, and all its proud and happy memories! It was but a corner of a gable, a scrap of garden, that I could see beyond intervening roofs and trees—but could I mistake them? There was the very cedar-tree, I knew its dark pyramid but too well!

There I had walked by her, there, just behind that envious group of chestnuts, she was now. The light was fading, it must be six o'clock, she must be in her room now, dressing herself for dinner, looking so beautiful! And as I gazed, and gazed, all the intervening objects became transparent, and vanished before the intensity of my imagination. Were my poems in her room still? Perhaps she had thrown them away—the condensed notes & poems! Was she thinking of me? Yes—with horror and contempt. Well, at least she was thinking of me. And she would understand me at last—she must. Some day she would know all I had borne for love of her—the depth, the might, the purity of my adoration. She would see the world honouring me, in the day of my triumph when I was appreciated at last,—when I stood before the eyes of admiring men, a people's singer, a king of human spirits, great with the rank which genius gives, then she would find out what a man had loved her, then she would know the honour the privilege of a poet's worship.

But that trial scene!

Ay that trial scene. That cold, unmoved smile!—when she knew me, must have known me, not to be the wretch which those brutal slanderers had called me. If she had cared for me—if she had a woman's heart in her at all, any pity, any justice, would she not have spoken? Would she not have called on others to speak, and clear me of the calumny? Nonsense! Impossible! She so frail, tender, retiring, how could she speak? How did I know that she had not felt for me? It is a woman's nature—duty, to conceal her feelings, perhaps that, after all, was the true explanation of that smile. Perhaps, too she might have spoken—might be even now pleading for me in secret, not that I wish to be pardoned—not I—but it would be so delicious to have her, her, pleading for me! Perhaps, perhaps I might hear of her—from her! Surely she could not leave me here so close, without some token! And I actually listened, I know not how long, expecting the door to open, and a message to arrive till, with my eyes riveted on that bit of gable and my ears listening behind me like a hound in her form, to catch every sound in the wind on side, I fell fast asleep, and forgot all in the heavy dreamless torpor of utter mental and bodily exhaustion.

I was awakened by the opening of my cell door, and the appearance of the turnkey.

"Well, young man, all right again? You've had a long nap, and no wonder, you've had a hard time of it lately, and a good lesson to you, too."

"How long have I slept? I do not recollect going to bed. And how came I to lie down without undressing?"

"I found you at lock-up hours, asleep there, kneeling on the chair, with your head on the window-sill, and a mercy you hadn't tamiled off and broke your back. Now, look here. You seems a civil sort of chap, and civil gets us civil gives with me. Only, don't you talk no politics. They ain't no good to nobody, except the big 'uns, wot gets their living thereby, and I should think you'd had dose enough on 'em to last for a month of Sundays. So just get your self tidy, there's a lad, and come along with me to chapel."

I obeyed him, in that and other things, and I never received from him, or, indeed, from anyone else there, aught but kindness. I have no complaint to make, but prison is prison. As for talking politics, I never, during those three years, exchanged as many sentences with any of my fellow-prisoners. What had I to say to them? Poachers and petty thieves, the scum of misery, ignorance, and idleness throughout the country. If my heart yearned toward them at times, it was generally shut close by the exclusive pride of superior intellect and knowledge. I considered it as it was, a degradation to be classed with such, never asking myself how far I had brought that degradation on myself, and I loved to show my sense of injustice by walking, manly and silent, up and down a lonely corner of the yard, and at last contrived, under the plea of ill health (and, truly, I never was ten minutes without coughing), to confine myself entirely to my cell, and escape altogether the company of a class whom I despised, almost hated, as my betrayers, before whom I had cast away my pearls—questionable though they were, according to Mackaye. Oh! there is, in the intellectual workman's heart, as in all others, the root of Pharisaism—the lust after self-glorifying superiority, on the ground of "genius." We too are men, frail, selfish, proud as others. The days are past, thank God, when the "gentlemen button-makers" used to insist on a separate tap room from the mere "button-makers," on the ground of earning a few more shillings per week. But we are not yet thorough democrats, my brothers, we do not yet utterly believe our own loud doctrine of equality, nor shall we till—But I must not anticipate the stages of my own experience.

I complain of no one, again I say—neither of judge, jury, gaolers, or chaplain. True, imprisonment was the worst possible remedy for my disease that could have been devised, if, as the new doctrine is, punishments are inflicted only to reform the criminal. What could prison do for me but embitter and confirm all my prejudices? But I do not see what else they could have done with me while law is what it is, and perhaps ever will be, dealing with the overt acts of the poor, and never touching the subtler and more spiritual iniquities of the rich respectable. When shall we see a nation ruled, not by the law, but by the Gospel, not in the letter which kills, but in the spirit which is love, forgiveness, life? When? God knows! And God does know.

But I did work during those three years, for months at a time, steadily and severely, and with little night, alas! to my temper of mind. I goaded my intellect, for I could do nothing else. The political questions which I longed to solve in some way or other, were tabooed by the well-meaning chaplain. He even forbade me a standard English work on political economy, which I had written to Mackaye to borrow for me, he was not so careful, it will be seen hereafter, with foreign books. He meant, of course, to keep my mind from what he considered at once useless and polluting, but the only effect of his method was, that all the doubts and questions remained, rankling and fierce, imperiously demanding my attention, and had to be solved by my own moody and somber meditations, warped and coloured by the strong sense of universal wrong.

Then he debased me with tracts, weak and well-meaning, which informed me that "Christians," being "not of this world," had nothing to do with politics, and preached to me the divine right of kings, passive obedience to the powers—or, iniquities—that be, etc., etc., with such success as may be imagined. I opened them each, read a few sentences, and laid them by. "They were written by good men, no doubt, but men who had no interest in keeping up the present system," at all events, by men who knew nothing of my temptations, my creed, my unbelief, who saw all he ever did with from a station antipodal to my own. I had simply nothing to do with them.

And yet, excellent man! pious, benign, compassionate! God forbid that I should, in writing those words, allow myself a desire so base as that of disparaging him! However thy words failed of their purpose, that bright, gentle, earnest face never appeared without bringing balm to the wounded spirit. Hadst thou not recalled me to humanity, those three years would have made a savage and a madman of me. May God reward thee hereafter! Thou hast thy reward on earth in the gratitude of many a broken heart bound up, of drunkards sobered, thieves reclaimed, and outcasts taught to look for a paternal hand denied them here on earth! While such thy deeds, what matter thine opinions?

But, alas! (for the truth must be told, as a warning to those who have to face the educated working men), his opinions did matter to himself. The good man laboured under the delusion, common enough, of choosing his favourite weapons from his weakest faculty, and the very inferiority of his intellect prevented him from seeing where his true strength lay. He could argue, he would try and convert me from scepticism by what seemed to him reasoning, the common figure of which was, what logicians, I believe, call begging the question, and the common method what they call ignoratio elenchis—shooting at pigeons, while crows are the game desired. He always started by demanding my assent to the very question which lay at the bottom of my doubts. He would wrangle and wrestle blindly up and down, with tens of earnestness in his eyes, till he had lost his temper, as far as was possible for one so angel-guided as he seemed to be, and then, when he found himself confused contradicting his own words, making concessions at which he shuddered, for the sake of gaining from me assents which he found out the next moment I understood in quite a different sense from his—he would suddenly shift his ground, and try to knock me down authoritatively with a single text of Scripture, when all the while I wanted proof that Scripture had any authority at all.

He is awfully careful of his "no," and "out," to the detriment of his own argument, while I, on the other hand, am full of required justification for the strange, fanciful, technical meanings, which he attributed to his expressions. If he would only have talked English, if clergymen would only preach in English, and then they wonder that their sermons have no effect. Their notion seems to be, as my good chaplain was, that the teacher is not to condescend to the scholar, much less to become all things to all men, if by any means he may save some, but that he has a right to demand that the scholar shall ascend to him before he is taught, that he shall use himself up of his own strength into the teacher's region of thought as well as feeling, to do for himself, in short, under penalty of being called an unbeliever, just what the teacher professes to do for him.

At last, he seemed duly to discover that I could not acquiesce in his conclusions, while I denied his premises, and so he lent me, in an ill-studied moment "Paley's Evidences" and some tracts of the last generation against Deism. I read them, and remained, as hundreds more have done, just where I was before.

"Was Paley," I asked, "a really good and pious man?"

The really good and pious man hemmed and hawed.

"Because, if he was not, I can't trust a page of his special pleading, let it look as clever as the whole Old Bailey in one."

Besides, I never denied the existence of Jesus of Nazareth, or his apostles. I doubted the myths and doctrines, which I believed to have been gradually built up round the true story. The fact was, he was, like most of his class, "attacking extinct Saturs," fighting manfully against Voltaire, Volney, and Tom Paine; while I was fighting for Strauss, Harnell, and Emerson. And, at last, he gave me up for some weeks as a hopeless infidel, without ever having touched the points on which I disbelieved. He had never read Strauss—hardly even heard of him, and, till clergymen make up their minds to do that, and to answer Strauss also, they will, as he did, leave the heretic artisan just where they found him.

The bad effect which all this had on my mind may easily be conceived. I felt myself his intellectual superior. I tripped him up, played with him, made him expose his weakness, till I really began to despise him. May Heaven forgive me for it! But it was not till long afterwards that I began, on looking back, to see how worthless was any superior cleverness of mine before his superior moral and spiritual excellence. That is just what he would not let me see at the time. I was worshipping intellect, mere intellect, and thence arose my doubts, and he tried to conquer them by exciting the very faculty which had begotten them. When will the clergy learn that their strength is in action, and not in argument? If they are to convert the masses, it must be by noble deeds, as Carlyle says, "not by noisy theories, the laudation of a Church, but by silent practical demonstration of the Church."

But, the reader may ask, where was your Bible all this time?

Yes, there was a Bible in my cell—and the chaplain read to me, both privately and in chapel, such portions of it as he thought suited my case, or rather his utterly mistaken view thereof. But to tell the truth, I cared not to read or listen. Was it not the book of the aristocrats—of kings and priests, passive obedience, and the slavery of the intellect? Had I been thrown under the influence of the more educated independents in former years, I might have thought differently. They, at least, have continued, with what logical consistency I know not, to reconcile orthodox Christianity with unflinching democratic opinions. But such was not my lot. My mother, as I said in my first chapter, had become a Baptist, because she believed that sect, and as I think rightly, to be the only one which logically and consistently carries out the Calvinistic theory, and now I looked back upon her delight in Gideon and Barak, Samson and Jehu, only as the mystic application of rare exceptions to the fanaticism of a chosen few—the elect the saints, who, as the fifth monarchy men held, were one day to rule the world with a rod of iron. And so I fell—willingly, alas!—into the vulgar belief about the politics of Scripture, common alike strange humanity!—to Infidel and Churchman. The great idea that the Bible is the history of mankind's deliverance from all tyranny, outward as well as inward, of the Jews, as the one free constitutional people among a world of slaves and tyrants, of their ruin, as the righteous fruit of a voluntary return to despotism, of the New Testament, as the good news that freedom, brotherhood, and equality, once confined only to Judea and to Greece, and dimly seen even there, was henceforth to be the right of all mankind, the law of all society—who was there to tell me that? Who is there now to go forth and tell it to the millions who have suffered, and doubted, and despaired like me, and turn the hearts of the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come? Again I ask—who will go forth and preach that Gospel, and save his native land?

But, as I said before, I read, and steadily in the first place, I, for the first time in my life, studied Shakespeare through and through, and found out now the treasure which I had overlooked. I assure my readers I am not going to give a lecture on him here, as I was minded to have done. Only, as I am asking questions, who will write us a "People's Commentary on Shakespeare?"

Then I waded, making copious notes and extracts, through the whole of Hume, and Hallam's "Middle Ages" and "Constitutional History," and found them barren to my soul. When (to ask a third and last question) will some man, of the spirit of Carlyle—one who is not ashamed to acknowledge the intervention of a God, a Providence, even of a devil, in the affairs of men—arise, and write a "People's History of England?"

Then I laboured long months at learning French, for the mere purpose of reading French political economy after my liberation. But at last, in my impatience, I wrote to Sandy to send me Proudhon and Louis Blanc, on the chance of their pursuing the good chaplain's counselship—and behold, they passed! He had never heard their names! He was, I suspect, utterly ignorant of French, and afraid of exposing his ignorance by venturing to criticise. As it was, I was allowed peaceable possession of them till within a few months of my liberation, with such consequences as may be imagined; and then, to his unfeigned terror and honor, he discovered, in some periodical, that he had been leaving in my hands books which advocated "the destruction of property," and therefore, in his eyes, of all which is mortal or sacred in earth and heaven! I gave them up without a struggle, so really painful was the good soul's concern, and the reproaches which he heaped, not on me—he never reproached me in his life—but on himself, for having so neglected his duty.

Then I read hard for a few months at physical science—at zoology and botany, and throw it aside again in bitterness of heart. It was too bitter to be tantalised with the description of Nature's wondrous forms, and I there a prisoner, between those four white walls!

Then I set to work to write an autobiography—at least to commit to paper in regular order the most striking incidents and conversations which I could recollect, and which I had noted down as they occurred in my diary. From that source I have drawn nearly the whole of my history up to this point. For the rest I must trust to memory—and, indeed, the strange deeds and sufferings, and the yet stranger revelations, of the last few months, have branded themselves deep enough upon my brain. I need not hope, or fear, that ought of them should slip my memory.

So went the weary time. Week after week, month after month, summer after summer, I scored the days off, like a lonely schoolboy, on the pages of a calendar, and day by day I went to my window, and knelt there, gazing at the gable and the cedar tree. That was my only recreation. Sometimes, at first, my eyes used to wander over the wide prospect of rich lowlands, and fumes, and hamlets, and I used to amuse myself with conjectures about the people who lived in them, and walked where they liked on God's earth—but soon I hated to look at the country, its perpetual change and progress mocked the dreary sameness of my dungeon. It was bitter, maddening, to see the grey boughs grow green with leaves, and the green fade to autumnal yellow, and the grey boughs reappear again, and I still there! The dark sleeping fallows bloomed with emerald blades of corn, and then the corn grew deep and crisp, and blackened before the summer breeze, in "waves of shadow," as Mr. Tennyson says in one of his most exquisite lyrics, and then the fields grew white to harvest day by day, and I saw the rows of sheaves rise one by one, and the carts crawling homeward under their load. I could almost hear the merry voices of the children round them—children that could go into the woods, and pick wild flowers, and I still there! No—I would look at nothing but the gable, and the cedar-tree, and the tall cathedral towers, there was no change in them—they did not laugh at me.

But who who lived beneath them? Months and seasons crawled along, and yet no sign or hint of her! I was forgotten, forsaken! And yet I gazed, and gazed. I could not forget her, I could not forget what she had been to me. Eden was still there, though I was shut out from it forever, and so, like a widower over the grave of her he loves, morning and evening I watched the gable and the cedar-tree.

And my cousin? Ah, that was the thought, the only thought, which made my life intolerable! What might he not be doing in the meantime? I knew his purpose—I knew his power. True I had never seen a hint, a glance, which could have given him hope, but he had three whole years to win her in—three whole years, and I fettered, helpless, absent! "Fool! could I have won her if I had been free?" At least, I would have tried.

we would have fought it fairly out, on even ground; we would have seen which was the strongest, respectability and cunning, or the simplicity of genius. But now!—and I tore at the bars of the window, and threw myself on the floor of my cell, and longed to die.

CHAPTER XXXI

THE NEW CHURCH

IN a poor suburb of the city, which I could see well enough from my little window, a new Gothic church was building. When I first took up my abode in the cell, it was just begun: the walls had hardly risen above the neighbouring sheds and garden fences. But month after month I had watched it growing, I had seen one window after another filled with tracery, one lattress after another finished off with its carved pinnacle, then I had watched the skeleton of the roof gradually clothed in tiling, and then the glazing of the windows—some of them painted, I could see, from the iron network which was placed outside them the same day. Then the doors were put up—were they going to hush that handsome tower? No, it was left with its wooden cup, I supposed for further funds. But the nave, and the deep chancel behind it, were all finished, and surmounted by a cross,—and beautiful enough the little sanctuary looked, in the virgin purity of its spotless freestone. For eighteen months I watched it grow before my eyes, and I was still in my cell.

And then there was a grand procession of supplices and twoskives, and among them I fancied I distinguished the old dean astately figure, and turned my head away, and looked again, and fancied I distinguished another figure—it must have been in the imagination—the distance was in too great for me to identify anyone, but I could not get out of my head the fancy,—say, rather, the instinct—that it was my cousin's, and that it was my cousin whom I saw daily after that, coming out and going in, when the bell rang to morning and evening prayers, for there were daily services there, and saints' day services, and Lent services, and three services on a Sunday, and six or seven on Good Friday and Easter day. The little musical bell above the chancel arch seemed always ringing, and still that figure haunted me like a nightmare, ever coming in and going out about its priestly calling—and I still in my cell! If it should be he! so close to her! I shuddered at the thought, and, just because it was so intolerable, it came to me, and tormented me, and kept me awake at nights, till I became utterly unable to study quietly, and I spent hours at the narrow window, watching for the very figure which I loathed to see.

And then a Gothic school-house rose at the churchyard end, and troops of children poured in and out, and women came daily for alms, and when the frosts came on, every morning I saw a crowd, and soup carried away in potters, and clothes and blankets given away, the giving seemed endless, boundless; and I thought of the times of the Roman Empire and the "sportula," when the poor had got to live upon the alms of the rich, more and more, year by year—till they devoured their own devourers, and the end came, and I shuddered. And yet it was a pleasant sight, as every new church is to the healthy-minded man, let his religious opinions be what they may. A fresh centre of civilisation, mercy, comfort for weary hearts, relief from frost and hunger, a fresh centre of instruction, humanising, disciplining, however meagre in my eyes, to hundreds of little savage spirits, altogether a pleasant sight, even to me there in my cell. And I used to wonder at the wasted power of the Church—her almost entire monopoly of the pulpits, the schools, the alms of England. And then thank Heaven, somewhat prematurely, that she knew and used so little her vast latent power for the destruction of liberty.

Oh for its realisation!

Ay, that is the question! We shall not see it solved—at least, I never shall.

But still that figure haunted me, all through that winter I saw it, clanking with old women, patting children's heads, walking to the church with ladies, sometimes with a tiny, tripping figure. I did not dare to let myself fancy who that might be.

December passed, and January came. I had now only two months more before my deliverance. One day I seemed to myself to have spent a whole life in that narrow room, and the next the years and months seemed short and blank as night's sleep on waking, and there was no salient point in all my memory, since that first sight of Lilian's smile, and the faces and the windows whirling round before me as I fell.

At last came a letter from Mackaye. "Ye spented for news o' your cousin an' I find he's a neebom o' yours, ca'd to a new kirk i' the city o' your captivity an' na stickit minister he makes, forbye, he's ane o' these new Puseyite sectarians to judge by your nuch's report. I met the unkl lauch-bodie on the street, an' I was gann to piss him by, but he was sae fu' o' good news he could na but stop an' he'd crack wi' me on politics, for we ha'e helpt thegither in certain municipal clargymen o' late. And he told me your cousin was honour fast, an' mun awely die a bishop's puri bairn! An' besides that, he's gann he married the spring I donna mind the laddy's name, but there's a teacher wi' less o' law, I'll warrant. He's na land o' Cockburn for a penniless lass wi' a long pedigree."

As I sat meditating over this news which made the ferment of suspicion and suspense more intolerable than ever—behold a post-script, added some two days after

"Oh! oh! Sic news! news to make bath the ears o' him that heareth it to tingle. God is God, an' no the devil after a'! Louis Philippe is down!—down, down, like a dog! an' the republic is proclaimed, an' the anvil villan here in England, they say, a wanderer and a beggar. I ha' sent ye the paper o' the day 18-73, 37, 12. Oh, the Psalms are full o' it! Never say the Bible's no true, man! I've been unco faithless myself, God forgive me! I got grieving to see the wicked in sic prosperity. I did na gang into the sanctuary enough, an' therefore I could na see the end of these men—how He does take them up suddenly after all, an' cast them down! vanish they do, perish, an' come to a fearful end. Yea, like as a dream when one awaketh, so shall thou make their image to vanish out of the city. Oh, but it's a day o' God! An' yet I'm sae afraid for they pun' feckless French! I ha' na faith, ye ken, in the Celtic blood, an' its spirit o' lies. The Saxon spirit o' covetise is a grewsome house-fund, and saes our Norse spirit o' shifts an' dodges, but the spirit o' lies is worse. I'lla lustful Renhens that they are!—instable as water, they shall not excel. Well, well—after all, there is a God that judgeth the earth, an' when a man is kens that, he's learnt enough to last him till he dies."

CHAPTER XXII

THE TOWER OF BABEL.

A glorious people vibrated a, on
The lightning of the nation's liberty
From heart to heart from tower to tower of old France, Scattering contagious fire into the sky cleaned. My soul spurned the chains of its dismay
And in the ruddy flames of song
Clothed itself sublime and strong.

STUBBINE and strong? Was not so. An outcast, heartless, faithless, and embittered, I went forth from my prison. But yet Louis Philippe had fallen! And as I whirled back to Babylon, and want, discontent, and discord, my heart was light, my breath came thick and fierce. The members of France had fallen! and from land to land, like the beacon fire which leapt from peak to peak proclaiming Trost's downfall, passed on the glare of burning idols, the crash of falling anachronies. Was I mad, sinful? Both and yet neither. Was I mad and sinful if, on my return to my old haunts, amid the grasp of loving hands, and the caresses of those who called me in their honest flattery a martyr and a hero—what things, as Carlyle says, men will fall down and worship in their extreme need!—was I mad and sinful, if daring hopes arose, and desperate words were spoken, and wild eyes read in wild eyes the thoughts they dared not utter? "Liberty has risen from the dead, and we too will be free!"

Yes, mad and sinful, therefore are we as we are. Yet God has forgiven us, perhaps so have those men whose forgiveness is done worth having.

Liberty! And 'tis that word a dream, a ho, the watchword only of rebellious heads, as legends say even now? Our forefathers spoke not so—

"The shadow of her coming fell On Saxon Alfred's olive-tinted brow."

Had not freedom, progressive, expanding, descending, been the glory and the strength of England? Were Magna Charta and the Habeas Corpus Act, Hampden's resistance to ship money, and the calm, righteous might of 1688—were they all futilities and fallacies? Ever downwards, for seven hundred years, welling from the heaven-watered mountain peaks of wisdom, had spread the stream of liberty. The nobles had gained their charter from John, the middle classes from William of Orange—was not the time at hand, when from a Queen, more gentle, charitable, upright, spotless, than had ever set on the throne of England, the working masses in their turn should gain their Charter?

If it was given, the gift was hers. If it was demanded to the uttermost, the demand would be made, not on her, but on those into whose hands her power had passed, the crowded tenement dives within the Crown door of the people, but of the very commercial class which was devouring us.

Such was our dream. Insane and wicked were the passions which accompanied it, in our mad wicked were the means we chose, and God in His mercy to us, rather than to Mammon, triumphant in his impurity, fat-tuning his heart even now for a spiritual day of slaughter more fearful than any physical slaughter which we mortals had prepared for him—God frustrated them.

We confess our sins. Shall the Christ alone be excluded from the promise, "If we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and cleanse us from all unrighteousness?"

And yet were there no excuses for us? I do not say not myself—and yet three years of prison might in some extent have hardened and hardened spirit—but I will not avail myself of the excuse, for there were men, stauncher Christians than ever I had been—men who had suffered not only imprisonment, but loss of health and loss of fortune, men whose influence with the workmen was firmer than my own, and whose temptations were therefore all the greater, who manfully and righteously kept themselves aloof from all those frantic schemes, and now reap then reward, in being acknowledged as the true leaders of the artisans, while the mere preachers of sedition are scattered to the winds.

But were there no excuses for the mass? Was there no excuse in the spirit with which the English upper classes regarded the continental revolutions? None save in the un disguised dislike, fear, contempt, which they expressed for that very sacred name of Liberty, which had been for ages the pride of England and her laws.

"The old laws of England they Whom revered in days of yore are grey—
Children of a wiser day
And whose solemn voices must be Thine own echo Liberty."

for which, according to the latest improvements, is now substituted a bare authority of despotic commissions? Shame upon those who sneered at the very name of her to whom they owed the wealth they misused, who cry down Liberty because God has given it to them in such priceless abundance, boundless as the sunshine and the air of heaven, that they are become unconcerned of it as of the elements by which they live! Woe to those who despise the gift of God! Woe to those who have turned His grace in to a cloak for tyranny, who, like the Jews of old, have trampled under foot His covenant at the very moment that they were asserting their exclusive right to it, and denying His all embracing love!

And were there no excuses, too, in the very arguments which nineteen twentieths of the public press used to deter us from following the example of the Continent? If there had been one word of sympathy with the deep wrongs of France, Germany, Italy, Hungary—one attempt to discriminate the rights and God inspired desire of freedom from our furious and self-willed perversion of it, we would have listened to them. But, instead, what was the first, last, and cardinal, crowning argument? "The cost of sedition!" "Revolutions interfered with trade!" and therefore they were damnable! Interfered with the toil and labour of the millions? The millions would take the responsibility of that upon themselves. If the party of order cared so much for the millions, why had they left them what they are? No—it was with the profits of the few that revolutions interfered with the divine right not so much of kings, but of money making. They hampered Mammon the very fiend who is devouring the masses. The one end and aim of existence was, the maintenance of order of peace and room to make money in. And therefore Louis's spies might make France one great impation hell, German princes might sell their country piecemeal to French or Russian, the Hungarian constitution, almost the counterpart of our own, might be sacrificed at the will of an idiot or a villain; Papal misgovernment might continue to render Rome a worse den of thieves than even Papal superstition could have made it without the addition of tyranny, but order must be maintained, for how else could they make more out of the labour of the many? These were their own arguments. Whether they were likely to contribute the workmen to the powers that be, by informing him that those powers were now only the priests of the very system which was crushing him, let the reader judge.

The maintenance of order—the order of disorder—that was to be the new God before whom the working classes were to bow in spellbound awe, an idol more despicable and empty than even that old divine right of tyrants, newly applied by some well meaning but illogical personages, not merely as of old to hereditary sovereigns, but to Louis Philippe, usurers, upstarts—why not hereafter to demagogues? Bloodthirst and desperate hypocrites who would vainly thus, in the imbecility of terror, deny that very right of the physically strongest and cunningest, which, if anything, is anti Christ itself. That argument against sedition, the workmen heard, and, neglecting 1688, went on their way, such as it was, in heeding.

One would more, even at the risk of offending in my whom I should be very sorry to offend, and I have this hateful discussion, let it ever be remembered that the working men were themselves deceived, duped, by the priests of the Reform Bill, that they cherished whether rightly or wrongly it is not too late to ask a deep rooted grudge against those who had, as they thought, made their hopes and passions a stepping stone towards their own selfish ends. They were told to support the Reform Bill, not only that it was its intrinsic righteousness—which God forbid that I should deny—but because it was the first of a glorious line of steps towards their enfranchisement and now, the very men who told them this, talked presumptuously of "treachery," showed themselves the most arrogant and selfish of Conservatives, and pool poached away every attempt at further enlargement of the selfish. They were told to support it as the remedy for their own social miseries, and behold, those miseries were year by year becoming deeper, more widespread, more hopeless, then entreaties for help and mercy, in 1842, and at other times, had been hardly laid by unanswered, and almost the only practical efforts for their deliverance had been made by a Tory nobleman, they honoured and beloved Lord Ashley. They found that they had, in helping to pass the Reform Bill, only helped to give power to the two very classes who crushed them—the great labouring kings, and the small shopkeepers, that they had blindly armed their oppressors with the additional weapon of an ever increasing political majority. They had been told, too (let that never be forgotten), that in order to carry the Reform Bill, sedition itself was lawful, they had seen the master manufacturers themselves give the signal for the plug riots, by stopping their mills. Their vanity, ferocity, sense of latent and fettered power, pride of numbers, and physical strength, had been flattered and puffed up by those who now talked only of grape shot and bayonets. They had heard the Reform Bill carried by the threats of men of rank and power, that "Manchester should march upon London." Were their masters, then, to have openly in sedition, as in everything else. What had been fair in order to compel the Reform Bill must surely be fairer still to compel the fulfilment of Reform Bill pledges. And so, imitating the example of those whom they fancied had first used and then deserted them, they, in their madness, concerted a rebellion, not primarily against the laws and constitution of their land, but against Mammon—against that accursed system of competition, slavery of labour, absorption of the small capitalists by the large ones, and of the workmen by all, which is, and was, and ever will be, their ruin. Silly and sanguinary enough were their schemes, God knows, and hopeless enough had they succeeded, for nothing diminishes in the revolutionary atmosphere but that lowest embodiment of Mammon—the black pool of Agre, and its money gamblers. But the little remains still to be fought, the struggle is internecine, only no more with weapons of flesh and blood, but with a mightier weapon—with that association which is the true bone of Mammon—the embodiment of brotherhood and love.

We should have known that before the tenth of April. Most true, reader—but wrath is blindness. You, too, surely have read more wisdom than you have perceived yet, seeing that you have von Bilde, and perhaps, too, Mills' "Political Economy." Have you perused therein the priceless chapter "On the probable fatality of the Labouring Class." If not, let me give you the reference—vol. II, p. 315, of the second edition. Read it, then self-satisfied Mammon, and perpend, for it is both a prophecy and a doom.

But, the reader may ask, how did you, with your experience of the reason, honesty, moderation, to be expected of mobs, join in a plan which, if it had succeeded, must have let loose on those "who had" in London, the whole flood of those "who had not?"

The reader shall hear. My story may be instructive, as a type of the feelings of thousands beside me.

It was the night after I had returned from D... sitting in Crossthwaite's little room, I had heard with mingled anxiety and delight the plans of my friends. They were about to present a monster petition in favour of the Charter, to accompany it en masse to the door of the House of Commons, and if it was refused admittance—why then, ultion measures were the only hope. "And they will refuse it!" said Crossthwaite, "they're going, I hear, to revive some old law or other, that forbids processions within such and such a distance of the House of Commons. Let them forbid! To carry arms, to go in public procession, to present petitions openly, instead of having them made a humbug of by being laid on the table unopened by some careless member, they're our rights, and we'll have them! There's no use minding the matter—it's like the old fable of the farmer and his wheat—if we want it reaped, we must reap it ourselves. Public opinion and the pressure from without, are the only things which have carried any measure in England for the last twenty years. Neither Whigs nor Tories deny it: the governed govern their governors—that's the 'ordre de jour' just now—and we'll have our turn at it! We'll use those House of Commons oligarchs—the tools of the squires and the shopkeepers—we'll give them a taste of pressure from without, as shall make the bar of the house creak again. And then to be under arms, day and night, till the Charter's granted!"

"And if it is refused?"

"Right! that's the word, and no other. There's no other hope. No Charter! No social reforms! We must give them ourselves, for no one else will. Look there, and judge for yourself!"

He pulled a letter out from among his papers, and threw it in my face.

"What's this?"

"That came while you were in gaol. They don't want many words about it. We sent up a memorial to Government about the ugly and pudic clothing. We told em how it was the lowest, most tyrannous most ill paid of all the branches of slop making, how men took to it only when they were starved out of everything else. We treated them to have mercy on us—entreated them to interfere between the merciless contractors, and the poor wretches on whose flesh and blood contractors, sweaters, and colonels, were all fattening, and there's the answer we got. Look at it! Read it! Again and again I've been minded to pin it on the walls, that all the world might see the might and the meanness of the Government. Read it! Sorry to say that it is utterly out of the power of Her Majesty's to interfere as the question of wages rests entirely between the contractor and the workmen."

"He lies!" I said. "If it did, the workmen might put a pistol to the contractor's head, and say 'You shall not tempt the poor, needy, greedy, starving workers to their own destruction, and the destruction of their class, you shall not offer these murderers, poisonous prices. If we saw you offering our neighbour a glass of laudanum, we would stop you at all risks, and we will stop you now." No! no! John, the question don't lie between workman and contractor, but between workman and contractor plus grape-and bayonets."

"Look again. There's worse comes after that. 'If Government did interfere, it would not benefit the workman, as his rate of wages depends entirely on the amount of competition between the workmen themselves.' Yes, my dear children, you must eat each other, we are far too fond parents to interfere with so delightful an amusement." Curse them—stuck, hard hearted, impotent, do-nothings! They confess themselves powerless against competition—powerless against the very devil that is destroying us, faster and faster every year! They can't help us on a single point. They can't check population, and if they could, they can't get rid of the population which exists. They don't give us a comprehensive emigration scheme. They don't lift a finger to prevent gluts in the labour market. They don't interfere between slave and slave, between slave and tyrant. They are cowards, and like cowards they shall fall!"

"Ay—like cowards they shall fall!" I answered, and from that moment I was a rebel and a conspirator.

"And will the country join us?"

"The cities will, never mind the country. They are too weak to resist their own tyrants—and they are too weak to resist us. The country's always dwelling in the back ground. A country party's sure to be a party of unbecome bigot. Nobody minds them."

I laughed. "It always was so, John. When Christianity first spread, it was in the cities—till a pagan a villager, got to mean a heathen forever and ever."

"And now it was in the French Revolution, when Popery had died out of all the rest of France, the priest and the aristocrats still found their dupes in the remote provinces."

"The sign of a dying system that, be sure, Woe to Foreignism and the Church of England, and everything like, when it gets to boasting that its stronghold is still the hearts of the agricultural poor. It is the cities, John, the cities, where the light dawns first—where man meets man, and spirit quickens spirit, and intercourse breeds knowledge, and knowledge sympathy, and sympathy enthusiasm, combination, power irresistible, which the agriculturists remain ignorant, selfish, weak, because they are isolated from each other. Let the country go. The towns shall win the Charter for England! And then for social reform, sanitary reform, adils reform, cheap food, interchange of free labour, liberty, equality, and brotherhood forever!"

Such was our Rabel Tower, whose top should reach to heaven. To understand the maddening allurement of that dream, you must have lain, like us, for years in darkness and the pit. You must have struggled for bread, for lodging, for cleanliness, for water, for education—for all that makes life worth living—and found them becoming, year by year, more hopelessly impossible, if not to yourself, yet still to the millions less gifted than yourself, you must have sat in darkness and the shadow of death, till you were ready to welcome any ray of light, even though it should be the glare of a volcano.

CHAPTER XXXIII

PARLIAMENT REWARD

I NEVER shall forget my evening walk, as throughwaite and I strolled back together from the Convention. We had walked on some way arm in arm in silence, under the crushing and cadaverous sense of having something to conceal—something which, if those who passed carelessly in the street had known. It makes a villain and a savage of a man, that consciousness of a dark, hideous secret. And it was a hateful one—a dark and desperate necessity, which we tried to call by noble names, that faltered on our lips as we pronounced them, for the spirit of God was not in us, and instead of bright hope, and the clear, cold, lone star of duty, weltered in our imaginations a wild possible future of tumult, and flame, and blood.

"It must be done!—it shall be done!—it will be done!" burst out John, at last, in that positive, excited tone, which indicated a half-dishabit of his own words. "I've been reading Macdonald on street warfare, and I see the way as clear as day."

I felt nothing but the dogged determination of despair. "It must be tried, if the worst comes to the worst. But I have no hope. I read Somerville's answer to that Colonel Macgrime. Ten years ago he showed it was impossible. We cannot stand against artillery, we have no arms."

"I'll tell you where to buy plenty. There's a man, Power, or Bower, he's sold hundreds in the last few days, and he understands the matter. He tells us we're certain safe. There are hundreds of young men in the Government offices ready to join, if we do but succeed at first. It all depends on that. The first hour settles the fate of a revolution."

"If we succeed, yes. The cowardly world will always side with the conquering party, and we shall have every pickpocket and ruffian in our wake, plundering in the name of liberty and order."

"Then we'll shoot them like dogs, as the French did." "Mort au voleurs," shall be the word."

"Unless they shoot us. The French had a national guard, who had property to lose, and took care of it. The shopkeepers here will be all against us, they'll all be sworn in special constables, too many, and between them and the soldiers, we shall have three to one upon us."

"Oh! that Power assumes me the soldiers will fraternise. He says there in three regiments at least have promised solemnly to shoot their officers, and give up their arms to the mob."

"Very important, if true, and very acconitely, too. I'd sooner be shot myself by fighting than see officers shot by cowardly treason."

"Well, it is ugly. I like fun play as well as any man. But it can't be done. There must be a surprise, a coup de main, as the French say. (poor Crossthwaite was always quoting French in those days). "Once show our strength—burst upon the tyrants like a thunder clap—and then!"

'Men of England, hours of glory,
Hours of unwritten story
Rise, shake off the chains like dew
Which on sleep have fallen on you
Ye are many, they are few'

"That's just what I am afraid they are not. Let's go and find out this man Power, and hear his authority for the soldier story. Who knows him?"

"Why, Mike Kelly and he have been a deal together of late. Kelly's a true heart, now—a true Irishman—ready for anything. Those Irish are the boys, after all—though I don't deny they do bluster and have their way a little too much in the Convention. But still Ireland's wrongs are England's. We have the same oppressors. We must make common cause against the tyrants."

"I wish to Heaven they would just have stayed at home, and ranted on the other side of the water, they had their own way there, and no Mammonts middle class to keep them down, and yet they never did an atom of good. Then eloquence is all bono-bast, and what's more, Crossthwaite though there are some fine fellows among them, nine tenths are huns in grain, and you know it."

Crossthaite turned angrily to me. "Why, you are getting as reactionary as old Mackaye himself."

"I am not—and he is not. I am ready to die on a hurdle to-morrow, if it comes to that. I haven't six months lease of life—I am going into a consumption, and a bullet is as easy a death as spitting up my lungs piecemeal. But I despise these Irish, because I can't trust them—they can't trust each other—they can't trust themselves. You know as well as I that you can't get common justice done in Ireland, because you can depend on no man's oath. You know as well as I, that in Parliament or out, nine out of ten of them will stick at no lie, even if it had been exposed and refuted fifty times over, provided it serves the purpose of the moment, and I often think, that after all, Mackaye's right, and what's the matter with Ireland is just that and nothing else—that from the nobleman in his castle to the beggar on his dunghill, they are a nation of liars, John Crossthwaite."

"Sandy's a prejudiced old Scotchman."

"Sandy's a wiser man than you or I, and you know it."

"Oh, I don't deny that, but he's getting old, and I think he has been failing in his mind of late."

"I'm afraid he's failing in his health, he has never been the same man since they hooted him down in John Street. But he hasn't altered in his opinions one jot, and I'll tell you what I believe he's right. I'll die in this matter. Many have seen its the cause of liberty—but I've said about it, just because Irishmen are at the head of it."

"Of course they are—they have the deepest wrongs, and that makes them most earnest in the cause of right. The sympathy of suffering, as they say themselves, has bound them to the English working man against the same oppressors."

"Then let them fight those oppressors at home, and we'll do the same, that's the true way to show sympathy. Thirty beggars at home. They're always crying 'Ireland for the Irish'—why can't they leave England for the English?"

"You're envious of O'Connor's power."

"Say that again, John Crossthwaite, and we part forever!" and I threw old huns at him indignantly.

"No—but don't let's—oh, my dear old fellow, now, that perhaps, perhaps we may never meet again—but I can't bear to hear the Irish abused. They're noble, enthusiastic, generous fellows. If we English had half as warm hearts, we shouldn't be as we are now, and O'Connor's a glorious man, I tell you. Just think of him, the descendant of the ancient kings, throwing away his rank, his name, all he had in the world, for the cause of the suffering millions!"

"That's a most aristocratic speech, John, said I, smiling, in spite of my gloom. "So you keep a leader because he's descended from ancient kings, do you? I should prefer him just because he was not—just because he was a working man, and came of workmen's blood. We shall see, we shall see, whether he's staunch, after all. To my mind, little Cully's worth a great deal more, as far as earnestness goes."

"Oh! Cully's a low-bred, uneducated fellow."

"Anstocrat again, John!" said I, as we went upstairs to Kelly's room, and Crossthwaite did not answer.

There was so great a hubbub inside Kelly's room, of English, French, and Irish, all talking at once, that we knocked at intervals for full five minutes, unheeded by the noisy crew, and I, in despair, was trying the handle, which was fast, when, to my astonishment, a heavy blow was struck on the panel from the inside, and the point of a sharp instrument driven right through, close to my knees, with the exclamation,—

"What do you think o' that, now, in a policeman's broad-basket?"

"I think," answered I, as loud as I dare, and as near the dangerous door, "if I intended really to use it, I wouldn't make such a fool's misse about it."

There was a dead silence, the door was hastily opened, and Kelly's nose poked out, while we, in spite of the horrors of the whole thing, could not help laughing at his face of terror. Seeing who we were, he welcomed us in at once, into a miserable apartment, full of pikes and daggers, brandished by some dozen miserable, ragged, half-starved artisans. Three months, I saw at once, were sleep working time. There was a blessed and landed Frenchman or two, but the majority were, as was to have been expected, the oppressed, the starved, the outcast, the despairing, the insane, "the dangerous classes," which society creates, and then shrinks in horror like Frankenstein, from the monster her own clumsy civilization has created. Then I'minkinsten Maunton! bast them not had warnings enough, either to make thy machines like men, or stop thy bungling, and let God make them for Himself."

I will not repeat what I heard there. There is only a little Italian id that night now sitting "in his right mind"—though not yet "balded" waiting for God's deliverance rather than his own.

We got Kelt out of the room into the street, and began inquiring of him the whereabouts of this sad fellow, or Power. He didn't know, the flattened-headed Irishman that he was. "Pax, by the bye, he'd forgotten an he went to look for him at the place he told him, and they didn't know such a one there."

"Oh, ho! Mr. Power has an alias, then? Perhaps an alias too?"

"He didn't know his name rightly. Some said it was Brown, but he was a loath of a boy—a thine people's man. Boddad, he gov' away arms affther and affther to them that couldn't buy 'em. An' he's as free-spoken as a hound, but he's put me into the confidence. Come down the street a bit, an' I'll tell ye. I'll be Lord Lieutenant o' Dublin Castle myself, if it so happens, as shure as there's no snakes in onbl Ireland, an' revenge her wrongs ankle-deep in the blood o' the Saxon." Whinnoo! for the martyrized memory o' the three hundred thousand vargens o' Wexford!"

"Hold your tongue, you ass!" said Cross-thwaite, as he clapped his hand over his mouth, expecting every moment to find us all there in the Rhadamanthine grasp of a policeman, while I stood long, long, as people will, for mere disgust at the ridiculous which almost always intermingles with the horrible.

At last, out it came—

"Boddad! we're going to do it! London's to be set o' fire in seventeen places at the same moment, an' I'm to light two of them to me own self, and make a hollycrust—ay, that's the word—o' Ireland's scorpions to sting them elves to death in circling flame—"

"You would not do such a villainous thing?" cried we, both at once.

"Boddad! but I won't harm a hair o' their heads! Shure, we'll save the women and children alive, and run for the fire engines our blessed selves, and then out with the pikes, and save the Bank and the Tower—"

"An' av' I live, I live victoriously,
An' av' I die, my soul in glory lies,
I love it all—well!"

I was getting desperate—the whole thing seemed at once so horrible and so impossible. There must be some villainous trap at the bottom of it.

"If you don't tell me more about this fellow Power, Mike," said I, "I'll blow your brains out on the spot—either you or he are villains." And I valiantly pulled out my only weapon, the door key, and put it to his head.

"Oh! my ye mind him? He's a broth of a boy, and I'll tell ye. Shure he knows all about the red coats, case he's an artful cry-mur himself, and that's the way he's found out his gran' combustible."

"An' artful man?" said John. "He told me he was a writer for the press."

"Boddad, then, he's mistaken himself intrudely, for he told me with his own mouth. And I'll show ye the thing he sould me as is to do it. Shure, it'll set fire to the stones o' the street, an' ye point a bit vittol on it."

"Set fire to stones? I must see that before I believe it."

"Shure in' ye shall, then. Where'll I buy a bit? Shure a shop is there open this time o' night, an' I troth I forgot the name o' it intrudely. Foker o' Moses, but here's a bit in my pocket."

And out of his tattered coat tail he higgled a flask of powder and a lump of some cheap chemical salt, whose name I have, I am ashamed to say, forgotten.

"You're a pretty fellow to keep such things in the same pocket with gunpowder!"

"Come along to Muckay's," said Cross-thwaite. "I'll see to the bottom of this. Boddad, but I think the fellows a cursed monstherd—some Government spy."

"Spy is he, then? Oh! the thief o' the world! I'll stab him! I'll murder him! an' burn the town afterwards, all the same."

"Unless," said I, "just as you've got your precious combustible to light off, up he comes from behind the corner and gives you in charge to a policeman. It's a villainous trap, you miserable fool, as sure as the moon's in heaven."

"Upon my word, I am afraid it is—and I'm trapped too."

"Blood and turf! thin, it's he that I'll trap, thin. There's two millions free and mightened Irishmen in London, to avenge my martyrdom wi' pikos and baggonets like raving salvages, and blood for blood!"

"Like salvages, indeed!" said I to Cross-thwaite. "And pretty savage company we are keeping. Liberty, like poverty, makes a man acquainted with strange companions."

"And who's made 'em savages? Who has left them savages? That the greatest nation of the earth has had Ireland in her hands three hundred years—and her people still to be savages!—if that don't justify a revolution, what does? Why, it's just because these poor hutes are what they are, that rebellion becomes a sacred duty. It's for them—for such fools, brutes, as that thug, and the millions more like him, and likely to remain like him, that I've made up my mind to do or die to-morrow!"

There was a grand half-truth, distorted, miscoloured in the words, that silenced me for the time.

We entered Mackaye's door, strongly enough at that time of night, it stood wide open. What could be the matter? I heard loud voices in the inner room, and ran forward calling his name, when, to my astonishment, out past me rushed a tall man, followed by a steaming kettle, which, missing him, took full effect on Kelly's chest, as he stood in the entry, filling his shoes with boiling water, and producing a roar that might have been heard at Temple Bar.

"What's the matter?"

"Have I hit him?" said the old man, in a state of unusual excitement.

"Bedad! it was the man in Power! the cursed spy! An' just as I was going to slate the villain nately, came the kettle, and kilt me all over!"

"Power? He's as many names as a pick-pocket, and as many callings, too, I'll warrant. He came sneaking in to tell me the rogues were a' ready to give up their arms if I'd come forward to them to-morrow. So I tauld him, sir! he was so sure o't, he'd better gang and tak' the arms himself, an' then he let out he'd been a policeman!"

"A policeman!" said both Cross-thwaite and Kelly, with strong expletives.

"A policeman doon in Manchester, I thought I kenne'd his face for the first. And when the rascal saw he'd let out too much, he wanted to make out that he'd been a' doing a spy for the Chartists, while was makin' believe to be a spy o' the Government. Saw when he came that far, I put up wi' the hot water, and bleezed awa' at him, an' noo I maun gang and get some more, for my drop toky!"

Sandy had a little vitriol in the house so we took the combustible down into the cellar, and tried it. It blazed up; but burnt the stone as much as the reader may expect. We next tried it on a lump of wood. It just scorched the place where it lay, and then went out, leaving poor Kelly perfectly frantic with rage, terror, and disappointment. He dashed upstairs, and out into the street, on a wild-goose chase after the rascal, and we saw no more of him that night.

I relate a simple fact. I am afraid—perhaps, for the poor workmen's sake, I should say I am glad, that it was not an unique one. Villains of this kind, both in April and in June, mixed among the working-men, excited their worst passions by bloodthirsty declamations and extravagant promises of success, sold them arms, and then, like the shameless wretch on whose evidence Cuffy and Jones were principally convicted, bore witness against their own victims, unblushingly declaring themselves to have been all along the tools of the Government. I entreat all those who disbelieve this apparently prodigious assertion, to read the evidence given on the trial of the John Street conspirators, and judge for themselves.

"The petition's billing faster than ever!" said Cross-thwaite, as that evening we returned to Mackaye's little back room.

"Don't plenty," grumbled the old man, who had settled himself again to his pipe, with his feet on the fender, and his head half-way up the chimney.

"Now, or never!" went on Cross-thwaite, without minding him. "Now, or never! The manufacturing districts seem more firm than ever."

"An' words cheap," commented Mackaye, salto loco.

"Well," I said, "Heaven keep us from the necessity of ulterior resources! But what must be, must."

"The Government expect it, I can tell you. They're in a pitiable funk, I hear. One regiment's ordered to Uxbridge already, because they don't trust it. They'll find soldiers are men, I do believe, after all."

"Men they are," said Sandy, "an' therefore they'll no be fools enough to stan' by an' see ye put down a' that is, to build up ye yourselves dunnit yet rightly ken what Men? Ay, and wi' man common sense in them than some that had man opportunities."

"I think I've settled everything," went on Cross-thwaite, who seemed not to have heard the best speech "settled everything—for poor Kate, I mean. If anything happens to me, she has friends at Cork—she thinks so at least—and they'd get her out to service somewhere (God knows)." And his face worked fearfully a minute.

"Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori!" said I.

"There are twa methods o' fulfilling that saw, I'm thinkin'. Impremsis, to shoot your neighbour, in secundis, to hang yourself."

"What do you mean by grumbling at the whole thing in this way, Mr. Mackaye? Are you, too, going to shrink back from The Cause, now that liberty is at the very doors?"

"Oo, then, I'm stanch enouch I ha' laid in my ain stock o' weapons for the fecht at Armageddon."

"You don't mean it?" What have you got?"

"A braw now halter, an' a muckle nail. There's a gran' tough bonny here ayont the ingle, will band me a crumse and cantie, when the time comes."

"What on earth do you mean?" asked we both together.

"Ha' ye looked into the monster petition?"

"Of course we have, and signed it too!"

"Monster? Ay, ferlie! Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum. Desmit in pisces mulier for mosca superne. Leeberty, the bonnie lassie, wi' a sough's fud to her? I'll no sign it. I dinna consort wi' shoplifters, an' rholes, an' suckin' bairns—wi' long nose, an' short nose, an' pug nose, an' seventeen Denks o' Wellington, it alone a baker's dozen o' Queens. It's no company, that, for a pur mild patriot!"

"Why, my dear Mackaye," said I, "you know the Reform Bill petitions were just as bad."

"And the Anti Corn Law ones, too, for that matter," said Crossthwaite. "You know we can't help accidents, the petition will never be looked through."

"It's always been the plan with Whigs and Tories, too."

"I ken that better than ye, I guess."

"And isn't everything fair in a good cause?" said Crossthwaite. "Desperate men really can't be so dainty."

"How long ha' ye learnt that devil's loo, Johnnie? Ye were no o' that mind five years ago, had ha' ye been to Exeter—a the while? As fair in the cause o' Mammon, in the cause o' cheap bread, that means cheap wages, but in the cause o' God—wae's me, that ever I suld see this day ower again! ower again! Like the dog to his vomit—just as it was ten, twenty, fifty years ago!" I'll just ha' a petition o' ains to myself. I, an' a twa or three honest men. Besides, ye're just eight days ower time wi' it."

"What do you mean?"

"Suld ha' sent it in the 1st o' April, an' no the 10th, A' Fools' Day wud ha' suited wi' it ferlie!"

"Mr. Mackaye," said Crossthwaite, in a passion, "I shall certainly inform the Convention of your extraordinary language!"

"Do, laddie! do, then! Au' tell 'em thus, too"—and, as he rose, his whole face and figure assumed a dignity, an awfulness, which I had never seen before in him—"tell them that ha' driven out * * * and * * *, an' everyone that daur speak a word o' common sense, or common humanity—they that stone the prophets, an' quench the Spirit o' God, and love a lie an' them that mak' the same—them that think to bring about the reign o' love an' brotherhood wi' pikes an' vitriol bottles, murder an' blasphemy—tell 'em than an' o' fourscore years and mair—an' that has grawn grey in the people's cause—that sat at the feet o' Cuthwright, an' knelt by the deathbed o' Rabbin Burns—an' that dicent Burlett as he went to the Tower, an' spent his wee earnings for Hunt an' Cobbett—an' that beheld the shaking o' the nations in the ninety three, and heard the birth-shriek o' a new-born world—an' that, while he was yet a callant, saw Liberty afar off, an' seeing her, was glad, as for a bonny bride, an' followed her through the wilderness for threescore weary, wae'ful years—sends them the last message that e'er he'll send on earth, tell 'em that they're the slaves o' worse than priests and kings—the slaves o' their ain lusts an' passions—the slaves o' every loud-tongued knave an' mountebank that'll pamper them in their self-conceit, and that the gude God'll smite 'em down, and bring em to nought, and scatter 'em abroad, till they repent, an' get clean hearts an' a richt spirit within them, and learn His lesson that he's been trying to teach 'em this threescore years—that the cause o' the people is the cause o' Him that made the people an' wae to them that tak' the deevil's tools to do his wark wi'! Gude, gude us!—What was you, Alton, laddie?"

"What?"

"But I saw a spark o' fire fa' into your bosom! I've a faith in sicca heathen omens, but auld Cathmas wud say it's a sign o' death within the year save ye from it, my poor misguidit bairn! Aiblins a hie slinight o' my een, it might be—I've had them unco often the day—"

And he stooped down to the fire, and began to light his pipe, muttering to himself,—

"Sixty years o' madness! sixty years o' madness! How long, O Lord, before thou bring these poor daff bodies to their richt mind again!"

We stood watching him, and interchanging looks—expecting something, we knew not what.

Suddenly he sank forward on his knees, with his hands on the bars of the grate, we rushed forward and caught him up. He turned his eyes up to me, speechless with a ghastly expression; one side of his face was all drawn aside and helpless as a child, he let us lift him to his bed, and there he lay, staring at the ceiling.

Four weary days passed by—it was the night of the ninth of April. In the evening of that day his speech returned to him on a sudden—he seemed uneasy about something, and several times asked Katie the day of the month.

"Before the tenth—ay, we mair pray for that I doubt but I'm owor hearty yet—I canna bide to see the shamo o' that day—

Na—I'll tak' no potions nor pills—gin it were na for scruples o' conscience, I'd apocartereeze a'thegithor, after the manner o' the ancient philosophers. But it's no lawful, I misdoubt, to starve onesel'."

"Here is the doctor," said Katie

"Doctor? Wha ca'll for doctors? Canst thou administer to a mind diseased? Can ye tak' long nose, an' short nose, an' snub nose, an' seventeen Denks o' Wellingtons out o' my puddins? Will you castor oil, and your calomel, an' your eroton, do that? D'yo ken a medicamentum that'll put humans into workmen? Non tribus Anticyis! Tons o' hellebore—acres o' strait-waistcoats—a hail police force o' head-doctors winna do it. Juvat insanire—this their way is their folly, as auld Benjamin o' Tudela saith of the heathen Heigho! 'Forty years lang was he grievit wi' this generation, an' swore in His wrath that they suldna enter into His rest.' Pulse 'tongue' ay, shak' your lugs, an' tak' your fee, and dinna keep auld folk out o' their graves. Can ye sang?"

The doctor meekly confessed his inability

"That's pity—or I'd gar ye sang 'Auld Langsyne,'—

"We twa hae paddit in the burn—"

Aweel, aweel, aweel—"

Weary and solemn was that long night, as we sat there, with the crushing weight of the morrow on our minds, watching by that deathbed, listening hour after hour to the rambling soliloquies of the old man, as "he babbl'd of green fields," yet I vorily believe that to all of us, especially to poor little Katie, the active present interest of tending him, kept us from going all but mad with anxiety and excitement. But it was weary work, —and yet, too, strangely interesting, as at times there came scraps of old Scotch love-poetry, contrasting sadly with the grim withered lips that uttered them—hints to me of some sorrow long since suffered, but never healed. I had never heard him allude to such an event before but once, on the first day of our acquaintance.

"I went to the kirk,
My luve sat afore me,
I trow my twa een
Tauld him a sweet story
Aye yakin' o'—
Wakin' aye and weary—
I thoct a the kirk
Saw me an' my deary"

'Aye wakin' o'!'—Do ye think, noo, we sail ha' knowledge in the next wail o' them we loved on earth? I askit that same o' Rab Burns ance, sitting up a' canty at Tibbie Shiels in Meggot Vale, an' he said, pur shiol, he 'didna ken ower weell, we maun bide and see,—bide and see—that's the gran' philosophy o' life, after a' Aiblins folk'll ken their true freens there, an' there'll be na mair luve coft and sauld for aillie—

"(Fear and tocher is needit nane
I' the countrie whaur my luve is gane."

(Gin I had a true freen the noo' to gang down the wynd, an' find if it war but an auld Abraham o' a blue-gown, wi' a bit crowl, or a fizzle-pipe, to play fae the Bush aboon Traquair! Na, na, na, it's singing the Lord's song in a strange land, that wad be; an' I hope the application's no irreverent, for aye that was rearit amang the hills o' God, an' the trees o' the forest which He hath planted

"Oh the broom, an' the bonny yellow broom,
The broom o' the Cowden knows!"

Hech, but sho wad hit that bounily!

Did ye ever gang listering saumons by night? Ou, but it's bray sport, wi' the seas an' the brack's a' glowering out bludo red i' the lorch-light, and the bonnie hizzas skelping an' skirling on the bank—

There was a gran' lolly, a bonnie lolly, cam' in and talked like an angel o' Gail to pur auld Sandy, anent the salvation o' his soul. But I tauld her no' to fash hersel'! It's no my view o' human life, that a man's sent into the world just to save his soul, an' creep out again. An' I saul I wad leave the savin' o' my soul to Him that made my soul, it was in richt gude keepin' there, I'd war rant. An' then she was unco sleyel when she found I didna laud wi' the Athanasian creed. An' I tauld her, na', if He that died on the cross was sic a aye as sho mial I tenk Him to be, there was na that pido nor spito in him, be sure, to send a punn auld sinful, guileless body to eternal fire, because he didna a'thegither understand the honour due to His name."

"Who was this lady?"

He did not seem to know, and Katie had never heard of her before—"some district visitor" or other."

"I sair misdoubt but the auld creeds are in the richt anent Him, after a'! I'd gie muckle to think it—there's na comfort as it is. Aiblins there might be a wee comfort in that, for a poor auld worn-out patriot. But it's ower late to change. I tauld her that, too, ance. It's ower late to put new wine into auld bottles. I was unco ill-winn to the high doctrines anco, when I was a bit ladlie, an' sat in the wee kirk by my minnie an' my daddie—a richt stern auld Cameroman sort o' bodie he was, too, but as I grew, and grew, the bed was ower short for a man to stretch himsel' thereon, and the plaidie ower strait for a man to fauld himsel' therein; and so I had to gang my gate a' naked in the matter

o' formulae, as Maister Tuinmas has it."

"Ah! do send for a priest, or a clergyman!" said Katie, who partly understood his meaning.

"Parson? He canna put new skin on auld scars. Na bit stickit crinate laddie for me, to gang argumentin' wi' me that's auld enough to be his gran'father. When the persons will hear me faucit God's people, then I'll hear them anent Heil

"—Sae I'm wearin' awa, Jean,
To the land o' the leal—"

Gin I ever get thither. Katie, here, hands wi' purgatory, yo ken, whaur souls are burnt clean again—like bacey-pipe—

"When Razor brigs is over and past,
Every night and aile,
To Whinny Muir thou comest at last,
And God receive thy sawle

"Gin hosen an' shoon thou gavest nane,
Every night and aile,
The whins shall pike thee until the bane,
And God receive thy sawle."

Amen. There's mair things aheon, as well as below, than are dreamt o' mon philosophy.
At least, where'er I go, I'll meet no long nose, nor short nose, nor snub nose patriots there, nor purr gowks stealing the deil's tools to do God's wark wi'. Out among the eternities an' the idealities—it's no that di'ny outlook, after a', to find truth an' fact—naught but truth an' fact—e'en beside the worm that dieth not, and the fire that is not quenched!"

"God forbid!" said Katie.

"Gin do whatsoever shall please Him,
Katie an' that's aye gude, like Himsel!
Shall no the Judge of all the earth do right —right—right?"

And murmuring that word of words to himself, over and over, more and more faintly, he turned slowly over, and seemed to slumber—

Some half hour passed before we tried to stu him. He was dead.

And the candles waned grey, and the great light streamled in through every crack and cranny, and the sun had risen on the Tenth of April. What would be done before that sun had set?

What would be done? Just what we had the might to do, and therefore, according to the formula on which we were about to act, that mights are rights, jnat what we had the right to do—nothing. Futility, absurdity, vanity, and vexation of spirit. I shall make my next a short chapter. It is a day to be forgotten—and forgiven.

CHAPTER XXXIV

THE TENTH OF APRIL.

AND he was gone at last! Kind women, whom his unknown charities had saved from shame, laid him out duly, and closed his eyes, and bound up that face that never would beam again with genial humour, those lips that would never again speak courage and counsel to the sinful, the oppressed, the forgotten. And there he lay, the old warrior dead upon his shield, worn out by long years of manifold toil in The People's Cause, and, saddest thought of all, by disappointment in those for whom he spent his soul. True, he was aged, no one knew how old. He had said, more than eighty years, but we had shortened his life, and we knew it. He would never see that deliverance for which he had been toiling ever since the days when, as a boy, he had listened to Tooke and Cartwright, and the patriarchs of the people's freedom. Bitter, bitter, were our thoughts, and bitter were our tears, as Cressethwaite and I stood watching that beloved face, now in death refined to a grandeur, to a youthful simplicity and delicacy, which we had never seen on it before—calm and strong—the square jaws set firm even in death—the lower lip still clenched above the upper, as if in a divine indignation and everlasting protest, even in the grave, against the devourers of the earth. Yes, he was gone—the old lion, worn out with many wounds, dead in his cage. Where could we replace him?
There were gallant men amongst us, eloquent well read, earnest—men whose names will ring through this land ere long—men who had been taught wisdom, even as he, by the sinfulness, the apathy, the ingratitude, as well as by the sufferings of their fellows.
But where should we two find again the learning, the moderation, the long experience—above all, the more than woman's tenderness of him whom we had lost? And at that time, too, of all others! Alas! we had despised his counsel, wayward and fierce, we would have none of his reproof, and now God had withdrawn him from us,
the righteous was taken away from the evil to come. For we knew that evil was coming.
We felt all along that we should not succeed.
But we were desperate, and his death made us more desperate, still at the moment it threw us nearer to each other. Yes—we were rudderless upon a roaring sea, and all before us blank with lurid blinding mist, but still we were together, to live and die, and as we looked into each other's eyes, and clasped each other's hands above the dead man's face, we felt that there was love between us as of Jonathan and David, passing the live of woman.

Few words passed. Even our passionate artisan nature, so sensitive and voluble in general, in comparison with the cold reserve of the field labourer and the gentleman, was hushed in silent awe between the thought of the past and the thought of the future. We felt ourselves trembling between two worlds. We felt that to-morrow must decide our destiny—and we felt rightly, though little we guessed what that destiny would be!

But it was time to go. We had to prepare for the meeting. We must be at Kennington Common within three hours at furthest, and Crossthwaite hurried away, leaving Kate and me to watch the dead.

And then came across me the thought of another deathbed—my mother's—how she had lain and lain, while I was far away. And then I wondered whether she had suffered much, or faded away at last in a peaceful sleep, as he had. And then I wondered how her corpse had looked, and pictured it to myself, lying in the little old room, day after day, till they scrowled the coffin down—before I came! Cruel! Did she look as calm, as grand in death, as he who lay there? And as I watched the old man's features, I seemed to trace in them the strangest likeness to my mother's. The strangest likeness! I could not shake it off. It became intense—miraculous. Was it she, or was it he, who lay there? I shook my self and. My limbs ached, my limbs were heavy, my brain and eyes swam round. I must be over-fatigued by excitement and sleeplessness. I would go downstairs into the fresh air, and shake it off.

As I came down the passage, a woman, dressed in black, was standing at the door, speaking to one of the lodgers. "And he is dead! Oh, if I had but known sooner that he was even ill!"

That voice—that figure—surely, I knew them!—them, at least, there was no mistaking! Or was it another phantom of my disordered brain? I pushed forward to the door, and as I did so, she turned, and our eyes met full. It was she—Lady Ellerton! and, worn, transformed by widow's weeds, but that face was like no other's still. Why did I drop my eyes and draw back at the first glance like a guilty coward? She beckoned me towards her, went out into the street, and herself began the conversation, from which I shrank, I know not why.

"When did he die?"

"Just at sunrise this morning. But how came you here to visit him? Were you the lady who, as he said, came to him a few days since?"

She did not answer my question. "At sunrise this morning?—A fitting time for him to die, before he sees the ruin and disgrace of those for whom he laboured. And you, too, I hear, are taking your share in this projected madness and iniquity?"

"What right have you," I asked, bristling up at a sudden suspicion that crossed me, "to use such words about me?"

"Recollect," she answered mildly but firmly, "your conduct, three years ago, at D."

"What," I said, "was it not proved upon my trial, that I exerted all my powers, endangered my very life, to prevent outrage in that case?"

"It was proved upon your trial," she replied, in a marked tone, "but we were informed, and, alas! from authority only too good, namely, from that of an eyewitness, of the sanguinary and ferocious language which you were not afraid to use at the meeting in London, only two nights before the riot."

I turned white with rage and indignation. "Toll me," I said—"tell me, if you have any honour, who dared forge such an atrocious calumny? No! you need not tell me. I see well enough now. He should have told you that I exposed myself that night to insult, not by advocating, but by opposing violence, as I have always done. As I would now, were not I desperate—hopeless of any other path to liberty. And as for this coming struggle, have I not written to my cousin, humiliating as it was to me, to beg him to warn you all from me, lest—"

I could not finish the sentence.

"You wrote? He has warned us, but he never mentioned your name. He spoke of his knowledge as having been picked up by himself at personal risk to his clerical character."

"The risk, I presume, of being known to have actually received a letter from a Unitarian, but I wrote—on my honour I wrote—a week ago, and received no word of answer."

"Is this true?" she asked.

"A man is not likely to deal in useless falsehoods, who knows not whether he shall live to see the sot of sin!"

"Then you are implicated in this expected insurrection?"

"I am implicated," I answered, "with the people, what they do I shall do. Those who once called themselves the patrons of the tailor poet, left the mistaken enthusiast to languish for three years in prison, without a sign, a hint of mercy, pity, remembrance. Society has cast me off, and, in casting me off, it has sent me off to my own people, where I should have stayed from the beginning. Now I am at my post, because I am among my class. If they triumph peacefully, I triumph with them. If they need blood to gain their rights, be it so. Let the blood be upon the head of those who refuse, not those who demand. At least, I shall be with my own people. And if I die, what better thing on earth can happen to me?"

"But the law?" she said.

"Do not talk to me of law! I know it too well in practice to be moved by any theories about it. Laws are no law, but tyranny, when the few make them, in order to oppress the many by them."

"Oh!" she said, in a voice of passionate earnestness, which I had never heard from her before, "stop—for God's sake, stop! You know not what you are saying—what you are doing. Oh! that I had met you before—that I had had more time to speak to poor Mackayo! Oh! wait, wait—there is a deliverance for you! but never in this path—no! And just while I, and nobler far than I, are longing and struggling to find the means of telling you your deliverance, you, in the madness of your haste, are making it impossible!"

There was a wild sincerity in her words—an almost imploring tenderness in her tone.

"So young!" she said—"so young to be lost thus!"

I was intensely moved. I felt, I knew, that she had a message for me. I felt that this was the only intellect in the world to which I would have submitted mine, and, for one moment, all the angel and all the devil in me wrestled for the mastery. If I could but have trusted her one moment!

No! all the pride, the spite, the suspicion, the prejudice of years, rolled back upon me. "An aristocrat! and she, too, the one who has kept me from Lillian!" And in my bitterness, not daring to speak the real thought within me, I answered with a flippant sneer—

"Yes, madam! like Cordelia, so young, yet so intender"—thanks to the metrices of the upper classes!"

Did she turn away in indignation? No, by Heaven! there was nothing upon her face but the intensest yearning pity. If she had spoken again, she would have conquered, but for those perfect lips could open, the thought of thoughts flashed across me.

"Tell me one thing! Is my cousin George to be married to—" and I stopped.

"He is."

"And yet," I said, "you wish to turn me back from dying on a barricade!" And, without waiting for a reply, I hurried down the street in all the fury of despair.

I have promised to say little about the tenth of April, for indeed I have no heart to do so. Every one of Mackayo's predictions came true! We had arrayed against us, by our own folly, the very physical force to which we had appealed. The dread of general plunder and outrage by the savages of London, the national hatred of that French and Irish interference of which we had boasted, arrayed against us thousands of special constables, who had in the abstract little or no objection to our political opinions. The practical common sense of England, whatever discontent it might feel with the existing system, refused to let it be buried rudely down, on the mere chance of building up on its ruins something as yet untried, and even undefined. Above all, the people would not rise. Whatever sympathy they had with us, they did not care to show it. And then futility after futility exposed itself. The meeting which was to have been counted by hundreds of thousands, numbered hardly its tens of thousands, and of them a frightful proportion were of those very rascal classes, against whom we ourselves had offered to be sworn in as special constables. O'Connor's courage failed him after all. He contrived to be called away, at the critical moment, by some problematical superintendent of police. Poor Cuffey, the honestest, if not the wisest, speaker there, leapt off the waggon, exclaiming that we were all "humbugged and betrayed!" and the meeting broke up pitifully piecemeal, drenched and cowed, body and soul, by pouring rain, on its way home—for the very heavens mercifully helped to quench our folly—while the monster petition crawled ludicrously away in a hack cab, to be dragged to the floor of the House of Commons amid roars of laughter—"mextinguishable laughter," as of Tennyson's Epicurean Gods.

"Careless of mankind

For they lie beside their nectar, and their bolts are hurled Far below them in their valleys, and the clouds are lightly curled
Round their golden houses, girdled with the gleaming world
There they smile in secret, looking over wasted lands, Blight and famine, plague and earthquake, roaring deeps and fiery rain is Clanging lights, and flashing towns and sinking ships, and fragrant winds
But they smile—they find it music, central in a doleful
world,
Steaming up, a lamentation, and an ancient tale of wrong
Like a tale of little meaning, though the words are strong,
Chanted by an ill-used race of men that cleave the soil,
Now the seed and reap the harvest with enduring toil,
Storing little yearly dues of wheat and wine and oil,
Till they perish, and they suffer—some, tis whispered, down in hell
Suffer endless anguish!"

Truly truly, great poets words are vaster than the singers themselves suppose!

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE LOWEST DEGREE

SULLEN, disappointed, desperate, I strode along the streets that evening, careless whither I went. The people's cause was lost the Charter a laughing stock. That the party which monopolises wealth, rank, and, as it fancied, education and intelligence, should have been driven, degraded, to appeal to brute force for self defence—that thought gave me a savage joy, but that it should have conquered by that last, lowest resource! That the few should be still stronger than the many, or the many still too cold-hearted and coward to face the few—that sickened me. I hated "the well-born young special constables whom I passed, because they would have fought. I hated the gent and shopkeeper special constables, because they would have run away. I hated my own party, because they had gone too far—because they had not gone far enough. I hated myself, because I had not produced some marvellous effect—though what that was to have been I could not tell—and hated myself all the more for that ignorance.

A group of effeminate shopkeepers passed me, shouting "God save the Queen!" "Hypocrites!" I cried in my heart—they mean "God save our shops!" Lurs! They keep up willingly the useful calumny, that their slaves and victims are disloyal as well as miserable!

I was utterly abused—no, not utterly, for my self-contempt still vented itself—not in forgiveness, but in universal hatred and defiance. Suddenly I perceived my cousin, laughing and jesting with a party of fashionable young specials. I shrank from him, and yet, I know not why, drew as near him as I could, unobserved—near enough to catch the words,

"Upon my honour, Locke, I believe you are a Chartist yourself at heart."

"At least I am no Communist," said he, in a significant tone. "There is one little bit of real property which I have no intention of sharing with my neighbours."

"What, the little beauty somewhere near Cavendish Square?"

"That's my business."

"Whereby you mean that you are on your way to her now? Well, I am invited to the wedding, remember."

He pushed on, laughingly, without answering. I followed him fast—"near Cavendish Square!"—the very part of the town where Lillian lived! I had had, as yet, a horror of going near it, but now, an intolerable suspicion scourged me forward, and I dogged his steps, hiding behind pillars, and at the corners of streets, and then running on, till I got sight of him again. He went through Cavendish Square, up Harley Street—was it possible? I gnashed my teeth at the thought. But it must be so. He stopped at the dean's house, knocked, and entered, without parley.

In a minute I was breathless on the doorstep, and knocked. I had no plan, no object, except the wild wish to see my own despair. I never thought of the chances of being recognised by the servants, or of anything else, except of Lillian by my cousin's side.

The footman came out smiling. "What did I want?"

"I—I—Mr Locke."

"Well, you needn't be in such a hurry!" (with a significant grin). "Mr. Locke's likely to be busy for a few minutes yet, I expect!"

Evidently the man did not know me.

"Tell him that—that a person wishes to speak to him on particular business." Though I had no more notion what that business was than the man himself.

"Sit down in the hall."

And I heard the fellow, a moment afterwards, gossiping and laughing with the maids below about "the young couple."

To sit down was impossible; my only thought was—where was Lillian?

Voices in an adjoining room caught my ear. His! yes—and her's too—soft and low. What devil prompted me to turn eaves-dropper? to run headlong into temptation? I was close to the dining-room door, but they were not there—evidently they were in the back room, which, as I knew, opened into it with folding doors. I—I must confess all—Noiselessly, with craft like a mad-mau's, I turned the handle, slipped in as stealthily as a cat—the folding doors were slightly open. I had a view of all that passed within. A horrible fascination seemed to keep my eyes fixed on them, in spite of myself. Honour, shame, despair, bade me turn away, but in vain.

I saw them. How can I write it? Yet I will. I saw them sitting together on the sofa. Their arms were round each other. Her head lay upon his breast, he bent over her with an intense gaze, as of a basilisk, I thought, how do I know that it was not the fierceness of his love? Who could have helped loving her?

Suddenly she raised her head, and looked up in his face—her eyes burning with tenderness, her cheeks burning with mingled delight and modesty—their lips met, and clung together. . . . It seemed a life—an eternity—before they parted again. Then the spell was broken, and I rushed from the room.

Faint, giddy, and blind, I just recollect leaning against the wall of the staircase. He came hastily out, and started as he saw me. My face told all.

"What? Eavesdropping?" he said, in a tone of unutterable scorn. I answered nothing, but looked stupidly and fixedly in his face, while he glared at me with that keen, burning, intolerable eye. I longed to spring at his throat, but that eye held me as the snake's holds the deer. At last I found words.

"Traitor! everywhere—in everything—tricking me—supplanting me—in my friends—in my love!"

"Your love? Yours?" And the fixed eye still glared upon me. "Lusson, cousin Alton! The strong and the weak have been matched for the same prize and what wonder, if the strong man conquers? Go and ask Lillian how she likes the thought of being a Communist's love!"

As when, in a nightmare, we try by a desperate effort to break the spell, I sprang forward, and struck at him, he put my hand by carelessly, and felled me bleeding to the ground. I recollect hardly anything more, till I found myself thrust into the street by snoring footmen, and heard them call after me "Chartist" and "Communist" as I rushed along the pavement, careless where I went.

I strode and staggered on through street after street, running blindly against passengers, dashing under horses' heads, hoodlums of warnings and execrations, till I found myself, I know not how, on Waterloo Bridge. I had meant to go there when I left the door. I know that at least—and now I was there.

I buried myself in a recess of the bridge, and stared around and up and down.

I was alone—deserted even by myself. Mother, sister, friends, love, the idol of my life, were all gone. I could have borne that. But to be shamed, and know that I deserved it, to be deserted by my own honour, self-respect, strength of will—who can bear that?

I could have borne it, had one thing been left—faith in my own destiny—the inner hope that God had called me to do a work for him.

"What drives the Frenchman to suicide?" I asked myself, arguing ever even in the face of death and hell—"His faith in nothing but his own lusts and pleasures; and when they are gone, then comes the pan of charcoal and all is over. What drives the German? His faith in nothing but his own brain. He has fallen down and worshipped that miscreant 'Ich' of his, and made that, and not God's will, the centre and root of his philosophy, his poetry, and his self-idolising aesthetics, and when it fails him, then for prismatic acid, and nonentity. Those old Romans, too—why, they are the very experimentum crucis of suicide! As long as they fancied that they had a calling to serve the State, they could live on and suffer. But when they found no more work left for them, then they could die—as Porcia did—as Cato—as I ought. What is there left for me to do?—outcast, disgraced, useless, decrepit."

I looked out over the bridge into the desolate night. Below me the dark moaning river-eddies hurried downward. The wild west wind howled past me, and leapt over the parapet downward. The huge reflection of Saint Paul's, the great tap roots of light from lamp and window that shone upon the lurid stream, pointed down—down—down. A black wherry shot through the arch beneath me, still and smoothly downward. My brain began to whirl madly—I sprang upon the step. A man rushed past me, clambered on the parapet, and threw up his arms wildly. A moment more, and he would have leapt into the stream. The sight recalled me to my senses—say, rather, it re-awoke in me the spirit of mankind. I seized him by the arm, tore him down upon the pavement, and held him, in spite of his frantic struggles. It was Johnny Downes! Gaunt, ragged, sodden, blear-eyed, drivelling, the worn-out gin drinker stood, his momentary paroxysm of strength gone, trembling and staggering.

"Why won't you let a cove die? Why won't you let a cove die? They're all dead—drunk, and poisoned, and dead! What is there left?"—he burst out suddenly in his old ranting style—"what is there left on earth to live for? The prayers of liberty are answered by the laughter of tyrants, her sun is sunk beneath the ocean wave, and her pipe put out by the raging billows of aristocracy! These starving millions of Kensington Common—where are they? Where? I axes you," he cried fiercely, raising his voice to a womanish scream—"where are they?"

"Gone home to bed, like sensible people, and you had better go too."

"Bed? I sold ours a month ago, but we'll go. Come along, and I'll show you my wife and family, and we'll have a tear-party—Jacob's Island tea. Come along!"

"Fly, flea, unfortunate flea!
Bereft of his wife and his small family!"

He clutched my arm, and dragging me off towards the Surrey side, turned down Stamford Street.

I followed half perforce, and the man seemed quite demented whether with gin or sorrow I could not tell. As he strode along the pavement, he kept continually looking back, with a perplexed terrified air, as if expecting some fearful object.

"The rats!—the rats! don't you see 'em coming out of the gully holes, between the area railings—dozens and dozens?"

"No, I saw none."

"You lie, I hear their tails whisking, there's them shiny hats a glistening, and every one on 'em with peckers' staves! Quick! quick! or they'll have me to the station-house!"

"Nonsense!" I said; "we are free men! What are the policemen to us?"

"You lie!" cried he, with a fearful oath, and a wrench at my arm which almost threw me down. "Do you call a sweater's man a free man?"

"You a sweater's man?"

"Ay!" with another oath. "My men ran away—folks said I drank, too, but here I am; and I, that sweated others, I'm sweated myself—and I'm a slave! I'm a slave—a negro slave, I am, you aristocrat villain!"

"Mind me, Downes, if you will go quietly, I will go with you; but if you do not let go of my arm, I give you in charge to the first policeman I meet."

"Oh, don't, don't!" whined the miserable wretch, as he almost fell on his knees, gin-drinkers' tears running down his face, "or I shall be too late. And then the rats 'll get in at the roof, and up through the floor, and eat 'em all up, and my work too—the grand new three pound coat that I've been stitching at this ten days, for the sum of one half crown sterling—and don't I wish I may see the money? Come on, quick, there are the rats, close behind!" And he dashed across the broad roaring thoroughfare of Bridge Street, and hurrying almost at a run down Tooty Street, plunged into the wildernesses of Bermondsey.

He stopped at the end of a miserable blind alley, where a dirty gas-lamp just served to make darkness visible, and show the pitched windows and rickety doorways of the crazy houses, whose upper stories were lost in a brooding cloud of fog; and the pools of stagnant water at our feet; and the huge heap of cinders which filled up the waste end of the alley—a dreary, black, formless mound, on which two or three spectral dogs prowled up and down after the usual, appearing and vanishing like dark mops in and out of the black misty chaos beyond.

The neighbourhood was undergoing, as it seemed, "improvements," of that peculiar metropolitan species which consists in pulling down the dwellings of the poor, and building up rich men's houses instead, and great buildings, within high temporary palings, had already eaten up half the little houses, as the great fish, and the great estates, and the great shopkeepers, eat up the little ones of their species—by the law of competition, lately discovered to be the true creator and preserver of the universe. There they loomed up, the tall bulwarks, against the dreary sky, looking down with their grim, proud, stony visages, on the misery which they were driving out of one corner, only to accumulate and intensify it in another.

The house at which we stopped was the last in the row; all its companions had been pulled down, and there it stood, leaning out with one naked ugly side into the gap, and stretching out long props, like feeble arms and crutches, to resist the work of demolition.

A group of slatternly people were in the entry, talking loudly, and as Downes pushed by them, a woman seized him by the arm.

"Oh! you unnatural villain!—to go away after your drink, and leave all them poor dead corpses locked up, without even letting a body go in to stretch them out!"

"And breeding the fever, too, to poison the whole house!" growled one.

"The relieving officer's been here, my cove," said another, "and he's gone for a peeler and a search warrant to break open the door, I can tell you."

But Downes pushed past unheeding, unlocked a door at the end of the passage, thrust men, locked it again, and then pushed across the room in chase of two or three rats, who vanished into cracks and holes.

And what a room! A low lean-to with wooden walls, without a single article of furniture; and through the broad clinks of the floor shone up as it were ugly glaring eyes, staring at us. They were the reflections of the rushlight in the sewer below. The stench was frightful—the air heavy with pestilence. The first breath I drew made my heart sink, and my stomach turn. But I forgot everything in the object which lay before me, as Downes tore a half-finished coat off three corpses laid side by side on the bare floor.

There was his little Irish wife,—dead—and naked—the wasted white limbs gleamed in the lurid light; the unclosed eyes stared, as if reproachfully, at the husband whose drunkenness had brought her there to kill her with the pestilence, and on each side of her a little, shrivelled, impish, child corpse—the wretched man had laid their arms round the dead mother's neck—and there they slept, then hungering and wailing over at last forever—the rats had been busy already with them—but what matter to them now?

"Look!" he cried, "I watched 'em dying! Day after day I saw the devils come up through the cracks, like little maggots and beetles, and all manner of ugly things, creeping down their throats; and I asked 'em, and they said they were the fever devils."

It was too true, the poisonous exhalations had killed them. The wretched man's delirium tremens had given that horrible substantiality to the poisonous fever gases.

Suddenly Downes turned on me, almost menacingly. "Money! money! I want some gun!"

I was thoroughly terrified—and there was no shame in feeling fear, looked up with a man in far my superior in size and strength, in so ghastly a place. But the shame, and the folly too, would have been in giving way to my fear, and with a boldness half assumed, half the real fruit of excitement and indignation at the horrors I beheld, I answered,—

"If I had money, I would give you none. What do you want with gun? Look at the fruits of your accursed tippling. If you had taken my advice, my poor fellow," I went on, gaining courage as I spoke, "and become a water-drinker, like me—"

"Curse you and your water-drinking! If you had no water to drink or wash with for two years but that—thint," pointing to the foul ditch below—"if you had emptied the slops in there with one hand, and filled your kettle with the other—"

"Do you actually mean that that sewer is your only drinking-water?"

"Where else can we get any? Everybody drinks it, and you shall, too—you shall!" he cried, with a fearful oath, "and then see if you don't run off to the gin-shop, to take the taste of it out of your mouth. Drink! and who can help drinking, with his stomach turned with such hell-broth as that—or such a hell's blast as this air is here, ready to vomit from morning till night with the smells? I'll show you. You shall drink a bucket full of it, as sure as you live you shall."

And he ran out of the back door, upon a little balcony, which hung over the ditch.

I tried the door, but the key was gone, and the handle too. I beat furiously on it, and called for help. Two gruff authoritative voices were heard in the passage.

"Let us in, I'm the policeman!"

"Let me out, or mischief will happen!"

The policeman made a vigorous thrust at the crazy door; and just as it burst open, and the light of his lantern streamed into the horrible den, a heavy splash was heard outside.

"Ho has fallen into the ditch!"

"He'll be drowned, then, as sure as he's a born man," shouted one of the crowd behind.

We rushed out on the balcony. The light of the policeman's lantern glared over the ghastly scene—along the double row of miserable house backs, which lined the sides of the open tidal ditch—over strange rambling jetties, and balconies, and sleeping sheds, which hung on rotting piles over the black waters, with phosphorescent scraps of rotten hali gleaming and twinkling out of the dark hollows, like devilish grave lights—over mounds of poisonous gas, and bloated carcasses of dogs, and lumps of oil, floating on the stagnant olive green hell-broth—over the slow sullen rows of only rattle which were dying away into the darkness far beyond, sending up, as they stired, hot breaths of miasma—the only sign that a spark of humanity, after years of foul life, had quenched itself at last in that foul death. I almost fancied that I could see the haggard face staring up at me through the slimy water, but no—it was as opaque as stone.

I shuddered and went in again, to see slatternly gin-smelling women stripping off their clothes—true women even there—to cover the poor naked corpses; and pointing to the bruises which told a tale of long tyranny and cruelty, and unguing their lamentations with stories of shrieks and beating, and children locked up for hours to starve, and the men looked on sullenly, as if they too were guilty, or rushed out to relieve themselves by helping to find the drowned body. Ugh! it was the very mouth of hell, that room. And in the midst of all the rout, the relieving officer stood impassive, jotting down scraps of information, and warning us to appear the next day, to state what we knew before the magistrates. Needless hypocrisy of law! Too careless to save the women and children from brutal tyranny, nakedness, starvation!—too superstitious to offend its idol of vested interests, by protecting the poor man against his tyrants, the house-owning shopkeepers under whose greed the dwellings of the poor become nests of filth and pestilence, drunkenness and degradation. Careless, superstitious, unbecile law!—leaving the victims to the unhelped, and then, when the fever and the tyranny has done its work, in thy sanctimonious prudishness, dragging thy respectable conscience by a "searching inquiry" as to how it all happened—lest, forsooth, there should have been "foul play!" Is the knife or the bludgeon, then, the only foul play, and not the cesspool and the curse of Kabschukoh? Go through Richmondsey or Spitalfields, St Giles's or Lambeth, and see if there is not foul play enough already—to be tried hereafter at a more awful coroner's inquest than thou thinkest of!

CHAPTER XXXVI

DREAMLAND

It must have been two o'clock in the morning before I reached my lodgings. Too much exhausted to think, I hurried to my bed. I remember now that I reeled strangely as I went upstairs. I lay down, and was asleep in an instant.

How long I had slept I know not, when I awoke with a strange confusion and whirling in my brain, and an intolerable weight and pain about my back and loins. By the light of the gas lamp I saw a figure standing at the foot of my bed. I could not discern the face, but I knew instinctively that it was my mother. I called to her again and again, but she did not answer. She moved slowly away, and passed out through the wall of the room.

I tried to follow her, but could not. An enormous, unutterable weight seemed to lie upon me. The bed clothes grew and grew before me, and upon me, into a vast mountain, millions of miles in height. Then it seemed all glowing red, like the cone of a volcano. I heard the roaring of the fires within, the rattling of the embers down the heaving slope. A river ran from its summit, and up that river bed it seemed I was doomed to climb and climb forever, millions and millions of miles upwards, against the rushing stream. The thought was intolerable, and I shrieked aloud. A raging thirst had seized me. I tried to drink the river-water, but it was boiling-hot—sulphureous—reeking of putrefaction. Suddenly I fancied that I could pass round the foot of the mountain, and jumbling, as madmen will, the sublime and the ridiculous, I sprang up to go round the foot of my bed, which was the mountain.

I recollect lying on the floor. I recollect the people of the house, who had been awake by my shriek and my fall, rushing in and calling to me. I could not rise or answer.

I recollect a doctor; and talk about brain-fever and delirium. It was true I was in a raging fever. And my fancy, long pent up and crushed by circumstances, burst out in uncontrollable wildness, and swept my other faculties with it helpless away over all heaven and earth, presenting to me as in a vast kaleidoscope, fantastic symbols of all I had ever thought, or read, or felt.

That fancy of the mountain returned, but I had climbed it now. I was wandering along the lower ridge of the Himalaya. On my right the line of snow peaks showed like a rosy saw against the clear blue morning sky. Raspberries and cyclamens were peeping through the snow around me. As I looked down the abysses, I could see far below, through the thin veils of blue mist that wandered in the glens, the silver spires of giant cedars, and huge rhododendrons that glowed like trees of flame. The longing of my life to behold that cradle of mankind was satisfied. My eyes revelled in vastness, as they swept over the broad flat jungle at the mountain foot, a desolate sheet of dark, gigantic grasses, furrowed with the paths of the buffalo and rhinoceros, with barren sandy water-courses, desolate pools, and here and there a single tree, stunted with malaria, shattered by mountain floods, and far beyond, the vast plains of Hindoostan, enlaced with myriads of silver rivers and canals, tanks and rice-fields, cities with their mosques and minarets, gleaming among the stately palm-groves along the boundless horizon. Above me was a Hindoo temple, cut out of the yellow sandstone. I climbed up to the higher tier of pillars among monstrous shapes of gods and fiends, that mouthed, and writhed, and mocked at me, struggling to free themselves from their bed of rock. The bull Nandi rose and tried to gore me, hundred handed gods brandished quarts and sabres round my head, and Kali dropped the skull from her gore-dripping jaws, to clutch me for her prey. Then my mother came, and seizing the pillars of the portico, bent them like reeds. An earthquake shook the hills—great sheets of woodland slid roaring and crashing into the valleys—a tornado swept through the temple halls, which rocked and tossed like a vessel in a storm—a crash—a cloud of yellow dust which filled the air—choked me—blinded me—buried me—

And Eleanor came by, and took my soul in the palm of her hand, as the angels did Faust's, and carried it to a cavern by the sea-side, and dropped it in; and I fell and fell for ages. And all the velvet mosses, rock flowers, and sparkling spars and ores, fell with me, round me, in showers of diamonds, whirlwinds of emerald and ruby, and pattered into the sea that moaned below, and were quenched; and the light lessened above me to one small spark, and vanished; and I was in darkness, and turned again to my dust.

And I was at the lowest point of created life, a madrepore rooted to the rock, fathoms below the tide-mark, and worst of all, my individuality was gone. I was not one thing, but many things—a crowd of innumerable polypi, and I grow and grew, and the more I grew the more I divided, and multiplied thousand and ten thousandfold. If I could have thought, I should have gone mad at it, but I could only feel.

And I heard Eleanor and Lillian talking, as they floated past me through the deep, for they were two angels; and Lillian said, "When will he be one again?"

And Eleanor said, "He who falls from the golden ladder must climb through ages to its top. He who tears himself in pieces by his lusts, ages only can make him one again. The madrepore shall become a shell, and the shell a fish, and the fish a bird, and the bird a beast, and then he shall become a man again, and see the glory of the latter days."

And I was a soft crab, under a stone on the sea shore. With infinite starvation, and struggling, and kicking, I had got rid of my armour, shield by shield, and joint by joint, and covered, naked and pitiable, in the dark, among dead shells and ooze. Suddenly the stone was turned up, and there was my cousin's hated face laughing at me, and pointing me out to Lillian. She laughed, too, as I looked up, sneaking, ashamed, and defenceless, and squirmed up at him with my soft useless claws. Why should she not laugh? Are not crabs, and toads, and monkeys, and a hundred other strange forms of animal life, jests of nature—embodiments of a divine humour, at which men are meant to laugh and be merry? But alas! my cousin, as he turned away, thrust the stone back with his foot, and squelched me flat.

And I was a remora, weak and helpless, till I could attach myself to some living thing, and then I had power to stop the largest ship. And Lillian was a flying-fish, and skimmed over the crests of the waves on gauzy wings. And my cousin was a huge shark, rushing after her, greedy and open-mouthed, and I saw her danger, and clung to him, and held him back; and just as I had stopped him, she turned and swam back into his open jaws.

Sand—sand—nothing but sand! The air was full of sand, drifting over granite temples, and painted kings and triumphs, and the skulls of a former world; and I was an ostrich, flying madly before the storm wind, and the giant sand pillars, which stalked across the plains, hunting me down. And Lillian was an Amazon queen, beautiful, and cold, and cruel, and she rode upon a charmed horse, and carried behind her on her saddle a spotted ounce, which was my comrade, and, when I came near her, she made him leap down and course me. And we ran for miles and for days through the interminable sand, till he sprung on me, and dragged me down. And as I lay quivering and dying, she reined in her horse above me, and looked down at me with beautiful, pitiless eyes; and a wild Arab tore the plumes from my wings, and she took them and wreathed them in her golden hair. The broad and blood-red sun sank down beneath the sand, and the horse, and the Amazon, and the ostrich plumes shone blood red in his lurid rays.

I was a mylodon among South American forests—a vast sleepy mass, my elephantine limbs and yard-long talons contrasting strangely with the little meek rabbit's head, furnished with a poor dozen of clumsy grinders, and a very small kernel of brains, whose highest consciousness was the enjoyment of muscular strength. Where I had picked up the sensation which my dreams realised for me, I know not my waking life, alas! had never given me experience of it. Has the mind power of creating sensations for itself? Surely it does so, in those delicious dreams about flying which haunt us poor wingless mortals, which would seem to give my namesake's philosophy the lie. However that may be, intense and new was the animal delight, to plant my hinder claws at some tree foot deep into the black rotting vegetable mould which steamed rich gases up wherever it was pierced, and clasp my huge arms round the stem of some palm or tree fern, and then slowly bring my enormous weight and muscle to bear upon it, till the stem bent like a withie, and the lace bark cracked, and the fibres groaned and shrank, and the roots sprung up out of the soil, and then, with a slow, circular wrench, the whole tree was twisted bodily out of the ground, and the maddening tension of my muscles suddenly relaxed, and I sank sleepily down upon the turf, to hrowse upon the crisp, cut foliage, and fall asleep in the glare of sunshine which streamed through the new gap in the green forest roof. Much as I had envied the strong, I had never before suspected the delight of mere physical exertion. I now understood the wild gambols of the dog, and the madness which makes the horse gallop and strain onwards till he drops and dies. They fulfil their nature, as I was doing, and in that is always happiness.

But I did more—whether from mere animal destructiveness, or from the spark of humanity which was slowly rekindling in me, I began to delight in tearing up trees, for its own sake. I tried my strength daily on thicker and thicker boles. I crawled up to the high palm-tops, and bowed them down by my weight. My path through the forest was marked, like that of a tornado, by snapped and prostrate stems, and withering branches. Had I been a few degrees more human, I might have expected a retribution for my sin. I had fractured my own skull three or four times already. I used often to pass the carcasses of my race, killed, as geologists now find them, by the fall of the trees they had overthrown, but still I went on, more and more reckless, a slave, like many a so-called man, to the mere sense of power.

One day I wandered to the margin of the woods, and climbing a tree, surveyed a prospect new to me. For miles and miles, away to the white line of the smoking Cordillera, stretched a low rolling plain; one vast thistle-head, the down of which flew in great gauzy clouds before a soft fitful breeze, innumerable inches flittered and pecked above it, and bent the countless flower-heads. Far away, one tall tree rose above the level thistle ocean. A strange longing seized me to go and tear it down. The forest leaves seemed tasteless, my stomach sickened at them, nothing but that tree would satisfy me, and descending, I slowly brushed my way, with half-shut eyes, through the tall thistles which buried even my bulk.

At last, after days of painful crawling, I dragged my unwieldiness to the tree-foot. Around it the plain was bare, and scored by burrows and heaps of earth, among which gold, some in dust, some in great knots and ingots, sparkled everywhere in the sun, in fearful contrast to the skulls and bones which lay bleaching round. Some were human, some were those of vast and monstrous beasts. I knew (one knows every thing in dreams) that they had been slain by the winged ants, as large as panthers, who snuffed and watched around over the magic treasure. Of them I felt no fear: and they seemed not to perceive me, as I crawled with greedy, hunger-sharpened eyes, up to the foot of the tree. It seemed miles in height. Its stem was bare and polished like a palm's, and above, a vast feathery crown of dark green velvet slept in the still sunlight. But wonders of wonders! from among the branches hung great sea-green lilies, and, nestled in the heart of each of them, the bust of a beautiful girl. Their white bosoms and shoulders gleamed rosy white against the emerald petals, like couch-shells half hidden among sea-weeds, while their delicate waists melted mysteriously into the central sanctuary of the flower. Their long arms and golden tresses waved languishingly downward in the breeze; their eyes glittered like diamonds, their breaths perfumed the air. A blind ecstasy seized me—I awoke again to humanity, and fiercely clasping the tree, shook and tore at it, in the blind hope of bringing nearer to me the magic beauties above. For I knew that I was in the famous land of Wak-Wak, from which the Eastern mercenaries used to pluck those flower-born beauties, and bring them home to fill the harems of the Indian kings. Suddenly I heard a rustling in the thistles behind me, and looking round, saw again that dreaded face—my cousin!

He was dressed—strange jumble that dreams are!—like an American backwoodsman. He carried the same revolver and bowie-knife which he had showed me the fatal night that he intruded on the Chartist club. I shook with terror, but he, too, did not see me. He threw himself on his knees, and began fiercely digging and scraping for the gold.

The winged ants rushed on him, but he looked up, and "held them with his glittering eye," and they shrank back abashed into the thistle covert, while I strained and tugged on, and the faces of the dryads above grew sadder and older, and their tears fell on me like a fragrant rain.

Suddenly the tree bole cracked—it was breaking. I looked round, and saw that my cousin knelt directly in the path of its fall. I tried to call to him to move; but how could a poor odentate like myself articulate a word? I tried to catch his attention by signs. He would not see. I tried convulsively to hold the tree up, but it was too late, a sudden gust of air swept by, and down it rushed, with a roar like a whirlwind, and leaving my cousin untouched, struck me full across the loins, broke my backbone, and pinned me to the ground in mortal agony. I heard one wild shriek rise from the flower fairies, as they fell each from the lily cup, no longer of full human size, but withered, shrivelled, diminished a thousandfold, and lay on the bare sand, like little rowy humming-birds' eggs, all crushed and dead. The great blue heaven above me spoke, and cried, "Selfish and sense bound! thou hast murdered beauty!"

The sighing thistle-ocean answered, and murmured, "Discontented! thou hast murdered beauty!"

One flower fairy alone lifted up her tiny cheek from the gold-strewn sand, and cried, "Presumptuous! thou hast murdered beauty!"

It was Lillian's face—Lillian's voice! My cousin heard it too, and turned eagerly, and as my eyes closed in the last death-shiver, I saw him coolly pick up the little beautiful figure, which looked like a fragment of some exquisite cameo, and deliberately put it away in his cigar case, as he said to himself, "A charming fit-bit for me when I return from the diggings!"

When I awoke again, I was a baby-ape in Borneo forests, perched among fragrant trailers and fantastic orchis flowers, and as I looked down, beneath the green roof, into the clear waters paved with unknown water-lilies on which the sun had never shone, I saw my face reflected in the pool—a melancholy, thoughtful countenance, with large projecting brow—it might have been a negro child's. And I felt stirring in me germs of a new and higher consciousness.—yearnings of love towards the mother ape, who fed me, and carried me from tree to tree. But I grew and grew, and then the weight of my destiny fell upon me. I saw year by year my brow recede, my neck enlarge, my jaw protrude, my teeth became tusks, skinny wattles grew from my cheeks—the animal faculties in me were swallowing up the intellectual. I watched in myself, with stupid self-disgust, the fearful degradation which goes on from youth to age in all the monkey race, especially in those which approach nearest to the human form. Long melancholy moping, fruitless strugglings to think, were periodically succeeded by wild furies, agonies of lust and aimless ferocity. I flew upon my brother apes, and was driven off with wounds. I rushed howling down into the village gardens, destroying everything I met. I caught the birds and insects, and tore them to pieces—a savage glee. One day, as I sat among the boughs, I saw Lillian coming along a flowery path—decked as Eve might have been the day she turned from Paradise. The skins of gorgeous birds were round her waist, her hair was wreathed with fragrant tropic flowers. On her bosom lay a baby—it was my cousin's. I knew her, and hated her. The madness came upon me. I lunged to leap from the bough and tear her limb from limb, but brutal terror, the dread of man which is the doom of beasts, kept me rooted to my place. Then my cousin came—a hunter missionary, and I heard him talk to her with pride of the new world of civilisation and Christianity which he was organising in that tropic wilderness. I listened with a dim, jealous understanding—not of the words, but of the facts. I saw them instinctively, as in a dream. She pointed up to me in terror and disgust, as I sat gnashing and gibbering overhead. He threw up the muzzle of his rifle carelessly, and fired—I fell dead, but conscious still. I knew that my carcase was carried to the settlement, and I watched while a smirking, chuckling surgeon dissected me, bone by bone, and nerve by nerve. And as he was fumbling at my heart, and discoursing sneeringly about Van Helmont's dreams of the Archæus, and the animal spirit which dwells within the solar plexus, Eleanor glided by again, like an angel, and drew my soul out of the knot of nerves, with one velvet finger-tip.

Child dreams—more vague and fragmentary than my animal ones, and yet more calm and simple, and gradually, as they led me onward through a new life, ripening into detail, coherence, and reflection. Dreams of a hut among the valleys of Thibet—the young of forest animals, wild cats, and dogs, and fowls, brought home to be my play mates, and grow up tame around me. Snow peaks which glittered white against the nightly sky, barring in the horizon of the narrow valley, and yet seeming to beckon upwards, outwards. Strange unspoken aspirations—instincts which pointed to unfulfilled powers, a mighty destiny. A sense, awful and yet cheering, of a wonder and a majesty, a presence, and a voice around, in the cliffs and the pine forests, and the great, blue, rainless heaven. The music of loving voices, the sacred names of child and father, mother, brother, sister, first of all inspirations. Had we not an All-Father, whose eyes looked down upon us from among those stars above, whose hand upheld the mountain roots below us? Did He not love us, too, even as we loved each other?

The noise of wheels crushing slowly through meadows of tall marigolds and astors, orchises, and fragrant lilies. I lay, a child, upon a woman's bosom. Was she my mother, or Eleanor, or Lillian? Or was she neither, and yet all—some ideal of the great Arian tribe, containing in herself all future types of European women? So I slept and woke, and slept again, day after day, week after week, in the lazy bullock waggon, among herds of grey cattle, guarded by huge loped mastiffs, among shaggy, white-haired, heavy-horned sheep, and silky goats, among tall, bare-limbed men, with stone axes on their shoulders, and horn hews at their backs. Westward, through the boundless steppes, whither or why we knew not, but that the All-Father had sent us forth. And behind us the rosy snow peaks died into ghastly grey, lower and lower, as every evening came, and before us the plains spread infinite, with gleaming salt lakes, and ever fresh tribes of gaudy flowers. Behind us dark lines of living beings streamed down the mountain slopes, around us dark lines crawled along the plains—all westward, westward ever, the tribes of the Holy Mountain poured out like water to replenish the earth and subdue it—lava streams from the crater of that great soul volcano,—Titan halues, dumb angels of God, bearing with them, in the unconscious progeny, the law, the freedom, the science, the poetry, the Christianity of Europe and the world.

Westward ever—who could stand against us? We met the wild asses on the steppe, and tamed them, and made them our slaves. We slew the bison herds, and swam broad rivers on their skins. The Python snake lay across our path, the wolves and the wild dogs snarled at us out of their coverts, we slew them and went on. The forest rose in black tangled barriers, we hewed on way through them and went on. Strange giant tribes met us, and eagle visaged hordes, fierce and foolish, we smote them hip and thigh, and went on, westward ever. Days, and weeks, and months rolled on, and our wheels rolled on with them. New alps rose up before us, we climbed and climbed them, till, in lonely glens, the mountain walls stood up, and barred our path.

Then one arose and said, "Rocks are strong, but the All-Father is stronger. Let us pray to Him to send the earthquakes, and blast the mountains asunder."

So we sat down and prayed, but the earthquake did not come.

Then another arose and said, "Rocks are strong but the All-Father is stronger. If we are the children of the All-Father, we, too, are stronger than the rocks. Let us portion out the valley, to every man an equal plot of ground, and bring out the sacred seeds, and sow, and build, and come up with me and bore the mountain."

And all said, "It is the voice of God. We will go up with thee, and bore the mountain, and thou shalt be our king, for thou art wisest, and the spirit of the All-Father is on thee, and whosoever will not go up with thee shall die as a coward and an idler."

So we went up, and in the morning we bored the mountain, and at night we came down and tilled the ground, and sowed wheat and barley, and planted orchards. And in the upper glens, we met the mining dwarfs, and saw their tools of iron and copper, and then tack houses and forges, and cured them. But they would give us none of them. Then our king said,—

"The All-Father has given all things and all wisdom. We to him who keeps them to himself, we will teach you to sow the sacred seeds, and do you teach us your smith-work, or you die."

Then the dwarfs taught us smith work; and we loved them, for they were wise, and they married our sons and daughters, and we went on boring the mountain.

Then some of us arose and said, "We are stronger than our brethren, and can till ground than they. Give us a greater portion of land, to each according to his power."

But the king said, "Wherefore? that ye may eat and drink more than your brethren? Have you larger stomachs as well as stronger arms? As much as a man needs for himself, that he may do for himself. The rest is the gift of the All-Father, and we must do his work therewith. For the sake of the women and the children, for the sake of the sick and the aged, let him that is stronger go up and work the harder at the mountain." And all men said, "It is well spoken."

So we were all equals—for none took more than he needed, and we were all free, because we loved to obey the king by whom the spirit spoke, and we were all brothers, because we had one work, and one hope, and one All-Father.

But I grew up to be a man, and twenty years were past, and the mountain was not bored through; and the king grew old, and men began to love their flocks and herds better than quarrying, and they gave up boring through the mountain. And the strong and the cunning said, "What can we do with all this might of ours?" So because they had no other way of employing it, they turned it against each other, and swallowed up the heritage of the weak, and a few grew rich, and many poor; and the valley was filled with sorrow, for the land became too narrow for them.

Then I arose and said, "How is this?" And they said, "We must make provision for our children."

And I answered, "The All-Father meant neither you nor your children to devour your brethren. Why do you not break up more waste ground? Why do you not try to grow more corn in your fields?"

And they answered, "We till the ground as our forefathers did: we will keep to the old traditions."

And I answered, "O ye hypocrites! have ye not forgotten the old traditions, that each man should have his equal share of ground, and that we should go on working at the mountain, for the sake of the weak and the children, the fatherless and the widow?"

And they answered nought for a while.

Then one said, "Are we not better off as we are? We buy the poor man's ground for a price, and we pay him his wages for tilling it for us—and we know better how to manage it than he."

And I said, "O ye hypocrites! See how your lie works! Those who were free are now slaves. Those who had peace of mind are now anxious from day to day for their daily bread. And the multitude gets poorer and poorer, while ye grow fatter and fatter. If ye had gone on boring the mountain, ye would have had no time to eat up your brethren."

Then they laughed and said, "Thou art a singer of songs, and a dreamer of dreams. Let those who want to get through the mountain go up and bore it, we are well enough here. Come now, sing us pleasant songs, and talk no more foolish dreams, and we will reward thee."

Then they brought out a veiled maiden, and said, "Look! her feet are like ivory, and her hair like threads of gold, and she is the sweetest singer in the whole valley. And she shall be thine, if thou wilt be like other people, and prophesy smooth things unto us, and torment us no more with talk about liberty, equality, and brotherhood, for they never were, and never will be, on this earth. Living is too hard work to give in to such fancies."

And when the maiden's veil was lifted, it was Lillian. And she clasped me round the neck, and cried, "Come! I will be your bride, and you shall be rich and powerful; and all men shall speak well of you, and you shall write songs, and we will sing them together, and feast and play from dawn to dawn."

And I wept, and turned me about, and cried, "Wife and child, song and wealth, are pleasant, but blessed is the work which the All-Father has given the people to do. Let the maimed and the halt and the blind, the needy and the fatherless, come up after me, and we will bore the mountain."

But the rich drove me out, and drove back those who would have followed me. So I went up by myself, and bored the mountain seven years, weeping; and every year Lillian came to me, and said, "Come, and be my husband, for my beauty is fading, and youth passes fast away." But I set my heart steadfastly to the work.

And when seven years were over, the poor were so multiplied, that the rich had not wherewith to pay their labour. And there came a famine in the land, and many of the poor died. Then the rich said, "If we let these men starve, they will turn on us, and kill us, for hunger has no conscience, and they are all but like the beasts that perish." So they all brought, one a bullock, another a sack of meal, each according to his substance, and fed the poor therewith; and said to them, "Behold our love and mercy towards you!" But the more they gave, the less they had wherewithal to pay their labourers, and the more they gave, the less the poor liked to work, so that at last they had not wherewithal to pay for tilling the ground, and each man had to go and till his own, and knew not how, so the land lay waste, and there was great perplexity.

Then I went down to them and said, "If you had hearkened to me, and not rubbed your brethren of their land, you would never have come into this strait, for by this time the mountain would have been bored through."

Then they cursed the mountain, and me, and Him who made them, and came down to my cottage at night, and cried, "One siled and left handed! father of confusion, and disciple of dead donkeys, see to what thou hast brought the land, with thy blasphemous doctrines! Here we are starving, and not only we, but the poor misguided victims of thy abominable notions!"

"You have become wondrous pitiful to the poor," said I, "since you found that they would not starve that you might wanton."

Then once more Lillian came to me, thin, and pale, and worn. "See, I, too, am starving! and you have been the cause of it; but I will forgive all if you will help us but this once."

"How shall I help you?"

"You are a poet and an orator, and win over all hearts with your talk and your songs. Go down to the tribes of the plain, and persuade them to send us up warriors, that we may put down these riotous and idle wretches; and you shall be king of all the land, and I will be your slave, by day and night."

But I went out, and quarried steadfastly at the mountain.

And when I came back the next evening, the poor had risen against the rich, one and all, crying, "As you have done to us, so will we do to you," and they hunted them down like wild beasts, and slew many of them, and threw their carcasses on the dunghill, and took possession of their land and houses, and cried, "We will be all free and equal as our forefathers were, and live here, and eat and drink, and take our pleasure."

"Then I ran out, and cried to them, 'Fools! will ye do as these rich did, and neglect the work of God? If you do to them as they have done to you, you will sin as they sinned, and devour each other at the last, as they devoured you. The old path is the best. Let each man, rich or poor, have his equal share of the land, as it was at first, and go up and dig through the mountain, and possess the good land beyond, where no man need jostle his neighbour, or rob him, when the land becomes too small for you. Were the rich only in fault? Did not you, too, neglect the work which the All-Father had given you, and run every man after his own comfort? No you entered into a he, and by your own sin raised up the rich men to be your punishment. For the last time, who will go up with me to the mountain?'"

Then they all cried with one voice, "We have sinned! We will go up and pierce the mountain, and fulfil the work which God set to our forefathers."

We went up, and the first stroke that I struck, a crack fell out, and behold, the light of day! and far below us the good land and large, stretching away boundless towards the western sun.

I sat by the cave's mouth at the dawning of the day. Past me the tribe poured down, young and old, with their waggons, and their cattle, their seeds, and their arms, as of old yet not as of old—wiser and stronger, taught by long labour and sore affliction. Downward they streamed from the cave's mouth into the glens, following the guidance of the silver water-courses, and as they passed me, each kissed my hands and feet, and cried, "Thou hast saved us—thou hast given up all for us. Come and be our king!"

"Nay," I said, "I have been your king this many a year; for I have been the servant of you all."

I went down with them into the plain, and called them round me. Many times they besought me to go with them and lead them.

"No," I said, "I am old and grey-headed, and I am not as I have been. Choose out the wisest and most righteous among you and let him lead you. But bind him to yourselves with an oath, that whenever he shall say to you, 'Stay here, and let us sit down and build, and dwell here forever, you shall cast him out of his office, and make him a hewer of wood and a drawer of water, and choose one who will lead you forward in the spirit of God."

The crowd opened, and a woman came forward into the circle. Her face was veiled, but we all knew her for a prophetess. Slowly she stepped into the midst, chanting a mystic song. Whether it spoke of past, present, or future, we knew not; but it sank deep into all our hearts.

"True freedom stands in meekness—
True strength in utter weakness—
Justice in forgiveness lies—
Riches in self-sacrifice—
Own no rank but God's own spirit—
Whom rule!—and worth inherit!
Work for all, and all employ—
Share with all, and all enjoy—
God alike to all has given,
Heaven as Earth, and Earth as Heaven,
When the land shall find her king again,
And the reign of God be come."

We all listened, awe-struck. She turned to us and continued,—

"Harken to me, children of Japhet, the unresting!"

"On the holy mountain of Paradise in the Asgard of the Hindoo-Koh, in the cup of the four rivers, in the womb of the mother of nations, in brotherhood, equality, and freedom, the sons of men were begotten, at the wedding of the heaven and the earth. Mighty infants, you did the right you knew not of, and sinned not, because there was no temptation. By selfishness you fell, and became beasts of prey. Each man coveted the universe for his own lusts, and not that he might fulfil in it God's command to people and subdue it. Long have you wandered—and long will you wander still. For here you have no abiding city. You shall build cities, and they shall crumble; you shall invent forms of society and religion, and they shall fail in the hour of need. You shall call the lands by your own names, and fresh waves of men shall sweep you forth, westward, westward ever, till you have travelled round the path of the sun, to the place from whence you came. For out of Paradise you went, and into Paradise you shall return, you shall become once more as little children, and renew your youth like the eagle's. Feature by feature, and limb by limb ye shall renew it, ago after ago, gradually and painfully, by hunger and pestilence, by superstitions and tyranny, by need and blank despair, shall you be driven back to the All-Father's home, till you become as you were before you fell and left the likeness of your father for the likeness of the beasts. Out of Paradise you came, from liberty, equality, and brotherhood, and unto them you shall return again. You went forth in unconscious infancy—you shall return in thoughtful manhood. You went forth in ignorance and need—you shall return in science and wealth, philosophy and art. You went forth with the world a wilderness before you—you shall return when it is a garden behind you. You went forth selfish savages—you shall return as the brothers of the Son of God.

"And for you," she said, looking on me, "your penance is accomplished. You have learned what it is to be a man. You have lost your life and saved it. He that gives up house, or land, or wife, or child, for God's sake, it shall be repaid him an hundredfold 'twake!"

Surely I knew that voice! She lifted her veil. The face was Lillian's! No!—Eleanor's!

Gently she touched my hand—I sank down into soft, weary, happy sleep.

The spell was snapped. My fever and my dreams faded away together, and I woke to the twittering of the sparrows, and the scent of the poplar leaves, and the sights and sounds of my childhood, and found Eleanor and her uncle sitting by my bed, and with them Crossthwaite's little wife.

I would have spoken, but Eleanor laid her finger on her lips, and taking her uncle's arm, glided from the room. Katie kept stubbornly a smiling silence, and I was fain to obey my new-found guardian angels.

What need of many words? Slowly, and with relapses into insensibility, I passed, like one who recovers from drowning, through the painful gate of birth into another life. The fury of passion had been replaced by a delicious weakness. The thunder-clouds had passed roaring down the wind, and the calm, bright, holy evening was come. My heart, like a fiefid child had stamped and wept itself to sleep. I was past even gratitude; infinite submission and humility, feelings too long forgotten, absorbed my whole being. Only, I never dreamed meet Eleanor's eye. Her voice was like an angel's when she spoke to me—friend, mother, sister, all in one. But I had a dim recollection of being unjust to her—of some bar between us.

Katie and Crossthwaite, as they sat by me, tender and careful nurses both, told me, in time, that to Eleanor I owed all my comforts. I could not thank her—the debt was infinite, inexplicable. I felt as if I must speak all my heart or none, and I watched her lavish kindness with a sort of sleepy, passive wonder, like a new-born babe.

At last, one day, my kind nurses allowed me to speak a little. I broached to Crossthwaite the subject which filled my thoughts. "How came I here? How came you here? and Lady Ellerton? What is the meaning of it all?"

"The meaning is, that Lady Ellerton, as they call her, is an angel out of heaven. Ah, Alton! she was your true friend, after all, if you had but known it, and not that other one at all."

I turned my head away.

"What!—how! then, Johnny darling!

and don't go tormenting the poor dear soul, just when he's comin' round again."

"No, no! tell me all. I must—I ought—I deserve to hear it. How did she come here?"

"Why, then, it's my belief, she had her eye on you ever since you came out of that Bastille, and before that, too, and she found you out at Mackaye's, and me with you, for I was there looking after you. If it hadn't been for your illness, I'd have been in Texas now, with our friends, for all's up with the Charter, and the country's too hot, at least for me. I'm sick of the whole thing together, patriots, aristocrats, and everybody else, except this blessed angel. And I've got a couple of hundred to emigrate with; and what's more, so have you."

"How's that?"

"Why, when poor dear old Mackaye's will was read, and you raving mad in the next room, he had left all his stock-in-trade, that was, the books, to some of our friends, to form a workman's library with, and £400 he'd saved, to be parted between you and me, on condition that we'd G.T.T., and cool down across the Atlantic, for seven years come the tenth of April."

So, then, by the lasting love of my adopted father, I was at present at least out of the reach of want! My heart was ready to overflow at my eyes, but I could not rest till I had heard more of Lady Ellerton. What brought her here, to nurse me as if she had been a sister?

"Why, then, she lives not far off by. When her husband died, his cousin got the estate and title, and so she came, Katie tells me, and lived for one year down somewhere in the East End among the needlewomen, and spent her whole fortune on the poor, and never kept a servant, so they say, but made her own bed and cooked her own dinner, and got her bread with her own needle, to see what it was really like. And she learnt a lesson there. I can tell you, and God bless her for it. For now she's got a large house hereby, with fifty or more in it, all at work together, sharing the earnings among themselves, and putting into their own pockets the profits which would have gone to their tyrants, and she keeps the accounts for them, and gets the goods sold, and manages everything, and reads to them while they work, and teaches them every day."

"And takes her victuals with them," said Katie, "share and share alike. She that was so grand a lady, to demean herself to the poor unfortunate young things! She's as blessed a saint as any a one in the Calendar, if they'll forgive me for saying so."

"Ay! demeaning, indeed! for the best of it is, they're not the respectable ones only, though she spends hundreds on them—"

"And sure, haven't I seen it with my own eyes, when I've been there charing?"

"Ay, but those she lives with are the fallen and the lost ones—those that the rich would not set up in business, or help them to emigrate, or lift them out of the gutter with a pair of tongs, for fear they should stain their own whitewash in handling them."

"And sure they're as decent as me self now, tho' poor darlings! It was misery driv' em to it, everyone, perhaps it might hav' driv' me the same way if I'd a lot o' childer, and Johnny gone to glory—and the blessed saints save him from that same at all, at all!"

"What! from going to glory?" said John.

"Och, thin, and wouldn't I just go mad if ever such ill luck happened to yees as to be taken to heaven in the prime of your days, asthore?"

And she began sobbing, and hugging, and kissing the little man, and then suddenly recollecting herself, scolded him heartily for making such a "whillybaloo," and thrust him out of my room, to recommence kissing him in the next, leaving me to many meditations.

CHAPTER XXXVII

THE TRUE DEMAGOGUE

I USED to try to arrange my thoughts, but could not, the past seemed swept away and buried, like the wreck of some drowned land after a flood. Plunged by affliction to the core, my heart lay fallow for every seed that fell. Elcanor understood me, and gently and gradually, beneath her skilful hand, the chins began again to bloom with verdure. She and Crossthwaite used to sit and read to me—from the Bible, from poets, from every book which could suggest soothing, graceful, or hopeful fancies. Now, out of the stillness of the darkened chamber, one or two pithless sentences of a Keats, or a spirit-stirring Hebrew psalm, would fall upon my ear and then there was silence again, and I was left to brood over the words in vacancy, till they became a fibre of my own soul's core. Again and again the stories of Lazarus and the Magdalene alternated with Milton's Penseroso, or with Wordsworth's tenderest and most solemn strains. Exquisite prints from the history of our Lord's life and death were hung one by one, each for a few days, opposite my bed, where they might catch my eye the moment that I woke, the moment before I fell asleep. I heard one day the good dean remonstrating with her on the "sentimentalism" of her mode of treatment.

"Poor drowned butterfly!" she answered, smiling, "he must be fed with honey dew. Have I not surely had practice enough already?"

"Yes, angel that you are!" answered the old man. "You have indeed had practice enough!" and lifting her hand reverentially to his lips, he turned and left the room.

She sat down by me as I lay, and began to read from Tennyson's Lotus-Eaters. But it was not reading—it was rather a soft dreamy chant, which rose and fell like the waves of sound on an Aeolian harp.

Than first eyelids upon birds' eyes,
Music that brings sweet sleep down from the high ful skies
Here the cool moon's peep,
And though the moon the lava creeps,
And in the stream the long leaved flowers weep,
And from the crazy ledge the poppy hangs, in sleep

Why are we weighed upon with heaviness,
And utterly consumed with sharp distress
While all things else have rest from weariness?
All things have rest—why should we toil alone?
We only toil, who are the first of things,
And make perpetual moan,
Still from one sorrow to another thrown
Nor ever fold our wings,
And cease from wandering
Nor sleep our brows in slumber a holy balm,
Nor mark what the inner spirit sings
"There is no joy but calm!"

Why should we only toil, the roof and crown of things?"

She paused.

"My soul was an enchanted boat
Which, like a sleeping swan, did float
Upon the silver waves of her sweet singing."

Half unconscious, I looked up. Before me hung a copy of Rallalle's cartoon of the Miraculous Draught of Fishes. As my eye wandered over it, it seemed to blend into harmony with the feelings which the poem had stirred. I seemed to float upon the glassy lake. I watched the vista of the waters and mountains, receding into the dreamy infinite of the still summer sky. Softly from distant shores came the hum of eager multitudes; towers and palaces slept quietly beneath the eastern sun. In front, fantastic fishes, and the birds of the mountain and the lake, confessed His power, who sat there in His calm godlike beauty, His eye ranging over all that still infinity of His own works, over all that wondrous line of figures, which seemed to express every gradation of spiritual consciousness, from the dark self-condemned dislike of Judas's averted and wily face, through mere animal greediness, to the first dawns of surprise, and on to the manly awe and gratitude of Andrew's majestic figure, and the self-aborrent humility of Peter, as he sank down into the bottom of the skiff, and with convulsive palms and bursting brow, seemed to press out from his inmost heart the words, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord!" Truly, pictures are the books of the unlearned, and of the mislearned too, Glorious Raffaele! Shakespeare of the south! Mighty preacher, to whose blessed intuition it was given to know all human hearts, to embody in form and colour all spiritual truths, common alike to Protestant and Papist, to workman and to sage. Oh that I may meet thee before the throne of God, if it be but to thank thee for that one picture, in which thou didst reveal to me, in a single glance, every step of my own spiritual history!

She seemed to follow my eyes, and guess from them the workings of my heart; for now, in a low, half abstracted voice, as Diotima may have talked of old, she began to speak of rest and labour, of death and life, of a labour which is perfect rest—of a daily death, which is but daily birth—of weakness, which is the strength of God, and so she wandered on in her speech to Him who died for us. And gradually she turned to me. She laid one finger solemnly on my listless palm, as her words and voice became more intense, more personal. She talked of Him, as Mary may have talked just risen from His feet. She spoke of Him as I had never heard Him spoken of before—with a tender passionate loyalty, kept down and softened by the deepest awe. The sense of her intense belief, shining out in every lineament of her face, carried conviction to my heart more than ten thousand arguments could do. It must be true! Was not the power of it around her like a glory! She spoke of Him as near us—watching us—in words of such vivid eloquence that I turned half startled to her, as if I expected to see Him standing by her side.

She spoke of Him as the great Reformer; and yet as the true conservative, the inspirer of all new truths, revealing in His Bible to every age abysses of new wisdom, as the times require, and yet the vindicator of all which is ancient and eternal—the justifier of His own dealings with man from the beginning. She spoke of Him as the true demagogue—the champion of the poor, and yet as the true King, above and below all earthly rank, on whose will alone all real superiority of man to man, all the time-justified and time-honoured usages of the family, the society, the nation, stand and shall stand forever.

And then she changed her tone, and in a voice of infinite tenderness, she spoke of Him as the Creator, the Word, the Inspirer, the only perfect Artist, the Fountain of all Genus.

She made me feel—would that His ministers had made me feel it before, since they say that they believe it—that He had passed victorious through my vilest temptations, that He sympathised with my every struggle.

She told me how He, in the first dawn of manhood, full of the dim consciousness of

His own power, full of strange yearning presentiments about His own sad and glorious destiny, went up into the wilderness, as every youth, above all every genius, must, there to be tempted of the devil. She told how alone with the wild beasts, and the brute powers of nature, He saw into the open secret—the mystery of man's twofold life, His kingship over earth, His sonship under God—and conquered in the might of His knowledge. How He was tempted, like every genius, to use His creative powers for selfish ends—to yield to the lust of display and singularity, and break through those laws which He came to reveal and to fulfil—to do one little act of evil, that He might secure thereby the harvest of good which was the object of His life and how he had conquered in the faith that He was the son of God. She told me how He had borne the sorrows of genius, how the slightest pang that I had ever felt was but a dim, faint pattern of His, how He, above all men, had felt the agony of calumny, misconception, misinterpretation; how He had fought with bigotry and stupidity, casting His pearls before swine, knowing full well what it was to speak to the deaf and the blind, how He had wept over Jerusalem, in the bitterness of disappointed patriotism, when He had tried in vain to awaken within a nation of slavish and yet rebellious bigots, the consciousness of their glorious calling.

It was too much! I hid my face in the covert, and burst out into a long, low, and yet most happy weeping. She rose and went to the window and beckoned Katie from the room within.

"I am afraid," she said, "my conversation has been too much for him."

"Showers sweeten the air," said Katie, and truly enough, as my own lightened brain told me.

Eleanor—for so I must call her now—stood watching me for a few minutes, and then glided back to the bedside, and sat down again.

"You find the room quiet?"

"Wonderfully quiet. The roar of the city outside is almost ceasing, and the noise of every carriage seems to cease suddenly, just as it becomes painfully near."

"We have had straw laid down," she answered, "all along this part of the street."

This last drop of kindness filled the cup to overflowing: a veil fell from before my eyes—it was she who had been my friend, my guardian angel, from the beginning!

"You—you—idiot that I have been! I see it all now. It was you who laid that paper to catch my eye on that first evening at D*—you paid my debt to my cousin!—you visited Mackaye in his last illness!"

She made a sign of assent.

"You saw from the beginning my danger, my weakness—you tried to turn me from my frantic and fruitless passion—you tried to save me from the very gulf into which I forced myself—and I—I have hated you in return—cherished suspicious too ridiculous to confess, only equalled by the absurdity of that other dream!”

“Would that other dream have ever given you peace, even if it had ever become reality?”

She spoke gently, slowly, seriously, waiting between each question for the answer which I dared not give.

“What was it that you adored?—a soul or a face? The inward reality, or the outward symbol, which is only valuable as a sacrament of the loveliness within?”

“Ay!” thought I, “and was that loveliness within? What was that beauty but a hollow mask?” How barren, borrowed, trivial, every thought and word of hers seemed now as I looked back upon them, in comparison with the rich luxuriance, the startling originality, of thought, and deed, and sympathy, in her who now sat by me, wan and faded, beautiful no more as men call beauty, but with the spirit of an archangel gazing from those clear, fiery eyes! And as I looked at her, an emotion utterly new to me arose; utter trust, delight, submission, gratitude, awe—if it was love, it was love as of a dog towards his master.

“Ay,” I murmured, half unconsciously that I spoke aloud, “her I loved, and love no longer, but you, you, I worship, and forever!”

“Worship God!” she answered. “If it shall please you hereafter to call me friend, I shall refuse neither the name nor its duties. But remember always, that whatsoever interest I feel in you, and, indeed, have felt from the first time I saw your poems, I cannot give or accept friendship upon any ground so shallow and changeable as personal preference. The time was, when I thought it a mark of superior intellect and refinement to be as exclusive in my friendships as in my theories. Now I have learnt that that is most spiritual and noble which is also most universal. If we are to call each other friends, it must be for a reason which equally includes the outcast and the prodigal, the felon and the slave.”

“What do you mean?” I asked, half disappointed.

“Only for the sake of Him who died for all like.”

Why did she rise and call Cresswaine from the next room where he was writing? Was it from the womanly tact and delicacy which feared lest my excited feelings might lead me on to some too daring expression, and give me the pain of a rebuff, however gentle; or was it that she wished him, as well as me, to hear the memorable words which followed, to which she seemed to have been all along alluring me, and calling up in my mind, one by one, the very questions to which she had prepared the answers?

“That name!” I answered. “Alas! has it not been in every age the watchword, not of an all-embracing charity, but of self-interest and hugotry, excommunication and persecution?”

“That is what men have made it, not God, or He who bears it, the Son of God. Yes, men have separated from each other, slandered each other, murdered each other in that name, and blasphemed it by that very act. But when did they unite in any name but that? Look all history through—from the early churches, unconscious and infantile ideas of God’s kingdom, as Eden was of the human race, when love alone was law, and none said that aught that he possessed was his own, but they had all things in common—whose name was the bond of unity for that brotherhood, such as the earth had never seen—when the Roman lady and the negro slave partook together at the table of the same bread and wine, and sat together at the feet of the Syrian tent-maker? ‘One is our Master, even Christ, who sits at the right hand of God, and in Him we are all brothers.’ Not self-chosen preference for His precepts, but the overwhelming faith in His presence, His rule, His love, bound those rich hearts together. Look onward, too, at the first followers of St. Bennet and St. Francis, at the Cameronians among their Scottish hills, or the little persecuted flock who, in a dark and godless time, gathered around John Wesley by path-moors and on Cornish cliffs—Look, too, at the great societies of our own days, which, however imperfectly, still lovingly and earnestly do their measure of God’s work at home and abroad, and say, when was there ever real union, co-operation, philanthropy, equality, brotherhood, among men, save in loyalty to Him—Jesus, who died upon the cross?”

And she bowed her head reverently before that unseen Majesty, and then looked up at us again. Those eyes, now brimming full of earnest tears, would have melted stonier hearts than ours that day.

“Do you not believe me? Then I must quote against you one of your own prophets—a ruined angel—even as you might have been.”

“When Camille Desmoulins, the revolutionary, about to die, as is the fate of such, by the hands of revolutionaries, was asked his age, he answered, they say, that it was the same as that of the ‘bon sans-culotte Jesus.’ I do not blame those who shrink from that speech as blasphemous. I, too, have spoken hasty words and hard, and prided myself on breaking the bruised reed, and quenching the smoking flax. Time was, when I should have been the loudest in denouncing poor Camille, but I have long since seemed to see in those words the distortion of an almighty truth—a truth that shall shake thrones, and principalities, and powers, and fill the earth with its sound, as with the trump of God, a prophecy like

Balaam's of old,—'I shall see Him, but not nigh, I shall behold Him, but not near.'

"Take all the heroes, prophets, poets, philosophers—where will you find the true demagogue—the speaker to man simply as man—the friend of publicans and sinners, the stern foe of the scribe and the Pharisee—with whom was no respect of persons—where is he? Socrates and Plato were noble, Zoroaster and Confucius, for aught we know, were nobler still; but what were they but the exclusive mystagogues of an enlightened few, like our own Emersons and Strausses, to compare great with small? What gospel have they, or Strauss, or Emerson, for the poor, the suffering, the oppressed? The People's Friend? Where will you find him, but in Jesus of Nazareth?"

"We feel that, I assure you, we feel that," said Crosswhite. "There are thousands of us who delight in His moral teaching, as the perfection of human excellence."

"And what gospel is there in a moral teaching? What good news is it to the savage of St. Giles's, to the artisan, crushed by the competition of others and his own evil habits, to tell him that he can be free—if he can make himself free? That all men are his equals if he can rise to their level, or pull them down to his?—All men his brothers—if he can only stop them from devouring him, or making it necessary for him to devour them? Liberty, equality, and brotherhood? Let the history of every nation, of every revolution let your own sad experience, speak—have they been aught as yet but delusive phantoms—angels that turned to fiends the moment you seemed about to clasp them? Remember the tenth of April, and the plots thereof, and answer your own hearts."

Crosswhite buried his face in his hands.

"What?" answered passionately, "will you rob us poor creatures of our only faith, our only hope, on earth? Let us be deceived and deceived again, yet we will believe. We will hope on in spite of hope. We may die, but the idea lives forever. Liberty, equality, and fraternity must come. We know, we know, that they must come; and woe to those who seek to rob us of our faith!"

"Keep, keep your faith," she cried, "for it is not yours, but God's, who gave it! But do not seek to realise that idea for yourselves."

"Why, then, in the name of reason and mercy?"

"Because it is realised already for you. You are free; God has made you free. You are equals—you are brothers, for He is your King, who is no respecter of persons. He is your King, who has bought for you the rights of sons of God. He is your King, to whom all powers given in heaven and earth, who reigns, and will reign, till He has put all enemies under His feet. That was Luther's charter—with that alone he freed half Europe. That is your charter, and mine; the everlasting ground of our rights, our rights, our duties, of ever gathering storm for the oppressor, of ever brightening sunshine for the oppressed. Own no other. Claim your investiture as free men from none but God. His will, His love, is a stronger ground, surely, than abstract rights and ethnological opinions. Abstract rights? What ground, what root have they, but the ever changing opinions of men, born anew and dying anew with each fresh generation?—while the word of God stands sure—"You are mine, and I am yours, bound to you in an everlasting covenant."

"Abstract rights? They are sure to end, in practice, only in the tyranny of their further opinion. In favoured England here, the notions of abstract right among the many are not so incorrect, thanks to three centuries of Protestant civilization, but only because the right notions suit the many at this moment. But in America, even now, the same ideas of abstract right do not interfere with the tyranny of the white man over the black. Why should they? The white man is handsomer, stronger, cunninger, worthier than the black. The black is more like an ape than the white man. He is—the fact is there, and no notions of an abstract right will put that down. Nothing but another fact is mightier, more universal fact—Jesus of Nazareth died for the negro as well as for the white. Looked at apart from Him, each race, each individual of mankind, stands separate and alone owing no more brotherhood to each other than wolf to wolf, or pike to pike—himself a mightier beast of prey—even as he has proved himself in every age. Looked at as he is, as joined into one family in Christ, his archetype and head, even the most frantic declamations of the French democrat, about the majesty of the people, the divinity of mankind, become rational, reverent, and literal. God's grace outwits all man's boasting—"I have said, ye are gods, and ye are all the children of the most highest;"—"children of God, members of Christ, of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones,"—kings and priests to God,—free inheritors of the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of prudence and courage, of reverence and love, the spirit of Him who has said, 'Behold, the days come, when I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh, and no one shall teach his brother, saying, know the Lord, for all shall know Him, from the least even unto the greatest. Ay, even on the slaves and on the handmaiden in those days will I pour out of my spirit, saith the Lord!'"

"And that is really in the Bible?" asked Crosswhite.

"Ay," she went on, her figure dilating, and her eyes flashing, like an inspired prophetess—"that is in the Bible! What would you more than that? That is your charter; the only ground of all charters. You, like all mankind, have had dim inspirations, confused yearnings after your future destiny, and, like all the world from the beginning, you have tried to realise, by self-willed methods of your own, what you can only do by God's inspiration, by God's method. Like the builders of Babel in old time, you have said, 'Go to, let us build us a city and a tower, whose top shall reach to heaven' and God has confounded you as He did them. By mistrust, division, passion, and folly, you are scattered abroad. Even in those last few days, the last drops of your late plot have exploded miserably and ludicrously—your late companions are in prison, and the name of Chartist is a laughing stock as well as an abomination.

"Good heavens! Is this true?" asked I, looking at Crossthwaite for confirmation.

"Too true, dear boy, too true. And if it had not been for these two angels here, I should have been in Newgate now!"

"Yes," she went on. "The Charter seems dead, and liberty further off than ever."

"That seems true enough, indeed," said I, bitterly.

"Yes. But it is because Liberty is God's beloved child, that He will not have her purity sullied by the touch of the profane. Because He loves the people, He will allow none but Himself to lead the people. Because He loves the people, He will teach the people by afflictions. And even now, while all this madness has been destroying itself, He has been hiding you in His secret place from the strife of tongues, that you may have to look for a state founded on better things than nets of Parliament, social contracts, and abstract rights—a city whose foundations are in the eternal promises, whose builder and maker is God."

She paused—"Go on, go on," cried Crossthwaite and I in the same breath.

"That state, that city, Jesus said, was come was now within us, hid we eyes to see. And it is come. Call it the Church, the Gospel, civilisation, freedom, democracy, association, what you will—I shall call it by the name by which my Master spoke of it—the name which includes all these and more than these—the kingdom of God. 'Without observation,' as he promised, secretly, but mightily, it has been growing, spreading, since that first Whiteacre, civilising, humanising, uniting this distracted earth. Men have fancied they found it in this system or in that, and in them only. They have cried in its own name, when they found it too wide for their own narrow notions. They have cried, 'Lo here!' and 'Lo there!' 'To this communion!' or 'To that set of opinions!' But it has gone its way—the way of Him who made all things, and redeemed all things to Himself. In every age it has been a gospel to the poor. In every age it has, sooner or later, claimed the steps of civilisation, the discoveries of science, as God's inspirations, not man's inventions. In every age, it has taught men to do that by God which they had failed in doing without Him. It is now ready, if we may judge by the signs of the times, once again to penitente, to convert, to reorganise, the political and social life of England, perhaps of the world, to vindicate democracy as the will and gift of God. Take it for the ground of your rights. If, henceforth, you claim political enfranchisement, claim it not as mere men, who may be villains, savages, animals, slaves of their own prejudices and passions, but as members of Christ, children of God, inheritors of the kingdom of heaven, and therefore bound to realise it on earth. All other rights are mere rights—mere selfish demands to become tyrants in your turn. If you wish to justify your Charter, do it on that ground. Claim your share in national life, only because the nation is a spiritual body, whose king is the Son of God; whose work, whose national character and powers, are allotted to it by the Spirit of Christ. Claim universal suffrage, only on the ground of the universal redemption of mankind—the universal priesthood of Christians. That argument will conquer, when all have failed, for God will make it conquer. Claim the disfranchisement of every man, rich or poor, who breaks the laws of God and man, not merely because he is an obstacle to you, but because he is a traitor to your common king in heaven, and to the spiritual kingdom of which he is a citizen. Denounce the idle idol of property qualification, not because it happens to strengthen class interests against you, but because, as your mystic dream reminded you, and, therefore, as you knew long ago, there is no real rank, no real power, but worth, and worth consists not in property, but in the grace of God. Claim, if you will, annual Parliaments, as a means of enforcing the responsibility of rulers to the Christian community, of which they are to be, not the lords, but the ministers—the servants of all. But claim these, and all also for which you long, not from man but from God, the King of men. And therefore, before you attempt to obtain them, make yourselves worthy of them—perhaps by that process you will find some of them have become less needful. At all events, do not ask, do not hope, that He will give them to you, before you are able to profit by them. Believe that he has kept them from you hitherto, because they would have been curses, and not, blessings. Oh! look back, look back, at the history of English Radicalism for the last half century, and judge by your own deeds, your own words, were you fit for those privileges which you so fraudulently demanded? Do not answer me, that those who had them were equally unfit, but thank God, if the case be indeed so, that your incapacity was not added to theirs, to make confusion worse confounded! Learn a new lesson. Believe at last that you are in Christ, and become new creatures. With those miserable, awful, farce-tragedies of April and June, lot old things pass away, and all things become new. Believe that your kingdom is not of this world, but of One whose servants must not fight. He that believeth, as the prophet says, will not make haste. Beloved suffering brothers!—are not your times in the hand of One who loved you to the death, who conquered, as you must do, not by wrath, but by martyrdom? Try no more to meet Mammon with his own weapons, but commit your cause to Him who judges righteously, who is even now coming out of His place to judge the earth, and to help the fatherless and poor unto their right, that the man of the world may be no more exalted against them—the poor man of Nazareth, crucified for you!

She ceased, and there was silence for a few moments, as if angels were waiting, hushed, to carry our repentance to the throne of Him we had forgotten.

Crossthwaite had kept his face fast buried in his hands, now he looked up with burning eyes—

"I see it—I see it all now. Oh, my God! my God! What idols we have been!"

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

MIRACLES AND SCIENCE.

SUNRISE, they say, often at first draws up and deepens the very mists which it is about to scatter, and even so, as the excitement of my first conviction cooled, dark doubts came to dim the new-born light of hope and trust within me. The question of miracles had been, ever since I had read Strans, my greatest stumbling-block—perhaps not unwillingly, for my doubts pampered my sense of intellectual acuteness and scientific knowledge; and "a little knowledge is a dangerous thing." But now that they interfered with nobler, more important, more unmoderately practical ideas, I longed to have them removed—I longed even to swallow them down on trust—to take the miracles "into the bargain," as it were, for the sake of that mighty gospel of deliverance for the people, which accompanied them. Mean subterfuge! which would not, could not, satisfy me. The thing was too precious, too all-important, to take one tittle of it on trust. I could not bear the consciousness of one hollow spot—the gather fires of doubt glaring through, even at one little crevice. I took my doubts to Lady Ellerton—Kleanor, as I must now call her, for she never allowed herself to be addressed by her title—and she referred me to her uncle—

"I could say somewhat on that point myself. But since your doubts are scientific ones, I had rather that you should discuss them with one whose knowledge of such subjects, you, and all England with you, must reverse."

"Ah, but—pardon me; he is a clergyman."

"And therefore bound to prove, whether he believes in his own proof or not. Unworthy suspicion!" she cried, with a touch of her old manner. "If you had known that man's literary history for the last thirty years, you would not suspect him, at least, of sacrificing truth and conscience to interest, or to fear of the world's insults."

I was rebuked; and not without hope and confidence, I broached the question to the good dean when he came in—as he happened to do that very day.

"I hardly like to state my difficulties," I began—"for I am afraid that I must hurt myself in your eyes by offending your prejudices, if you will pardon so plain spoken an expression."

"If," he replied, in his bland, courtly way, "I am so unfortunate as to have any prejudices left, you cannot do me a greater kindness than by offending them—or by any other means, however severe—to make me conscious of the locality of such a secret cancer."

"But I am afraid that your own teaching has created, or at least corroborated, these doubts of mine."

"How so?"

"You first taught me to revere science. You first taught me to admire and trust the immutable order, the perfect harmony of the laws of Nature."

"Ah! I comprehend now!" he answered, in a somewhat mournful tone—"how much we have to answer for! How often, in our carelessness, we offend those little ones, whose souls are precious in the sight of God! I have thought long and earnestly on the very subject which now distresses you, perhaps every doubt which has passed through your mind, has exercised my own, and, strange to say, you first set me on that new path of thought. A conversation which passed between us years ago at D* on the antithesis of natural and revealed religion—perhaps you recollect it?"

Yes, I recollected it better than he fancied, and recollected too—I trust the thought he laid me—it was even yet intolerable.

"That conversation first awoke in me the sense of an hitherto unconscious inconsistency—a desire to reconcile two lines of thought—which I had hitherto considered as parallel, and impossible to unite. To you, and to my beloved niece here, I owe gratitude for that evening's talk, and you are freely welcome to all my conclusions, for you have been, indirectly, the originator of them all."

"Then I must confess, that miracles seem to me impossible, just because they break the laws of Nature. Pardon me—but there seems something blasphemous in supposing that God can mar His own order. His power I do not call in question, but the very thought of His so doing is abhorrent to me."

"It is as abhorrent to me as it can be to you, to Goethe, or to Strauss, and yet I believe firmly in our Lord's miracles."

"How so, if they break the laws of Nature?"

"Who told you, my dear young friend, that to break the customs of Nature, is to break her laws? A phenomenon, an appearance, whether it be a miracle or a comet, need not contradict them because it is rare, because it is as yet not referable to them. Nature's deepest laws, her only true laws, are her invisible ones. All analyses (I think you know enough to understand my terms), whether of appearances, of causes, or of elements, only lead us down to fresh appearances—we cannot see a law, let the power of our lens be ever so immense. The true causes remain just as impalpable, as unfathomable as ever, eluding equally our microscope and our induction—ever tending towards some great primal law, as Mr. Grove has well shown lately in his most valuable pamphlet—some great primal law, I say, manifesting itself, according to circumstances, in countless diverse and unexpected forms—till all that the philosopher as well as the divine can say, is—The Spirit of Life impalpable, transcendental, direct from God, is the only real cause. It 'bleweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, or whither it goeth.' What, if miracles should be the orderly results of some such deep, most orderly, and yet most spiritual law?"

"I feel the force of your argument, but—"

"But you will confess, at least, that you, after the fashion of the crowd, have begun your argument by begging the very question in dispute, and may have, after all, created the very difficulty which torments you."

"I confess it, but I cannot see how the miracles of Jesus—of our Lord—have anything of order in them."

"Tell me, then—to try the Mosaic method—is disease, or health, the order and law of Nature?"

"Health, surely, we all confess that by calling disease disorders."

"Then, would one who healed diseases be a restorer, or a breaker of order?"

"A restorer, doubtless; but—"

"Like a patient scholar, and a scholarly patient, allow me to 'exhibit' my own inclinations, according to my own notion of the various crises of your distemper. I assure you I will not play you false, or entrap you by quips and special pleading. You are aware that our Lord's miracles were almost exclusively miracles of healing—restorations of that order of health which disease was breaking—that when the Scribes and Pharisees, superstitious and sense bound, asked Him for a sign from heaven, a supernatural prodigy, he refused them as peremptorily as he did the fiend's 'Command these stones that they may be made bread.' You will quote against me the water turned into wine, as an exception to this rule. St. Augustine answered that objection centuries ago, by the same argument as I am now using. Allow Jesus to have been the Lord of Creation, and what was He doing then, but what He does in the maturing of every grape—transformed from air and water even as that wine in Cana? Goethe himself, unwittingly, has made Mephistopheles even see as much as that—

"Wine is sap, and grapes are wood,
The wooden board yields wine as good."

"But the time"—so infinitely shorter than that which Nature usually occupies in the process!"

"Time and space are no gods, as a wise German says, and as the electric telegraph ought already to have taught you. They are customs, but who has proved them to be laws of Nature? No, analyse these miracles one by one, fairly, carefully, scientifically, and you will find that if you want prodigies really blasphemous and absurd indications of the laws of Nature, amputated limbs growing again, and dead men walking away with their heads under their arms, you must go to the Popish legends, but not to the miracles of the Gospels. And now for you 'but'—"

"The raising of the dead to life? Surely death is the appointed end of every animal—ay, of every species, and of man among the rest."

"Who denies it? But is premature death the death of Jesus's daughter, of the widow's son at Naim, the death of Jesus himself, in the prime of youth and vigour, or rather that gradual decay of ripe old age, through which I now, thank God, so fast am travelling? What nobler restoration of order, what clearer vindication of the laws of Nature from the disorder of diseases, than to recall the dead to their natural and normal period of life?"

I was silent a few moments, having nothing to answer then—

"After all, these may have been restorations of the law of Nature. But why was the law broken in order to restore it? The Tenth of April has taught me, at least, that disorder cannot cast disorder out."

"Again, I ask, why do you assume the very point in question? Again I ask, who knows what really are the laws of Nature? You have heard Bacon's golden rule—'Nature is conquered by obeying her.'"

"I have."

"Then who more likely, who more certain, to fulfil that law to hitherto unattained perfection, than He who came to obey not outward nature merely, but, as Bacon meant, the inner ideas, the spirit of Nature, which is the will of God?—He who came to do utterly, not his own will, but the will of the Father who sent Him? Who is so presumptuous as to limit the future triumphs of science? Surely no one who has watched her giant strides during the last century. Shall Stephenson and Faraday, and the inventors of the calculating machine, and the electric telegraph, have fulfilled such wonders by their weak and partial obedience to the 'Will of God expressed in things'—and he who obeyed, even unto the death, have possessed no higher power than theirs?"

"Indeed," I said, "your words stagger me. But there is another old objection which they have re-awakened in my mind. You will say I am shifting my ground sadly. But you must pardon me."

"Let us hear. They need not be so relevant. The unconscious logic of association is often deeper and truer than any syllogism."

"These modern discoveries in medicine seem to show that Christ's miracles may be attributed to natural causes."

"And thereby justify them. For what else have I been arguing. The difficulty lies only in the rationalist's shallow and sensuous view of Nature, and in his ambiguous slip-slop trick of using the word natural to mean, in one sentence 'material,' and in the next, as I use it, only 'normal and orderly.' Every new wonder in medicine which this great age discovers—what does it prove, but that Christ need have broken no natural laws to do that of old, which can be done now without breaking them—if you will but believe that those gifts of healing are all inspired and revealed by Him who is the Great Physician, the Life, the Lord of that vital energy by whom all cures are wrought."

"The surgeons of St. George's make the boy walk who has been lame from his mother's womb. But have they given life to a single bone or muscle of his limbs? They have only put them into that position—those circumstances, in which the God-given life in them can have its free and normal play, and produce the cure which they only assist. I claim that miracle of science, as I do all future ones, as the inspiration of Him who made the lame to walk in Judea, not by producing new organs, but by His creative will—quickening and liberating those which already existed."

"The mesmerist, again, says that he can cure a spirit of infirmity, an hysterical or paralytic patient, by shedding forth on them his own vital energy, and, therefore he will have it, that Christ's miracles were but mesmeristic feats. I grant, for the sake of argument, that he possesses the power which he claims, though I may think his facts too new, too undigested, often too exaggerated, to claim my certain assent. But, I say, I take you on your own ground; and, indeed, if man be the image of God, his vital energy may, for aught I know, be able, like God's, to communicate some spark of life. But then, what must have been the vital energy of Him, who was the life itself, who was filled without measure with the spirit, not only of humanity, but with that of God the Lord and Giver of life? Do but let the Bible tell its own story, grant, for the sake of argument, the truth of the dogmas which it asserts throughout, and it becomes a consistent whole. When a man begins, as Spinoza does, by assuming the falsity of its conclusions, no wonder if he finds its premises a fragmentary chaos of contradictions."

"And what else," asked Eleanor, passionately, "what else is the meaning of that highest human honor, the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, but a paternal token that the same life-giving spirit is the free right of all?"

And thereon followed happy, peaceful, hopeful words, which the reader, if he call himself a Christian, ought to be able to imagine for himself. I am afraid that writing from memory, I should do as little justice to them as I have ^{to} the claim's arguments in this chapter. Of the consequences which they produced in me, I will speak anon.

CHAPTER XXXI.

It was a month or more before I summoned courage to ask after my cousin.

Eleanor looked solemnly at me.

"Did you not know it?" He is dead."

"Dead!" I was almost stunned by the announcement.

"Of typhus fever. He died three weeks ago, and not only he, but the servant who brushed his clothes, and the shopman, who had, a few days before, brought him a new coat home."

"How did you learn all this?"

"From Mr. Crosthwaite. But the strangest part of the sad story is to come. Crosthwaite's suspicions were aroused by some incidental circumstances, and knowing of Downes's death, and the fact that you most probably caught your fever in that miserable being's house, he made such inquiries as satisfied him that it was no other than your cousin's coat."

"Which covered the corpse in that fearful chamber?"

"It was indeed."

Just, awful God! And this was the consistent Nemesis of all poor George's thrift and cunning, of his determination to carry the buy-cheap-and-sell-dear commercialism, in which he had been brought up, and every act of life! Did I rejoice? No, all revenge, all spite had been scourged out of me.

I mourned for him as for a brother, till the thought flashed across me—Lillian was free! Half unconscious, I stammered her name inquiringly "

"Judge for yourself," answered Eleanor, mildly, yet with a deep, severe meaning in her tone

I was silent.

The tempest in my heart was ready to burst forth again, but she, my guardian angel, soothed it for me

"She is much changed, sorrow and sickness—for she, too, has had the fever,—and, alas! less resignation or peace within, than those who love her would have wished to see, have worn her down. Little remains now of that loveliness "

"Which I idolised in my folly! "

"Thank God, thank God! that you see that at last I knew it all along. I knew that there was nothing there for your heart to rest upon—nothing to satisfy your intellect—and, therefore, I tried to turn you from your dream. I did it harshly, angrily, too sharply, yet not explicitly enough. I ought to have made allowances for you. I should have known how enchanting, intoxicating, mere outward perfection must have been to one of your perceptions, shut out so long as you had been from the beautiful in art and nature. But I was cruel. Alas! I had not then learnt to sympathise, and I have often since felt with terror, that I, too, may have many of your sins to answer for, that I, even I, helped to drive you on to bitterness and despair "

"Oh, do not say so! You have done to me, meant to me, nothing but good "

"Be not too sure of that. You little know me. You little know the pride which I have fostered even the mean anger against you, for being the protégé of anyone but myself. That exclusiveness, and shyness, and proud reserve, is the bane of our English character. It has been the bane of mine. daily I strive to root it out. Come—I will do so now. You wonder why I am here. You shall hear somewhat of my story, and do not fancy that I am showing you a peculiar mark of honour or confidence. If the history of my life can be of use to the meaneast, they are welcome to the secrets of my inmost heart.

"I was my parents' only child, an heiress, highly born, and highly educated. Every circumstance of humanity which could pamper pride was mine, and I battered on the poison. I painted, I sang, I wrote in prose and verse—they told me, not without success. Men said that I was beautiful. I knew that myself, and revelled and gloried in the thought. Accustomed to see myself the centre of all my parents' hopes and fears, to be surrounded by flatterers, to indulge in secret the still more fatal triumph of contempt for those I thought less gifted than myself, self became the centre of my thoughts. Pleasure was all I thought of. But not what the vulgar call pleasure. That I disdained, while, like you, I worshipped all that was pleasurable in the intellect and the taste. The beautiful was my God. I lived, in deliberate intoxication, on poetry, music, painting, and every autotype of them which I could find to the world around. At last I met with one whom you once saw. He first awoke in me the sense of the vast duties and responsibilities of my station—his example first taught me to care for the many rather than for the few. It was a blessed lesson. yet even that I turned to poison, by making self, still self, the object of my very benevolence. To be a philanthropist, a philosopher, a feudal queen, and the blessings and the praise of dependant hundreds—that was my new ideal, for that I turned the whole force of my intellect to the study of history, of social and economic questions. From Bentham and Malthus to Fourier and Proudhon, I read them all. I made them all fit into that idol temple of self which I was rearing, and fancied that I did my duty, by becoming one of the great ones of the earth. My ideal was not the crucified Nazarene, but some Hamon Alahad, in luxurious splendour, pampering his pride by bestowing as a favour those mercies which God commands as the right of all. I thought to serve God forsooth, by serving Mammon and myself. Fool that I was! I could not see God's handwriting on the wall against me. How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the Kingdom of heaven!

"You gave me, unintentionally, a warning. The capabilities which I saw in you made me suspect that those below might be more nearly my equals than I had yet fancied. Your vivid descriptions of the misery among whole classes of workmen—misery caused and ever increased by the very system of society itself—gave a momentary shock to my fancy. They drove me back upon the simple old question, which has been asked by every honest heart, age after age, 'What right have I to revel in luxury, while thousands are starving?' Why do I pride myself on doing out to them small fractions of that wealth, which, if sacrificed utterly and at once, might help to raise hundreds to a civilisation as high as my own? I could not face the thought, and angry with you for having awakened it, however unintentionally, I shrunk back behind the pitiable worn-out fallacy, that luxury was necessary to give employment. I knew that it was a fallacy, I knew that the labour spent in producing unnecessary things for one rich man was just as well have gone in producing necessities for a hundred poor, or employ the architect and the painter for public bodies as well as private individuals. That even for the production of luxuries, the monopolising demand of the rich was not required—that the appliances of real civilisation, the landscapes, gardens, stately rooms, baths, books, pictures, works of art, collections of curiosities, which now went to pamper me alone—me, one single human soul—might be helping, in an associate society, to civilise a hundred families, now debarred from them by isolated poverty, without robbing me of an atom of the real enjoyment or benefit of them. I knew it, I say, to be a fallacy, and yet I hid behind it from the eye of God. Besides, ‘it always had been so—the few rich, and the many poor. I was but one more among millions.’”

She paused a moment, as if to gather strength, and then continued

“The blow came. My idol—for he, too, was an idol—to please him I had begun—to please myself in pleasing him, I was trying to become great—and with him went from me that sphere of labour which was to witness the triumph of my pride. I saw the estate pass into other hands, a mighty change passed over me, as impossible, perhaps, as unfitting, for me to analyse. I was considered mad. Perhaps I was so: there is a Divine insanity, a celestial folly, which conquers worlds. At least, when that period was past, I had done and suffered so strangely, that nothing henceforth could seem strange to me. I had broken the yoke of custom and opinion. My only ground was now the bare realities of human life and duty. In poverty and loneliness I thought out the problems of society, and seemed to myself to have found the one solution—self-sacrifice. Following my first impulse, I had given largely to every charitable institution. I could hear of—(God forbid that I should regret those gifts—yet the money, I soon found, might have been better spent. One by one, every institution disappointed me, they seemed, after all, only means for keeping the poor in their degradation, by making it just not intolerable to them—means for enabling Mammon to draw fresh victims into his den, by taking off his hands those whom he had already worn out into uselessness. Then I tried association among my own sex—among the most unwelcome and degraded of them. I simply tried to put them into a position in which they might work for each other, and not for a single tyrant; in which that tyrant’s profits might be divided among the slaves themselves. Experienced men warned me that I should fail, that such a plan would be destroyed by the innate selfishness and rivalry of human nature; that it demanded what was impossible to find, good faith, fraternal love, overruling moral influence. I answered, that I knew that already, that nothing but Christianity alone could supply that want, but that it could and should supply it, that I would teach them to live as sisters, by living with them as their sister myself. To become the teacher, the minister, the slave of those whom I was trying to rescue, was now my one idea. To lead them on, not by machinery, but by precept, by example, by the influence of every gift and talent which God had bestowed upon me, to devote to them my enthusiasm, my eloquence, my poetry, my art, my science, to tell them who had bestowed their gifts on me, and would bestow, to each according to her measure, the same on them, to make my workrooms, in one word, not a machinery, but a family. And I have succeeded—as others will succeed, long after my name, my small endeavours, are forgotten amid the great now world—new Church. I should have said—of enfranchised and fraternal labour.”

And this was the suspected aristocrat! Oh, my brothers, my brothers! little you know how many a noble soul, among those ranks which you consider only as your foes, is yearning to love, to help, to live and die for you, did they but know the way? Is it their fault, if God has placed them where they are? Is it their fault, if they refuse to part with their wealth, before they are sure that such a sacrifice would really be a mercy to you? Show yourselves worthy of association. Show that you can do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with your God, as brothers before one Father, subjects of one crucified King, and see then whether the spirit of self-sacrifice is dead among the rich! See whether there are not left in England yet seven thousand who have not bowed the knee to Mammon, who will not fear to “give their substance to the free,” if they find that the Son has made you free from your own sins, as well as from the sins of others!

CHAPTER VI.

PRIESTS AND PEOPLE

“BUT after all,” I said one day, “the great practical objection still remains unanswered—the clergy? Are we to throw ourselves into their hands after all? Are we, who have been declaiming all our lives against priestcraft, voluntarily to forgo again the chains of our slavery to a class whom we neither trust nor honour?”

She smiled. “If you examine the Prayer-Book, you will not find, as far as I am aware, anything which binds a man to become the slave of the priesthood, voluntarily or otherwise. Whether the people become priest-ridden or not, hereafter, will depend, as it always has done, utterly on themselves. As long as the people act upon their spiritual liberty, and live with eyes undimmed by superstitious fear, fixed in loving holdness on their Father in Heaven, and their King, the first-born among many brethren, the priesthood will remain, as God intended them, only the interpreters and witnesses of His will and His kingdom. But let them turn their eyes from Him to aught in earth or heaven beside, and there will be no lack of priestcraft, of veils to hide Him from them, tyrants to keep them from Him, idols to ape His likeness. A sinful people will be sure to be a priest-ridden people, in reality, though not in name, by journalists and demagogues, if not by class leaders and popes and of the two, I confess I should prefer a Hildebrand to an O'Mynn."

"But," I replied, "we do not love, we do not trust, we do not respect the clergy. Has their conduct to the masses for the last century deserved that we should do so? Will you ask us to obey the men whom we despise?"

"God forbid!" she answered. "But you must surely be aware of the miraculous, ever-increasing improvement in the clergy."

"In morals," I said, "and in industry, doubtless, but not upon those points which are to us just now dearer than their morals or their industry, because they involve the very existence of our own industry and our own morals—I mean, social and political subjects. On them the clergy seem to me as ignorant, as bigoted, as aristocratic as ever."

"But, suppose that there were a rapidly increasing class among the clergy, who were willing to help you to the uttermost—and you must feel that then help would be worth having—towards the attainment of social reform, if you would waive for a time merely political claims?"

"What?" I said, "give up the very ideas for which we have struggled, and smothered, and all but died—and will struggle, and, if need be, die for still, or confess ourselves traitors to the common weal?"

"The Charter, like its supporters, must die to itself before it lives to God. Is it not even now further off than ever?"

"It seems so, indeed—but what do you mean?"

"You regarded the Charter as an absolute end. You made a selfish and a self-willed idol of it. And therefore God's blessing did not rest on it or you."

"We want it as a means as well as an end—as a means for the highest and widest social reform, as well as a right dependent on eternal justice."

"Let the working-classes prove that, then," she replied, "in their actions now. If it be true, as I would fain believe it to be, let them show that they are willing to give up their will to God's will, to compass those social reforms by the means which God puts in their way, and wait for His own good time to give them, or not to give them, those means which they in their own minds prefer. This is what I meant by saying that Chartism must die to itself before it has a chance of living to God. You must feel too, that Chartism has sinned—has defiled itself in the eyes of the wise, the good, the gentle. Your only way now to soften the prejudice against it is to show that you can no longer be men, and brothers, and Christians without it. You cannot wonder if the clergy shall object awhile to help you towards that Charter, which the majority of you demanded for the express purpose of destroying the creed which the clergy do believe, however badly they may have acted upon it."

"It is all true enough—bitterly true but yet, why do we need the help of the clergy?"

"Because you need the help of the whole nation, because there are other classes to be considered beside yourselves, because the nation is neither the few nor the many, but the all, because it is only by the co-operation of all the members of a body, that any one member can fulfil its calling in health and freedom, because, as long as you stand aloof from the clergy, or from any other class, through pride, self-interest, or wilful ignorance, you are keeping up those very class distinctions of which you and I, too, complain as 'hatful equally to God and to His enemies,' and, finally, because the clergy are the class which God has appointed to unite all others which, in as far as it fulfils its calling, and is indeed a priesthood, is above and below all rank, and knows no man after the flesh, but only on the ground of his spiritual worth, and his birthright in that kingdom which is the heritage of all."

"Truly," I answered, "the idea is a noble one. But look at the reality! Has not priestly pandering to tyrants made the Church, in every age, a scold and a byword among free men?"

"May it ever do so," she replied, "when ever such a sin exists! But yet, look at the other side of the picture. Did not the priesthood, in the first ages, glory not in the name, but, what is better, in the office, of democrats? Did not the Roman tyrants hunt them down as wild beasts, because they were democrats, proclaiming to the slave and to the barbarian a spiritual freedom and a heavenly citizenship, before which the Roman will knew his power must vanish into nought? Who, during the invasion of the barbarians, protected the poor against their conquerors? Who, in the Middle Age, stood between the baron and his serfs? Who, in their monasteries, realised spiritual democracy,—the nothingness of rank and wealth, the practical might of co-operation and self sacrifice? Who delivered England from the Pope? Who spread throughout every cottage in the land the Bible and Protestantism, the book and the religion which declares that a man's soul is free in the sight of God? Who, at the martyr's stake in Oxford, 'lighted the candle in England that shall never be put out?' Who, by suffering, and not by rebellion, drove the last perjured Stuart from his throne, and united every sect and class in one of the noblest steps in England's progress? You will say these are the exceptions; I say nay, they are rather a few great and striking manifestations of an influence which has been, unseen, though not unfelt, at work for ages, converting, consecrating, organising, every fresh invention of mankind, and which is now on the eve of Christianising democracy, as it did Medieval Feudalism, Tudor Nationalism, Whig Constitutionalism, and which will succeed in Christianising it, and so alone making it rational, human, possible, because the priesthood alone, of all human institutions, testifies of Christ the King of men, the Lord of all things, the insurer of all discoveries, who reigns, and will reign, till He has put all things under His feet, and the kingdoms of the world have become the kingdoms of God and of His Christ. Be sure, as it always has been, so will it be now. Without the priesthood there is no freedom for the people. Statesmen know it, and, therefore, those who would keep the people fettered, find it necessary to keep the priesthood fettered also. The people never can be themselves without co-operation with the priesthood, and the priesthood never can be themselves without co-operation with the people. They may help to make a sect-Church for the rich, as they have helped to make, or a sect-Church for paupers (which is also the most subtle form of a sect-Church for the rich), as a party in England are trying now to do—as I once gladly would have done myself—but if they would be truly priests of God, and priests of the Universal Church, they must be priests of the people, priests of the masses, priests after the like news of Him who died on the cross.

"And are there any men," I said, "who believe this? and, what is more, have courage to act upon it, now in the very hour of Mammon's triumph?"

"There are those who are willing, who are determined, whatever it may cost them, to fraternise with those whom they take shame to themselves for having neglected, to preach and to organise, in concert with them, a Holy War against the social abuses which are England's shame, and, first and foremost, against the fear of competition. They do not want to be dictators to the working-men. They know that they have a message to the artisan, but they know, too, that the artisan has a message to them, and they are not afraid to hear it. They do not wish to make him a puppet for any system of their own, they only are willing, if he will take the hand they offer him, to devote themselves, body and soul, to the great end of enabling the artisan to govern himself, to produce in the integrity of a free man, and not of a slave, to eat the food he earns, and wear the clothes he makes. Will you working brothers co-operate with these men? Are they, do you think, such bigots as to let political differences stand between them and those who fain would trust them as their brothers, or will they fight manfully side by side with them in the battle against Mammon, trusting to God, that if in anything they are otherwise minded, He will, in His own good time, reveal even that unto them? Do you think, to take one instance, the men of your own trade would heartily join a handful of these men in an experiment of associate labour, even though there should be a drayman or two among them?"

"Join them?" I said. "Can you ask the question? I, for one, would devote myself, body and soul, to any enterprise so noble. Crossthwaite would ask for nothing higher than to be a hewer of wood and a drawer of water to an establishment of associate workmen. But, alas! his fate is fixed for the New World, and mine, I verily believe, for sickness and the grave. And yet I will answer for it, that, in the hopes of helping such a project, he would give up Mackaye's bequest, for the mere sake of remaining in England, and for me, if I have but a month of life, it is at the service of such men as you describe."

"Ah!" she said musingly, "if poor Mackaye had but had somewhat more faith in the future, that fatal condition would perhaps never have been attached to his bequest. And yet, perhaps, it is better as it is. Crossthwaite's mind may want quite as much as yours does, a few years of a simpler and brighter atmosphere to soften and refresh it again. Besides, your health is too weak, your life, I know, too valuable to your class, for us to trust you on such a voyage alone. He must go with you."

"With me?" I said. "You must be misinformed, I have no thought of leaving England."

"You know the opinion of the physicians?"

"I know that my life is not likely to be a long one, that immediate removal to a southern, if possible to a tropical climate, is considered the only means of preserving it. For the former, I care little, non est tanti mero. And, indeed, the latter, even if it would succeed, is impossible. Crossthwaite will live and thrive by the labour of his hands, while, for such a helpless invalid as I to travel would be to dissipate the little capital which poor Mackaye has left me."

"The day will come, when society will find it profitable, as well as just, to put the means of preserving life by travel within the reach of the poorest. But individuals must always begin by setting the examples, which the State too slowly, though surely (for the world is God's world after all), will learn to copy. All is arranged for you Crossthwaite, you know, would have sailed ere now, had it not been for your fever. Next week you start with him for Texas. No, make no objections. All expenses are defrayed—no matter by whom."

"By you! by you! Who else?"

"Do you think that I monopolise the generosity of England? Do you think warm hearts beat only in the breasts of working-men? But, if it were I, would not that be only another reason for submitting? You must go. You will have, for the next three years, such an allowance as will support you in comfort, whether you choose to remain stationary, or, as I hope, to travel southward into Mexico. Your passage-money is already paid."

Why should I attempt to describe my feelings? I gasped for breath, and looked stupidly at her for a minute or two. The second darling hope of my life within my reach, just as the first had been snatched from me! At last I found words.

"No, no, noble lady! Do not tempt me! Who am I, the slave of impulse, useless, worn out in mind and body, that you should waste such generosity upon me? I do not refuse from the honest pride of independence, I have not man enough left in me even for that. But will you, of all people, ask me to desert the starving suffering thousands, to whom my heart, my honour are engaged, to give up the pillow of my life, and pamper my fancy in a luxurious paradise, while they are starving here?"

"What? Cannot God find champions for them when you are gone? Has He not found them already? Believe me, that Tenth of April, which you forecast the death day of liberty, has awakened a spirit in high as well as low life, which children yet unborn will bless."

"Oh, do not mistake me! Have I not confessed my own weakness? But if I have one healthy nerve left in me, soul or body, it will retain its strength only as long as it thrills with devotion to the people's cause. If I live, I must live among them, for them. If I die, I must die at my post. I could not rest, except in labour. I dare not fly, like Jotham, from the call of God. In the deepest shade of the virgin forests, on the loneliest peak of the Cordilleras, He would find me out, and I should hear His still small voice reproving me, as it reproved the fugitive patriot, seer of old—What doest thou here, Elijah?"

I was excited, and spoke, I am afraid, after my custom, somewhat too magniloquently. But she answered calmly with a quiet smile.

"So you are a Chartist still?"

"If by a Chartist you mean one who fancies that a change in mere political circumstances will bring about a millennium, I am no longer one. That dream is gone—with others. But if to be a Chartist is to love my brothers with every faculty of my soul—to wish to live and die struggling for their rights, endeavouring to make them, not electors merely, but fit to be electors, senators, kings and priests to God and to His Christ—if that be the Chartistism of the future, then am I sevenfold a Chartist, and ready to confess it before men, though I were thrust forth from every door in England."

She was silent a moment.

"The stone which the builders rejected is become the head stone of the corner. Surely the old English spirit has cast its madness, and begins to speak once more as it spoke in Naschy fights and Smithfield fires!"

"And yet you would quench it in me amid the enervating climate of the Tropics?"

Need it be quenched there? Was it quenched in Drake, in Hawkins, and the conquerors of Hindostan? Weakness, ill-strength, is from within, of the spirit, and not of the sunshine. I would send you thither, that you may gain new strength, new knowledge to carry out your dream and mine. Do not refuse me the honour of persuading you. Do not forbid me to employ my wealth in the only way which reconciles my conscience to the possession of it. I have saved many a woman already, and this one thing remained—the highest of all my hopes and longings—that God would allow me, ere I died, to save a man. I have longed to find some noble soul, as Chulih says, felled down by the wayside, and lift it up, and heal its wounds, and teach it the secret of its heavenly birthright, and consecrate it to its King in heaven. I have longed to find a man of the people, whom I could train to be the poet of the people."

"Me, at least, you have saved, have taught, have trained! Oh that your eye had been bestowed on some more worthy object!"

Let me at least, then, perfect my own work. You do not—it is a sign of your humanity that you do not appreciate the value of this rest. You underestimate at once your own powers, and the shock which they have received."

"If I must go, then, why so far? Why put you to so great expense? If you must be generous, send me to some place nearer home—to Italy, to the coast of Devon, or the Isle of Wight, where myriads like me are said to find all the advantages which are so often, perhaps too hastily, sought in foreign lands."

"No," she said, smiling, "you are my servant now, by the laws of chivalry, and you must follow my quest. I have long hoped for a Tropic poet, one who should leave the routine imagery of European civilisation, its meagre scenery, and physically deceptive hues, for the grandeur, the luxuriance, the minute and strongly marked variety of Tropic nature, the paradisaic beauty and simplicity of Tropic humanity. I am tired of the old images, of the barren alternation between Italy and the Highlands. I had once dreamt of going to the Tropics myself; but my work lay elsewhere. Go forward, and for the people. See if you cannot help to infuse some new blood into the aged veins of English literature; see if you cannot, by observing man in his mere simple and primeval state, bring home fresh conceptions of beauty, fresh spiritual and physical laws of his existence, that you may realise them here at home—(how, I see as yet but dimly; but He who teaches the facts will surely teach their application)—in the cottages, in the playgrounds, the reading rooms, the churches of working-men.”

“But I know so little—I have seen so little.”

“That very fact, I flatter myself, gives you an especial vocation for my scheme. Your ignorance of cultivated English scenery, and of Italian art, will enable you to approach with a more reverent, simple, and unprejudiced eye, the primal forms of beauty—God’s work, not man’s. Sin you will see there, and anarchy, and tyranny, but I do not send you to look for a society, but for Nature. I do not send you to become a barbarian settler, but to bring home to the realms of civilisation those ideals of physical perfection, which as yet, alas! barbarism, rather than civilisation, has preserved. Do not despise your old love for the beautiful. Do not fancy that because you have let it become an idol and a tyrant, it was not therefore the gift of God. Cherish it, develop it to the last, steep your whole soul in beauty, watch it in its most vast and complex harmonies, and not less in its most faint and fragmentary traces. Only, hitherto you have blindly worshipped it, now you must learn to comprehend, to master, to embody it, to show it forth to men as the sacrament of Heaven, the finger-mark of God!”

Who could resist such pleading from how lips? I at least could not.

CHAPTER XL.

FREEDOM, EQUALITY, AND BROTHERHOOD.

BEFORE the same Father, the same King, crunched for all alike, we had partaken of the same bread and wine, we had prayed for the same spirit. Side by side around the chair on which I lay propped up with pillows, coughing my span of life away, had knelt the high-born countess, the cultivated philosopher, the repentant rebel, the wild Irish girl, her slavish and exclusive creed exchanged for ‘one more free and all-embracing; and that no extreme type of human condition might be wanting, the reclaimed Magdalene was there—two pale worn girls from Eleanor’s asylum, in whom I recognised the needlewomen to whom Mackaye had taken me, on a memorable night seven years before. Thus—and how better!—had God rewarded their loving care of that poor dying fellow-slave.

Yes—we had knelt together and I had felt that we were one—that there was a bond between us, real, eternal, independent of ourselves, knit not by man, but God; and the peace of God which passes understanding, came over me like the clear sunshine after weary rain.

One by one they shook me by the hand, and quitted the room, and Eleanor and I were left alone.

“See!” she said, “Freedom, Equality, and Brotherhood are mine; but not as you expected.”

Blissful, repentant tears blinded my eyes, as I replied, not to her, but Him who spoke by her—

“Lord! not as I will, but as thou wilt.”

“Yes,” she continued, “Freedom, Equality, and Brotherhood are here. Realise them in thine own self, and so alone thou helpst to make them realities for all. Not from without, from Charters and Republics, but from within, from The Spirit working in each, not by wrath and haste, but by patience made perfect through suffering, canst thou proclaim thine good news to the roving masses, and deliver them, as thy Master did before thee, by the cross, and not the sword. Divine paradox!—folly to the rich and mighty—the watchword of the weak, in whose weakness is God’s strength made perfect. ‘In your patience possess ye your souls, for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.’ Yes—He came to crush the Babel tyranny of Rome fell, even as the more fearful, more subtle, and more diabolic tyranny of Mammon shall fall ere long—suicidal, even now crumbling by its innate decay. Yes—Babylon the Great—the commercial world of selfish competition, drunken with the blood of God’s people, whose merchandise is the bodies and souls of men—her doom is gone forth. And then—then—when they, the tyrants of the earth, who lived delicately with her rejoicing in her sins, the plutocrats and bureaucrats, the money changers and devourers of labour, are crying to the rocks to hide them, and to the hills to cover them, from the wrath of Him that sitteth on the throne, then labour shall be free at last, and the poor shall eat and be satisfied, with things that eye hath not seen nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, but which God has prepared for those who love Him. Then the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea, and mankind at last shall own their King—Him in whom they are all redeemed into the glorious liberty of the Sons of God, and He shall reign indeed on earth, and none but His saints shall rule beside Him. And then shall this sacrament be an everlasting sign to all the nations of the world, as it has been to you this day, of freedom, equality, brotherhood, of glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill toward men. Do you believe?”

TAILOR AND POET.

Again I answered, not her, but Him who sent her—

"Lord, I believe! Help thou my unbelief!"

"And now, farewell. I shall not see you again before you start—and ere you return—My health has been fast declining lately."

I started—I had not dared to confess to myself how thin her features had become of late. I had tried not to hear the dry and hectic cough, or see the burning spot on either cheek—but it was too true, and with a broken voice, I cried

"Oh that I might die, and join you!"

"Not so—I trust that you have still a work to do. But if not, promise me that, whatever be the event of your voyage, you will publish, in good time, an honest history of your life, extenuating nothing, exaggerating nothing, ashamed to confess or to proclaim nothing. It may perhaps awaken some rich man to look down and take pity on the brains and hearts more noble than his own, which ho struggling in poverty and misguidance, among these foul cities, which civilisation rears—and calls them cities. Now, once again, farewell!"

She held out her hand—I would have fallen at her feet, but the thought of that common sacrament withheld me. I seized her hand, covered it with adoring kisses—Slowly she withdrew it, and glided from the room.

What need of more words? I obeyed her—sailed—and here I am.

Yes! I have seen the land! Like a purple fringe upon the golden water, "while the parting day dies like the dolphin," there it lay upon the far horizon—the great young free New World! and every tree, and flower, and insect on it new to wonder and a joy which I shall never see.

No, I shall never reach the land. I felt it all along. Weaker and weaker, day by day, with bleeding lungs and failing limbs, I have travelled the ocean-paths. The iron has entered too deeply into my soul.

Hark! Merry voices on deck are welcoming their future home. Laugh on, happy ones—come out of Egypt and the house of bondage, and the waste and howling wildoness of slavery and competition, workhouses and prisons, into a good land and large, a land flowing with milk and honey, where you will sit every one under his own vine and his own fig-tree, and look into the faces of your rosy children—and see in them a blessing and not a curse! Oh, England! stern mother land, when wilt thou renew thy youth?—thou wilderness of man's making, not God's! Is it not written, that the days shall come when the forest shall break forth into song, and the wilderness shall blossom like the rose?

Hark! again, sweet and clear across the still night sea, ring out the notes of Crossethwaite's bugle—the first luxury, poor fellow, he ever allowed himself; and yet not a selfish one, for music, like mercy, is twice blessed—

"It bleaseth him that gives and him that takes."

There is the spirit stirring marching air of the German workmen students—

"Thou, thou, thou, and thou, Sir Master, fare thee well—"

Perhaps a half reproachful hint to the poor old England he is leaving. What a glorious motto! warming one's whole heart into life and energy! If I could but write in such a metric one true people's song, that should embody all my sorrow, indignation, hope—fitting last words for a poet of the people—for they will be my last words—Well—thank God! at least I shall not be buried in a London churchyard! It may be a foolish fancy—but I have made them promise to lay me up among the virgin woods, where, if the soul ever visits the place of its body's rest, I may snatch glimpses of that natural beauty from which I was barred out in life, and watch the gorgeous flowers that bloom above my dust, and hear the forest birds singing around the Poet's grave.

Hark to the grand hit of the "Good Time Coming!"—song which has cheered ten thousand hearts, which has already taken root that it may live and grow forever. A fitting melody to soothe my dying ears! Ah! how should there not be A Good Time coming?—Hope, and trust, and infinite deliverance!—a time such as eye hath not seen nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive!—coming surely, soon or late, to those for whom a God did not disdain to die!

Our only remaining duty is to give an extract from a letter written by John Crossethwaite, and dated

"Galveston, Texas, Oct 1848"

* "I am happy. Katie is happy. There is peace among us here, like the clear downshining after rain." But I thirst and long already for the expiration of my seven years' exile, wholesome as I believe it to be. My only wish is to return and assist in the Emancipation of Labour, and give my small aid in that fraternal union of all classes, which I hear is surely, though slowly, spreading in my mother-land.

"And now for my poor friend, whose papers, according to my promise to him, I transmit to you. On the very night on which he seems to have concluded them—an hour after we had made the land—we found in his death-bed, dead, his head resting on the table as peacefully as if he had alighted on a sheet of paper by him were written the following verses; the ink was not yet dry.

“MY LAST WORDS.

I

‘Weep, weep, weep, and weep,
 For pauper, dolt, and slave,
 Hark! from wasted moor and fen,
 Feverous alley, workhouse den,
 Swells the wail of Englishmen,
 “Work! or the grave!”

II

‘Down, down, down, and down,
 With idler, knave, and tyrant,
 Why for sluggards stint and moli?
 He that will not live by toll
 Has no right on English soil,
 God’s Word’s our warrant!

III

‘Up, up, up, and up,
 Face your game and play it!
 The night is past—be’old the sun!
 The cup is full, the web is spun,
 The Judge is set, the doom begun,
 Who shall stay it?”
